"In my humble opinion if we dispatched Song Jiang and his fine generals and all the troops under their command to the border, they could defeat the Liao bandits. Sending them into battle will truly be of great advantage to our country. As a mere minister I cannot order this, myself, but I beg Your Majesty to consider."

Pleasure suffused the emperor's countenance. He queried his officials. All agreed that Su's proposal was reasonable. The sovereign angrily berated Tong Guan and his fellow conspirators.

"By your slanders and lies you've harmed our country. Your jealousy of talent has blocked the path of the meritorious. Your distortions have seriously damaged affairs of state! But I will forgive you this time and not pursue the matter."

The emperor personally drew an edict naming Song Jiang as the Vanguard General against the Liao Tartars, and stating that his chieftains would be awarded official rank in keeping with how they distinguished themselves. He directed Marshal Su to deliver the edict to Song Jiang at his camp. The sovereign dismissed court and his officials withdrew.

Marshal Su brought the imperial document to Song Jiang's camp and told him the emperor's intention. Song Jiang hastily lit incense, kowtowed in thanks for His Majesty's benevolence, and opened the edict. It read as follows:

Edict: When Emperor Shun assumed the throne, he raised Gao Tao to enforce his rule. When Tang became sovereign, he appointed Yi Yin to maintain peace. From the time I established my reign I have been tireless in selecting men of excellence. Recently, Song Jiang and his cohorts have joined us. They wish to obey Heaven and defend the country. They are all honorable and entirely faithful. Such great talent should not be used lightly.

Now, the Liao armies have invaded our borders. I have appointed Song Jiang as the Vanguard General to smash them, and Lu Junyi as "Vice-Vanguard General. His other officers will be awarded appropriate rank when their meritorious deeds are reported to the throne. Let them all set out at once, go directly to the enemy's lair, castigate the evildoers, save the people, and purge our border regions. Each prefecture through which they pass shall supply them with money and grain. They are authorized to punish any official who fails to comply.

This imperial edict is hereby proclaimed.

of the fourth year of Xuan He

Song Jiang, Lu Junyi, and the other chieftains, who had listened, kneeling, while the document was being read, were very pleased. They kowtowed, and Song Jiang expressed their thanks to Marshal Su.

"We've been hoping for a chance like this to serve out country," he said, "to win credit and position and become loyal officials. You've been kinder to us than our own parents, intervening with the emperor on our behalf. Our only problem is that we still haven't disposed of Chao Gai's spirit tablet on Mount Liangshan, and our families haven't yet returned to our homes. And our walls and battlements must be destroyed and our ships of war brought here. Would you please request His Majesty to allow us to return to the mountain and attend to these matters? Then we can get our arms and equipment in order and devote ourselves entirely to serving the nation."

Marshal Su gladly assented and reported to the emperor, who instructed the treasure to draw one thousand ounces of gold and five thousand ounces of silver, plus five thousand bolts of satin, and issue them to the chieftains. He ordered the marshal to handle the distribution at the camp. The gifts were to be given to the dependents of those with families, to guarantee their support for the rest of their lives. Chieftains without families would receive the gifts directly, to use as they saw fit.

Imperial order in hand, Song Jiang expressed his thanks and directed the distribution. As he was leaving for the palace, the marshal offered Song Jiang a few words of advice.

"Go to the mountain, General, but come back quickly. Let me know of your return in advance. There must be no delay."

Song Jiang and his chieftains then conferred on who should go. They decided that these should be Song Jiang, his chief generals Wu Yong, Gongsun Sheng, Lin Chong, Liu Tang, Du Qian, Song Wan, Zhu Gui, Song Qing and the three Ruan brothers—together with cavalry, infantry and naval forces of over ten thousand. The rest of the army would remain encamped near the capital under Vice-Vanguard General Lu Junyi. The journey to the mountain stronghold was uneventful. Seated in Loyalty Hall, Song Jiang instructed the families to pack and get ready to start for home. He also ordered that pigs and sheep be slaughtered, incense and candles lit, and ingots and horses of paper burned as sacrifices to the spirit of Chao Gai. Then the former leader's spirit tablet was also reduced to ashes and a feast laid for all the chieftains.

In carts and on horseback the families departed for their original homes. Song Jiang directed his retainers to escort their families and old Squire Song and his household back to their native village in Yuncheng County and become respectable citizens again.

He told the three Ruan brothers to select the most useful of the ships of war, and to distribute the remaining smaller craft among the neighboring populace. These could also dismantle the buildings and take the materials. The fortifications in the three passes and structures like Loyalty Hall were to be destroyed.

When all this was done and everything put in order, the armed forces were assembled. They returned swiftly to the capital.

The march was without incident, and they soon reached the camp where Lu Junyi and the others were waiting. Yan Qing was sent on to the city to inform Marshal Su that they were ready to take leave of the sovereign and commence the expedition. The marshal duly notified the emperor.

The next day His Majesty received Song Jiang and his chieftains with smiling countenance in the Hall of Martial Heroes. Libation cups were drunk, and the sovereign, extremely pleased, spoke.

"Go forth and crush the Liao Tartars. Let us hear news of victory soon. We shall make much important use of you. As to your generals, they shall be awarded rank according to their merit. Let there be no delay!"

Song Jiang kowtowed and offered thanks. "I was only a petty functionary who committed a heinous crime and was exiled to Jiangzhou," he said. "There, for rebellious words written while drunk, I was condemned to execution in the public square. These brothers rescued me, and since I had no place else to hide, I took refuge with them in Liangshan Marsh. For all these crimes I deserve ten thousand deaths! Yet Your Majesty, in your vast benevolence, has seen fit to pardon me. Though I split my liver and gall with exertion, I shall never be able to repay Your Majesty's kindness! I shall certainly expend my utmost strength and devotion to carry out your royal order, or die gladly in the attempt."

Very pleased, the sovereign again awarded cups of imperial wine. At his direction, Song Jiang was presented with a gold-embossed set of bow and arrows, a fully accoutered fine steed, and a precious sword. Song Jiang kowtowed and voiced his gratitude.

Then he took leave of the emperor and returned to camp with the imperial gifts. He ordered his commanders to prepare to march.

Emperor Hui Zong the following morning directed Marshal Su to transmit his order to the Council of Administration to dispatch two officials to Chen Bridge Station and there give send-off rations to Song Jiang's departing troops. Each man was to receive a bottle of wine and a catty of meat, and not an ounce less. The chancellor worked through the night, preparing the rations, then sent two officials to distribute them.

Song Jiang, after conferring with Wu Yong, divided his army into two groups, with the five Tiger and eight Wildcat chieftains leading the infantry in the van and the ten Charger chieftains leading the cavalry bringing up the rear. He himself, together with Lu Junyi, Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng, would command the central forces. The three Ruan brothers, Li Chun, Zhang Heng and Zhang Shun, under whom would be Tong Wei, Tong Meng, Meng Kang, Wang Dingliu and the various sailor chiefs, would command the naval vessels, and sail from the Caiho River into the Yellow, and there proceed north. Song Jiang announced that the army would follow the highway from Chen Bridge Station, and instructed his chieftains to forbid any harassment of the local populace.

The two officials designated by the Council of Administration arrived at Chen Bridge Station to distribute the emperor's largesse to Song Jiang's forces. Shamelessly dishonest, they stinted for their own private gain. These bribe-taking back-biting liars gave out wine bottles that were only half full, and the catty of meat each man received weighed only ten ounces instead of sixteen.

After distributing to the forward group, the officials came to a rear unit whose troops wore black helmets and black armor. They were shield-bearers under Xiang Chong and Li Gun. Among these was a junior commander who discovered the chicanery and angrily berated the two officials.

"It's grafters like you who sabotage the emperor's benevolence!"

"What do you mean?" they cried.

"His Majesty ordered a bottle of wine and a catty of meat for each man, and you've cut them both! We don't like to quarrel, but your characters are a disgrace! You'd steal the gilt off the face of an idol of Buddha!"

"You've got a nerve! Slicing to death would be too good for you! You're still a Liangshan Marsh rebel!"

"Arrest that rascally robber!" they howled.

"Dirty bandit! Would you dare use that blade!"

"When I was on Mount Liangshan I was better than the best of your fighters! I killed thousands of them! Why would I scruple about a couple of crooks!"

"We dare you to kill us," they bawled.

The young commander stepped forward and slashed the face of one of them. He collapsed to the ground. The watchers cried out in alarm and fell back. The junior officer hacked again several more time. Clearly, the man was dying. It was too late for the troops to intervene.

Xiang Chong and Li Gun flew to inform Song Jiang. Startled, he exclaimed to Wu Yong: "What are we going to do?"

"The Chancellor of Administration doesn't like us. This thing gives him precisely the chance he's been looking for," mused Wu Yong. "All we can do is direct the execution of our officer, report the matter to the Council of Ministration, halt our march and await a disposition. Have Dai Zong and Yan Qing rush to the city and quietly notify Marshal Su. Request him to inform the emperor of the provocation. That will forestall the chancellor from twisting the facts. I guarantee nothing will come of it."

The strategy agreed upon, Song Jiang galloped to Chen Bridge Station. The junior officer was standing beside the body of the slain official. Song Jiang directed that wine and meat be taken from the hostel for officials and dispensed among the troops. Then he summoned the young officer into the hostel and questioned him.

"He kept cursing us and saying we were rebellious bandits from Liangshan Marsh, and that we all ought to be exterminated! I lost my temper and killed him. I'm waiting for your sentence, General."

"He was an official of the imperial court. I was afraid of him myself. How could you slay him? We're all sure to be implicated. Our march against the Liao Tartars had only started, we haven't yet won a bit of distinction, and you pull a stunt like this. What are we going to do?"

The young commander prostrated himself and waited for death. Song Jiang wept.

"From the time I came to Mount Liangshan I never harmed any of our brothers, big or small. But now that I'm an official I have no choice. I must obey the law. I know your aggressive spirit is still strong, but you shouldn't have given free rein to it as you did in the old days."

Song Jiang ordered the young officer to drink heavily of wine and hang himself from a tree. When this was done he had him decapitated.
The body of the official was formally encoffined, and a letter sent to the Council of Administration. Actually, the chancellor already knew all about it, but of that we'll say no more.
Dai Zong and Yan Qing hurried directly to Marshal Su's residency on entering the city and told him in detail what had happened. That evening the marshal went to the palace and informed the emperor. The following day His Majesty held court in the Hall of Culture and Virtue. When the drum boomed in the dragon tower and the bell sounded in the phoenix belfry, the seneschal rapped three times with his rod and the civil and military officials formed ranks in two groups at the foot of the stairs.
From among them the Chancellor of Administration came forward and said: "A soldier in the army of Song Jiang, who only recently surrendered to the throne, has killed an official our chancellery dispatched to distribute wine and meat. We hope Your Majesty will look into the matter."
"I entrusted your chancellery with a mission. The responsibility is yours," replied the sovereign. "Your men were untrustworthy. That was the cause. They deliberately cut the meat and wine ration. The Mount Liangshan soldier refused to be cheated, and a clash was the result."
The emperor grew angry. "I've already sent an investigator, and I know the whole story. You can't deceive me with your subtle words and evasions! You dispensed only half bottles of my gift of imperial wine, the meat you gave only ten ounces to the catty. That is what enraged the soldier and caused the bloodshed!" Then His Majesty asked: "Where is the culprit?"
"Song Jiang has decapitated him and says that his head will be displayed. He has reported the matter to the chancellery, halted his march and is waiting for a disposition."
"Let his breach of discipline be noted. We shall settle the matter according to his merits when he returns from defeating the Liaos."
Silently, the chancellor withdrew. His Majesty dispatched an emissary to urge Song Jiang to continue his expedition after displaying the head of the decapitated young officer at Chen Bridge Station.
Song Jiang expressed thanks for the emperor's benevolence, hung up the head as directed and buried the body. Heart-brokenly, he wept. Then he wiped his tears, mounted, and headed north with his army.
Every day they covered sixty //before making camp. They caused no trouble in any of the counties and prefectures through which they passed. The march was uneventful, and after a time they neared the borders of the Liao Tartars.
"The Liaos have been invading us in four columns," Song Jiang said to Wu Yong. "Should we divide up and go after them, or attack their cities and towns?"
"It's a vast territory and thinly populated. If we split up we won't be able to coordinate. Better take a few cities first, then we'll see. If we hit them hard they'll naturally call back their soldiers."
"An excellent plan," approved Song Jiang. He summoned Duan Jingzhu and said: "You know the northern roads well. I'm going to let you lead the advance. Which is the nearest prefecture?"
"Tanzhou is right ahead. It's a vital entry to Liao territory. A deep river called the Lushui winds around the prefectural city and connects with the River Weiho. You'll need warships to attack Tanzhou. Once our flotilla arrives we can assault from land and water together, and take the city."
Song Jiang dispatched Dai Zong to urge Li Jun and the other naval chieftains to hasten their armada and assemble in the Lushui.

Dongxian Bojin, the man who commanded the Tanzhou garrison, was a vice-minister of the Kingdom of Liao. Under him were four fierce generals—Aliqi, Yaor Weikang, Chu Mingyu and Cao Mingji. All were absolutely fearless. When Vice-Minister Dongxian learned that Song Jiang and his entire army had been dispatched by the Emperor of Song and was nearing his territory, he reported at once in writing to the king. He requested aid from the neighboring prefectures of Qizhou, Bazhou, Zhuozhou and Xiongzhou, and at the same time sent his soldiers to meet the enemy. Aliqi and Chu Mingyu took leave of the duke and led forth thirty thousand men.
Meanwhile, Guan Sheng the Big Halberd was advancing with the forward section of the vanguard towards Miyun County, which was part of the prefecture of Tanzhou. The county magistrate hurriedly reported this to the two Tartar generals.
"The Song emperor's army is marching this way with banners flying. They're all amnestied brigands from Liangshan Marsh under Song Jiang."
Aliqi laughed. "They're only bandits. Why worry?" He ordered his soldiers to make camp and prepare to give battle outside Miyun.
The next day, Song Jiang heard that Liao forces were approaching, and he instructed his troops to engage them. "We'll test their mettle," he said. "But we don't want any unnecessary losses."
The chieftains donned their armor and mounted. Song Jiang and Lu Junyi rode personally to the front lines to observe. Far off they could see the Tartar forces, who carried black flags and banners, advancing in dark swarms that covered the earth and obscured the sky. Arrows from the bows of both sides stopped the contending hosts a distance apart.
The black flags separated. On a magnificent prancing horse a Tartar general rode forth. He was fair complected, with red lips, golden hair and green eyes, and was tall and powerful. The banner behind him read:

ALIQI, GENERAL OF THE GREAT LIAO KINGDOM.

Song Jiang looked. "That general is not to be underestimated," he said to his chieftains.
Before the words were out of his mouth, Xu Ning the Metal Lancer rode forth, his sickle-bladed lance held athwart. Aliqi hooted at the sight of him.
"The Song Dynasty is doomed! Sending scruffy bandits as officers! What brass to invade our great nation! Only death awaits you!"
"You worthless officer, disgrace to your country, how dare you insult us!"
The armies of both sides shouted as Aliqi and Xu Ning clashed in combat. For more than thirty rounds they fought, and Xu Ning realized he could not win. He withdrew towards his own lines, pursued by the Tartar general. Hua Rong hastily notched an arrow to his bowstring. But Zhang Qin, leaning on the pommel of his saddle, had already drawn a stone from his brocaded pouch, and now he flung it at the approaching general. Like a streaking meteor, like an arrow from a bow, it struck Aliqi near the left eye and knocked him head over heels to the ground. Hua Rong, Lin Chong, Qin Ming and Suo Chao galloped forward and caught first the fine steed, then Aliqi himself.
Chu Mingyu, Aliqi's second in command, wanted to rush to his rescue, but Song Jiang's entire army charged in a murderous assault that swept the Tartars from Miyun County. It inflicted such heavy losses that the defenders fled back to Tanzhou. Song Jiang did not follow. Instead, he made camp in Miyun.
He went to see Aliqi. The stone had hit him at the end of the eyebrow, near the temple, destroying the eye. The Tartar general died in great pain.
Song Jiang ordered that he be cremated, and had Zhang Qin credited with the First Merit in the record book. Aliqi's chain armor, his decorated lance of white pear wood, his jade-embossed belt with its lion's head buckle, his dappled silver-grey steed, plus his boots, robe, bow and arrows, were all given to Zhang Qin. That day the expeditionary force celebrated the victory with a feast in Miyun. Of that no more need be said.
The next day Song Jiang broke camp and ordered his army to march directly on Tanzhou. When Vice-Minister Dongxian was informed that they were advancing, and learned that they had killed one of his generals, he closed the gates and directed his troops to remain inside the city. Then he heard that a naval armada had also reached the walls, and went with his generals to look from the ramparts. He saw Song Jiang's chieftains, waving banners and brandishing weapons, shouting challenges as they stood in bold array.
"No wonder our young Aliqi was defeated," said the vice-minister.
"Who says he was defeated?" Chu Mingyu protested. "He was vanquishing the barbarian chieftain, chasing after him when a savage dressed in green knocked him from his horse with a stone. It took four barbarians with lances to capture him. Our side was caught unawares. That's why we lost."
"What does the stone-throwing savage look like?"
Someone pointed Zhang Qin out. "See that fellow with the black pouch, wearing our young general's clothes and armor and riding his steed? That's the one."
Dongxian leaned over the ramparts for a closer look. But Zhang Qin had seen him first. Galloping forward, he winged a stone. It grazed Dongxian's ear, scraping off a bit of skin. His retinue shouted in alarm.
"The savage has a formidable skill," muttered the vice-minister, nursing his painful ear. He came down from the wall and wrote a report to the Liao Tartar king. He also notified all the prefectures along the border to be on their guard.
For four or five days Song Jiang's army attacked, to no avail. They retired to Miyun and made camp. While Song Jiang was conferring in headquarters, Dai Zong came and reported that the naval chieftains had arrived at the Lushui River on ships of war. Song Jiang sent Dai Zong to summon them to headquarters. Before long, Li Jun and the others appeared.
"This is not like battling in the marsh," Song Jiang reminded him. "Find out first where the water is deep and where it is shallow, then advance. The Lushui current is swift. If anything goes wrong, we won't be able to save you. Proceed carefully. Keep your men concealed. Pretend you're delivering grain to Tanzhou. I want you chieftains to carry hidden weapons and stay under cover. Have only four or five men plying the oars and two on shore pulling the two ropes on each vessel. Move slowly towards the city and moor the boats on either shore outside and wait for our land forces. When the Tanzhou authorities see you they're sure to open the river gate to get the grain quickly. At that moment all of you burst out and capture the gate. You'll earn great distinction."
Li Jun and the naval chieftains acknowledged the order and departed. A junior officer entered and reported.
"A huge army is tearing in this direction from the northwest. They're carrying black flags. There are over ten thousand of them, and they're moving towards Tanzhou."
"They must be reinforcements from the king of the Liaos," said Wu Yong. "Let's send out a few chieftains to block and scatter them. We don't want them to stiffen the courage of the troops in the city."
Song Jiang mobilized Zhang Qin, Dong Ping, Guan Sheng and Lin Chong, with a dozen or so small chieftains and five thousand troops, and dispatched them at flying speed to meet the foe.
When the king of the Liao Tartars heard that the gallant Song Jiang of Liangshan Marsh had cut through with his army directly to Tanzhou and had surrounded the city, he ordered two of his nephews to lead a relief expedition. One was called Yelu Guozhen, the other Yelu Guobao. Both were Liao generals, both were royal nephews, and both were immeasurably brave. At the head of ten thousand men, they were rushing to support Tanzhou. As they drew near, they were met by the Song forces. The two sides spread out in battle positions, and the two Tartar generals rode forward.
They were brothers. They were dressed the same, and they carried the same lances. From Song Jiang's ranks, General Two Spears Dong Ping cantered to the fore. He shouted to them in a powerful voice. "Where do you hail from, barbarian officers?" This infuriated Guozhen. "You marsh bandits invade out great kingdom, and you have the nerve to ask where we hail from!"
Dong Ping said no more, but galloped directly towards Yelu Guozhen with spears at the ready. The young Tartar was hot-tempered and unyielding. He lowered his metal lance and charged. The two horses met, the three points whirled. In the cloud of dust, in that murderous frenzy, the wielder of the two spears displayed exceptional skill, the manipulator of the metal lance showed miraculous ability. Fifty rounds they fought, with neither emerging the victor.
Guobao feared his older brother was tiring. He beat the headquarters' gong, signalling a call to withdraw. Guozhen was more than willing. The struggle was getting too hot for him. But Dong Ping locked him between the two spears and wouldn't let him go. Because Guozhen's mind was racing, his hands faltered. Dong Ping with his right arm swept aside the heavy green lance, with his left spear he stabbed into the base of his opponent's throat. Poor Guozhen's golden crown fell from his head, his feet turned skyward, and he tumbled from his saddle to the ground.
With levelled lance, Guobao galloped to the rescue. To Zhang Qin the Featherless Arrow this was too good an opportunity to miss. Socketing his pearwood lance, he drew a stone from his embroidered pouch. He clapped his steed and raced into the field of combat.
Quicker than it takes to say, when the two flying horses were about a hundred feet apart, and while the young Tartar was heedless of all but the coming clash, Zhang Qin drew back his arm and threw. "Take that!" he cried. The stone struck Guobao full in the face, and sent him somersaulting from his saddle.
Guan Sheng, Lin Chong and their troops swarmed forward. The Liao soldiers, leaderless, scattered in panic. Those of the ten thousand who escaped being slaughtered fled wildly. The fully caparisoned mounts of the royal nephews were captured, as were their golden standards. Guozhen and Guobao were Stripped of their jewelled crowns and robes and armor, and their heads were cut off.
Over a thousand battle chargers had been taken. These were driven to Miyun and presented to Song Jiang. Delighted, he rewarded his troops, and credited Dong Ping and Zhang Qin with the Second Merits. He would send a written report of the victory to the emperor after the capture of Tanzhou.
That night Song Jiang and Wu Yong worked out their strategy. Lin Chong and Guan Sheng were to lead a detachment of cavalry and assault Tanzhou from the northwest, Huyan Zhuo and Dong Ping would move with their horsemen from the northeast, Lu Junyi would attack from the southwest.
"I and our central forces will advance from the southeast. At the sound of our cannon, all strike together," said Song Jiang.
He directed Ling Zhen the Heaven-Shaking Thunder, Black Whirlwind Li Kui, Fan Rui the Demon King Who Roils the World, and Bao Xu the God of Death, together with shield officers Xiang Chong and Li Gun and over a thousand shield-twirling soldiers, to proceed to the foot of the city walls, and from there fire the signal cannons when the time came.
Meanwhile, Dongxian the vice-minister waited in Tanzhou for his relief. Remnants of the defeated army of the royal nephews straggled into the city and told him what had occurred.
"Prince Yelu Guozhen was killed by a man wielding two spears. Yelu Guobao was knocked from his horse with a stone thrown by a fellow in a green turban and then seized and slain."
The vice-minister stamped his foot in exasperation. "That savage again! He's caused the death of two royal nephews! How am I ever going to face the king! When I catch that green turbaned lout I'll pound him to bits."
That evening a scout reported: "Six or seven hundred grain boats have moored along both banks of the Lushui, and an army is approaching in the distance."
"Those barbarians don't know our waterways and have sailed their grain boats here by mistake," said the vice-minister. "Their army's surely after the grain." He summoned Chu Mingyu, Cao Mingji, and Yaor Weikang and gave the 3 generals his instructions: "Song Jiang and his barbarians have sent another large force against us. There're also a number of their grain boats in our river. Yaor Weikang, go out against the raiders with a thousand troops. Chu Mingyu and Cao Mingji, open the water gate and bring those vessels in here, fast. Even if we get two out of three, that will be fine. You'll earn great distinction." At dusk that evening, Song Jiang's left flank infantry force, under Black Whirlwind and Fan Rui, advanced towards Tanzhou and began reviling the Tartars. Yaor Weikang, who had been ordered to go out against them by the duke, opened the city gate and lowered the drawbridge. But Black Whirlwind, Fan Rui, Bao Xu, Xiang Chong and Li Gun, with their thousand infantry, all fierce sword and shield men, dashed up and occupied the other end of the bridge, bottling the Tartars inside. Ling Zhen had set up his cannon, and was waiting only for the time to fire them. Arrows were whizzing down from atop the city walls, but the shield bearers gave him protection.
Bao Xu and the thousand men were yelling in the background. They sounded more like ten thousand from the noise they made. When his soldiers couldn't get out of Tanzhou, the vice-minister grew frantic. He hastily ordered Chu Mingyu and Cao Mingji to open the water gate and seize the boats. Song Jiang's navel chieftains were lying motionless in the holds. As soon as the water gate opened, they pried up the deck boards and converted the craft into vessels of war. On learning this, Ling Zhen fired a Blazing Wind cannon. The boats moored along either shore sailed forward to engage the enemy craft. From the left came Li Jun, Zhang Heng and Zhang Shun, rapidly plying their oars. From the right, the three Ruan brothers in their warships bore murderously down on the enemy boats. Chu Mingyu and Cao Mingji realized they had fallen into an ambush. Hurriedly, they tried to beat a retreat. But it was too late. The Song fighters were already boarding their craft. They could only run for shore. Song Jiang's 6 chieftains charged the water gate. They killed or drove off the defenders. The two Tartar generals fled for their lives. A torch waved atop the water gate, and Ling Zhen fired a Wagon cannon. Its projectile screamed across the sky. Continuously the bombardment mounted, scaring the duke out of his wits. Black Whirlwind, Fan Rui and Bao Xu, leading Xiang Chong, Li Gun and their shield bearers, went tearing into the city. The vice-minister and his general Yaor Weikang saw that all the gates had been taken and the Song troops were pouring in from every side. They mounted and fled Tanzhou through the North Gate. Before they had gone 2 //they were intercepted by Guan Sheng the Big Halberd and Panther Head Lin Chong. The Tartar vice-minister and general had no choice but to give battle.

Now it so happened that a Tartar prince had that year invaded and seized the frontier regions of nine provinces beyond the mountains. The enemy attacked on four fronts occupying parts of Shandong and Shanxi and plundering Henan and Hebei. Urgent requests for help had been coming in from all these districts. Such requests were channelled through the Military Council before being presented to the Emperor. The President of the Military Council, Marshal Tong Guan, conferred with Grand Preceptor Cai and Marshals Gao and Yang, and they elected to withhold these facts from His Majesty. All they did was write to the neighbouring provinces and urge them to send reinforcements. This was like trying to fill a leaking bucket.
The only person who did not know what was going on was the Emperor himself.
Recently these four faithless officials had agreed that Tong Guan should propose to the Emperor a course of action which would eliminate Song Jiang and his company. Unexpectedly someone rushed out from behind a screen in the palace. This person was none other than Grand Marshal Su, and here is what he said to the Emperor: "Your Majesty, we have just welcomed back Song Jiang and his fine body of men. The hundred and eight of them are united by the closest bonds of fellowship and there is no way they will consent to be split up; even under pain of death they have sworn never to be parted. How could we now conspire to take their lives? This is a company of men of exceptional intelligence and courage. If we bring them into the city and they become disaffected, what chance would we have then? At present the Tartars have raised an army of a hundred thousand and occupied districts of nine provinces beyond the mountains. All the local governors are begging for help; troops have been sent time and again, but they are just a drop in the ocean. The barbarian armies are huge and the forces we send never have a proper strategy. Each time it results only in loss of men and officers. All this has been concealed from Your Majesty. In my humble opinion the answer is to dispatch Song Jiang and his excellent commanders with all their forces to defend our borders and fight off the marauders. Let these heroes make their contribution and serve their country. It would be to everyone's advantage. Of course I have no power to authorize this policy. I beg Your Majesty to give the order."
The Emperor expressed himself well pleased with Marshal Su's proposal. He questioned his officials, and found all to be as he had been told. He delivered a stern rebuke to Marshal Tong and his cronies. "It is all thanks to you, you bunch of rogues, you enemies of the public good, that important affairs of state have gone awry; jealous of virtue and envious of ability, you have conspired to prevent the rise of good men, your calumny and dissembling have done great damage to our interests and you have tried to cover it all up." The Emperor personally wrote out the order appointing Song Jiang to lead the expedition against the Tartars with the Unicorn as second-in-command and promising promotion and honours to the other commanders when they had earned it. Marshal Su was told to deliver these orders himself to Song Jiang's camp and have them read out before everyone. The Emperor then withdrew and the court was dismissed.
So Marshal Su took the imperial order to Song Jiang's camp to be read out in front of the army. They hurriedly constructed an altar for the occasion and knelt to hear the Emperor's command. It was greatly to their satisfaction. Song Jiang and the rest repeated their thanks: "This is exactly what we want, to serve the country, gain glory, earn promotion and be accepted as loyal servants of the Emperor. We owe it all to Your Excellency, for working so hard on our behalf. You have been like a parent to us. But we still need to honour the spirit of our first leader Chao Gai by giving his mortal remains a final resting-place. There is also the matter of our families whom we have not yet sent home. And we have still to demolish our defences and bring away the boats. May we trouble you to ask the Emperor to grant us an extension so that we may return to the mountain to make these arrangements and prepare our equipment, our spears, swords, armour and horses, before setting off to do our utmost in the service of our country?"
Marshal Su was perfectly content with this and returned to tell the Emperor. The latter ordered a thousand catties of gold, fifty of silver and five thousand bolts of fine silk from the treasury to be awarded to the Mount Liang leaders and appointed Marshal Su to take charge and see to their delivery and distribution in the camp. Those who had families were rewarded with a grant of money to provide for their families for the rest of their days, those without families were granted a capital sum for their personal use and enjoyment. After Song Jiang had given thanks, the reward was fully distributed among them. Before returning to the court, the Marshal said to Song Jiang: "Go back to the mountain, but go quickly and return soon. When you do, send someone to inform me first. Waste no time!"
So Song Jiang called a meeting to decide who was to go back to the mountain. It was agreed that Song Jiang himself, the Professor, Taoist Gongsun, Leopard's Head, the Red-Haired Devil, Skyscraper, Door-God, the Crocodile, Iron Fan and the Ruan brothers should go with a force of around ten thousand infantry, cavalry and water-borne troops. The main army would remain encamped near the capital under the Unicorn's command.
Song Jiang and his party journeyed back uneventfully and the leaders took their seats in the Ceremonial Hall. The families were told to get their things together and be ready to leave. Pigs, sheep and cattle were slaughtered, incense lit and money and horses brought as an offering to the spirit of Chao Gai. Paper money and votive tablets were burnt. After that all the families seated in carts or on horseback set off for their various places of origin. The retainers were also sent back. Old Squire Song and his family returned to civilian life in the village in Yuncheng. The Ruan brothers were ordered to select the most usable boats; the smaller boats which were of no use to them were all handed over to local people. The locals were also told they could remove any of the buildings they wanted. The fortifications and the Ceremonial Hall were totally demolished. When all this business was com-pleted, men and horses assembled and they returned immediately to the capital.

They arrived after an uneventful journey and were received in the camp by the Unicorn and others. The Prodigy was sent to inform Marshal Su that they wanted to take their leave of the Emperor before starting on their campaign. Marshal Su duly informed His Majesty and next day took Song Jiang to the Hall of Martial Valour for an audience. The Emperor expressed his pleasure and graciously offered wine to Song Jiang. Then he was pleased to say: "Go forward fearlessly, urge your army ever onward, destroy the barbarian invaders for us and return victorious. We will prefer you to high office and all your commanders will be honoured according to their desserts. Lose no time!"

Song Jiang kowtowed and said with great frankness: "I am just a small official, Your Majesty. I committed a crime and was banished to Jiangzhou. In a drunken moment I spoke out of turn. Just as I was about to be executed I was rescued by the band from Mount Liang. I had nowhere to go so I took refuge in the Marshes where I wasted away my time. For all my crimes I merit a million deaths. You have pardoned me, Your Majesty and given me a position, your mercy is boundless! Considering all the kindness you have shown me, I can never adequately repay it. Now that I have received your commission, I shall spare no effort to serve you unto death!"

This speech won yet more rewards from the Emperor, who had the following gifts brought out: a sheaf decorated with magpies drawn in gold, a fine horse, a saddle and harness, a magnificent sword. All this he bestowed on Song Jiang. Song Jiang kowtowed and took his leave. He had the Emperor's gifts taken back to the camp and gave orders for the army to be ready to march.

Now the Emperor issued instructions to Marshal Su to tell the Secretariat to send two officials to Chenbridge Quay to distribute a bounty among Song Jiang's leading divisions: a bottle of wine and a catty of meat for every man to be drawn from government stores, each man to receive the full ration. The Secretariat worked flat out to secure the supplies and sent the two officials to supervise the handing out.

Song Jiang took command of his army and following the Professor's advice it was divided in two for the campaign. Five experienced commanders were in the lead and ten bold horsemen rode at the back. Song Jiang, the Unicorn, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun were in the centre. The water-borne contingent was led by the three Ruan brothers, the White-Water Dragon, the Pilot and White Eel, with the Tong Brothers, Flagpole and Fleetfoot under their command and a good many hands to work the boats as they sailed north on their voyage from Jizhou via the Yellow River.

Song Jiang spurred the three contingents on. As they took the road to Chenbridge Quay orders were given to the troops that they were not to molest the local people.

By this time the two petty bureaucrats sent to Chenbridge Quay by the Secretariat had started to give out the imperial gift of wine and meat. Unfortunately this shameless pair were bent on self-enrichment and held back some of the supplies for their own advantage. The ensuing trouble was entirely due to these two deceitful villains and their insatiable appetite for riches. Of every bottle of imperial wine they kept back half and from every catty of meat they subtracted six ounces. The distribution to the first division of troops passed off without incident. Then came the turn of the Black Division — this was a body of men who wore black helmets and black breastplates. They were shield-bearers, troops under the command of Winged Ghost and the Eight-Armed Ogre. Among them was a certain sergeant who on receiving his handout examined it and saw that there was only half a bottle of wine and ten ounces of meat. Pointing at the two officials, he began to abuse them: "You're a pair of greedy rogues, you've sabotaged the Emperor's gift!"

"How dare you make such accusations!" they replied.

"The Emperor granted us a bottle of wine and a catty of meat. You've pinched half of it! If we let you get away with it, you'll go from bad to worse. You're the kind who'd nick the gold leaf off the Buddha's face!"

"You rebel scum!" they shouted. "Death's too good for you! You still haven't changed your lawless Mount Liang ways!"

The sergeant was furious. He hurled the wine and meat in their faces.

"Arrest that man!" they screamed.

The sergeant promptly drew one of the knives that was stuck in his shield. "You lousy rebel, what makes you think you can threaten us!" they protested.

"When I was on Mount Liang I killed a million buggers like you!" he replied. "What makes you think your thieving lives are worth anything?"

"You wouldn't dare!" they yelled.

He took a pace forward and the knife flashed through the air. It caught one of the officials full in the face and he crashed to the ground. There was an uproar and the bystanders fled. The sergeant strode forward and stabbed his victim several times, till it was obvious the man's life was at an end. The sergeant's comrades could do nothing to stop him.

Winged Ghost and the Eight-Armed Ogre reported the matter to Song Jiang. The latter was very worried. He consulted the Professor as to what they should do about it. The Professor said: "The Secretariat has no love for us. Today's business will give them just the opportunity they want. We must impose the death penalty, report it to the Secretariat and see that the sentence is carried out. Then we must send Magic Messenger and the Prodigy straightaway to the capital, in secret, to tell Marshal Su everything. We must ask him to acquaint the Emperor with our grievance so the Secretariat cannot get in a complaint against us first. I trust it will go no further."

Having decided what to do, Song Jiang rushed to Chenbridge Quay. The sergeant was waiting meekly beside the body of his victim. Song Jiang ordered the people in the rest house to take out the wine and meat and get on with distributing them amongst the armies. He summoned the sergeant before him in the rest house and asked him to give an account of what happened. The soldier said: "He kept calling us rebels, he insulted us and said death was too good for us. I lost my temper and killed him. I await your sentence, sir."

Song Jiang said: "He was an official of the court. I myself have to pay him respect. How could you go and kill him? You have implicated all of us. It was only recently that I was entrusted with this mission against the Tartars. We have not yet the least achievement to our names, and now something like this happens! How is it going to look?"

The man kowtowed and said he was willing to die. Song Jiang said with infinite sadness: "Since I arrived on Mount Liang, not one of our comrades has suffered at my hands. Now it's a matter for public justice and there's absolutely nothing I can do about it. Even if you were irresistibly provoked, we cannot tolerate the old ways now."

The soldier said: "I had better die."

Song Jiang ordered the man to be given wine till he was drunk and then to hang himself from a tree. Afterwards his head was cut off. The official's body was encoffined and a report was written out and sent to the Secretariat. And that was that.

Magic Messenger and the Prodigy slipped into the capital and went to Marshal Su's. They told him the full details of the affair. The Marshal went that evening to the palace and acquainted the Emperor with the facts. When His Majesty gave an audience in the Hall of Culture and Ethics, someone from the Secretariat submitted this complaint: "A soldier under the command of the newly reconciled leader Song Jiang has killed one of the officials sent by the Secretariat to supervise the distribution of the imperial bounty. We beg Your Majesty to order the leader's arrest."

The Emperor said: "Did I not put it in your hands? It is the responsibility of your department. You entrusted the business to unsuitable persons, that is why this disturbance has arisen. Not all of the wine and meat allotted was used. The soldiers could see that they were not getting all they were entitled to; that is the cause of the problem."

The Emperor's anger at this was awesome. "We have conducted a secret investigation," he thundered. "We are acquainted with every detail. You want to pull the wool over our eyes, with your euphemisms and your insinuations. One half of each bottle of wine was embezzled and a third of every catty of meat, that is what aroused the soldier's anger and caused blood to be shed!"

After a moment the Emperor asked: "Where is the murderer now?"

"Song Jiang himself ordered him to be beheaded to set an example," the officials told him. "It was reported to us that the sentence has been carried out."

The Emperor said: "Since he has executed the guilty soldier, Song Jiang's offence is light. For the time being let it be simply recorded and when he comes back from the campaign against the Tartars we will judge him according to his desserts."

The officials of the Secretariat had nothing to say to this and quietly withdrew. The Emperor sent to Song Jiang urging him to set off and to have the soldier's head displayed at Chenbridge Quay as a warning.

On receiving the official who bore these orders, Song Jiang expressed his gratitude and then had the soldier's head exhibited and the body buried. He was greatly upset by the affair and was still weeping when he mounted and gave the order to march northwards. They travelled twenty miles each day before making camp. They did no damage in the villages they passed through and nothing worthy of relating occurred along the way. When they were nearing Tartar territory Song Jiang conferred with the Professor. "Since the Tartars have invaded on four fronts," he asked, "should we divide our forces and engage them all, or should we attack their towns first?"

The Professor said: "It's a big area and if we divide our forces we will be spread out too thinly and it will be difficult for the various divisions to support each other. It would be better to attack several towns first and then see what happens. If we attack in force they will be bound to concentrate their troops."

Song Jiang said: "You give good advice." He summoned Yellow Dog and said: "You are familiar with the northern topography. You can lead the advance guard. What districts are we near to?"

Yellow Dog said: "In front of us is Tanzhou. It's an important strategic city of the Tartars. It can be approached by water. There's a very deep channel known as Lu Water which completely encircles the city. Lu Water connects with the Wei River, so we can attack with boats. Tell the boats to get up there fast. If we attack by land and water simultaneously, linking up with our boats, we can take Tanzhou." Song Jiang accordingly sent Magic Messenger to urge the White-Water Dragon and his commanders to make all speed and assemble the fleet in Lu Water.

So Song Jiang prepared his troops, including the waterborne force, and set a time for a joint attack by land and water to take Tanzhou by storm. Within the city of Tanzhou the general in command of the defence was Chancellor Dongxian, a vice-premier of the Tartar Kingdom of Liao. Under him were four brave commanders, named Aliqi, Yao'er Weikang, Chu Mingyu and Cao Mingji, fearless warriors each one of them. When the Chancellor heard that Song Jiang and his band were approaching, under orders from the Song emperor, he wrote to inform the King, at the same time requesting help from four neighbouring districts, and sent troops out of the city to engage the enemy. Two of the generals, Aliqi and Chu Mingyu, were ordered to take to the field.

Now Scimitar, who was leading an advance party of the vanguard, had advanced with his troops to a village called Miyun, already in the district of Tanzhou. When the Tartar governor heard the news, he hurriedly reported to the two Tartar generals: "This imperial army is marching under the banner of Song Jiang, the recently pardoned renegade from Mount Liang."

Aliqi laughed. "If it's only that miserable renegade there's nothing special about it," he said and ordered his troops to finish setting up camp. On the following day they would ride out from Miyun, to encounter Song Jiang.

Song Jiang heard next day that the Tartar army was close at hand and ordered his commanders to engage them. He wanted to test them out but he didn't want to suffer any serious losses. His generals armed and mounted. Song Jiang and the Unicorn also armed and rode out at the front of the advancing army. Far off they could see the Tartar army approaching in a great horde. Black as black, veiling the heavens and blotting out the sun, was a whole mass of waving black banners. From either side crossbow bolts flew towards the opposing ranks. Now an opening formed among the black banners of the enemy and a Tartar chieftain charged out on a huge horse. Plain to see on this chieftain's standard were the words: "Aliqi, grand warrior of Liao".

When Song Jiang saw this he said to his generals: "This commander must not be underestimated." He had hardly finished speaking when the Spearsman rode out, carrying his hooked spear athwart the saddle. He halted in front of the ranks. Aliqi saw him and shouted: "The Song dynasty is destined to be defeated! They've chosen a bunch of outlaws for their generals, and now they dare to come here and oppose a mighty nation, they must want to die!"

Spearsman shouted back: "You're just a petty chieftain from a rotten little princedom! How can you dare to use such language!" The shouting match continued for a while, and then they both charged: the two horses clashed, weapons were raised. When they had fought some thirty bouts Spearsman could hold out no longer and he fled towards his own ranks. Colonel Hua hurriedly took his bow and arrows and charged after the Tartar. Hotshot also, seating himself firmly in the saddle, reached into his saddlebags and took out a stone. Carefully taking aim he threw it, hitting the Tartar general plumb in the left eye and causing him to fall headlong from his horse. Colonel Hua, Leopard's Head, Thunderclap and Hasty rushed forward in a group, grabbed the general's horse, made its rider prisoner and returned with him to their own ranks.

When the enemy second-in-command, Chu Mingyu, saw his commander fall he wanted to rush forward and rescue him, but was prevented by Song Jiang's main force, who attacked him front and rear.

Forced to abandon Miyun, the enemy suffered a rout, retiring in all haste to Tanzhou. Song Jiang did not pursue them but made camp at Miyun. Aliqi's brow was shattered and he had lost one eye; he died later of his wounds. Song Jiang ordered the body to be cremated. In the official record it was noted that Hotshot had achieved the first success of the campaign. Aliqi's chain mail, spear of seasoned wood, his Tartar belt with the jewel-encrusted lion's head, his dappled grey mount, his boots, robe, bow and arrows were all given to Hotshot. Everyone celebrated that day in Miyun, with wine and feasting. Of this no more.

Next day Song Jiang issued the orders in his tent: setting out from Miyun they were to attack Tanzhou. When Chancellor Dongxian, governor of Tanzhou, heard that one of his generals had been killed, he barred the city gates and refused to come out. He also heard that there were some boats in the vicinity, so he took all his commanders up onto the battlements to see what was going on. Below him he saw Song Jiang's whole army, all those intrepid commanders lined up amid waving banners and deafening shouts, ready and eager to do battle, and he said: "Is it any wonder, then, that Aliqi was defeated?"

The second-in-command Chu Mingyu said: "Who says that lot defeated him? They were beaten first. Our commander was chasing them when one of them, a savage in green, threw a stone that knocked him off his horse. Then four of them with spears came and seized him. I was hemmed in and I couldn't reach him, that's why they got him."

The Chancellor said: "What does he look like, this savage who threw the stone?"

One of his retinue who knew pointed him out, saying: "That fellow in the blue turban right under the walls, look. He's wearing our general's armour and riding our general's horse. He's the one."

When the Chancellor went up onto the parapet to get a better look, Hotshot spotted him. He urged his horse forward and let fly with a stone. The Chancellor's aides shouted for him to take cover. The stone flew past, grazing the Chancellor's ear. Ruefully rubbing his ear, the Chancellor said: "The savage is a serious threat!" He descended and wrote a letter to the Tartar king requesting him to tell all the neighbouring districts to be prepared.

After four days of fighting outside the city walls Song Jiang's forces had still not prevailed, so he withdrew to Miyun. He was in his tent, trying to work out a strategy for taking the city, when Magic Messenger came to report that the water-borne contingent had reached Lu Water. Song Jiang summoned the White-Water Dragon and his comrades to the camp for a meeting. When they got there, he said: "This time it's not like in the Marshes of Mount Liang. We need to investigate the strength of the current and the depth before we can attack. That Lu Water current looks pretty strong to me. If any one gets into trouble it will be difficult to rescue them. You'd better check it out thoroughly. It doesn't do to be overconfident. The best thing will be to disguise the boats and make them look like supply vessels. The leaders should conceal their weapons and remain below. Just keep three or four up on deck to steer and pull the oars and another two on the towpath. Approach the city slowly, moor the boats on both banks and wait till we launch our attack. When they learn about it in the city they will open the water gate and make a sortie to seize the supplies. That'll be your chance to get control of the water gate. It will be a major contribution."

When the boat captains had left with their orders, a look-out came in and reported: "There's a body of troops heading this way. They've all got black embroidered banners, there's more than ten thousand of them, and they're heading for Tanzhou."

The Professor said: "They must be Tartar reinforcements. We'll send some leaders to cut them off and scatter them. We don't want them to raise morale in the city." Song Jiang sent out Hotshot, Twin Spears, Scimitar and Leopard's Head with a few dozen subalterns and five thousand troops.

Now when the Tartar king heard that it was Song Jiang and his band who were attacking Tanzhou and had the city under siege, he had sent two princes to relieve it. They were called Yelü Guozhen and Yelü Guobao and were two of the best generals in Liao as well as being of royal blood. They were ferocious warriors. Here they were then at the head of ten thousand Tartar troops riding to save Tanzhou. Song Jiang came to meet them.

The opposing forces lined up facing each other. The two Tartar generals rode out in front together. They were brothers and were dressed identically. Both wielded spears. As Song Jiang drew up his forces, Twin Spears rode out in front and shouted at the top of his voice: "You there, the barbarians, what are you doing here?"

Guozhen shouted back indignantly: "You bog-dwelling outlaws, you insult our great country and you even have the nerve to ask what we're doing here!"

Twin Spears wasted no more words, but made his horse curvet, then took a firm grip on his lances and charged. The Tartar princeling had a spirit of steel; he was not going to give an inch. He levelled his steel lance and attacked also. The two horses came together, the three spears became entangled. The two fought in a cloud of dust. The one with two spears had a technique which was all his own. The one with a single spear used many tricks. After fifty bouts there was still no victor. Guobao, seeing his brother had been fighting a long time, was afraid his strength might fail him and sounded the gong in the command centre. In the midst of the struggle Guozhen heard the gong and was more than willing to disengage but he was caught up in his opponent's double-spear play and simply could not break free. He began to be worried, his reflexes were slowing down. With the weapon in his right hand Twin Spears struck aside his opponent's spear of green wood and with the left hand struck a blow that bit into the base of his skull. Wretched Guozhen! His gold coronet fell off and his two legs waved a moment in the air as he plummeted from his horse.

When Guobao saw his brother fall he charged to the rescue. Hotshot saw him coming and needed no urging; resting his wooden lance, he reached inside his embroidered bag, grasped a stone, slapped his horse and flew to the front. Guobao was racing towards him and he rode to meet him head on. When the two horses were no more than a dozen yards apart and the Tartar so eager to get to grips with his adversary that he took no heed of danger, Hotshot's hand drew back and with a cry of "Pow!" he launched the stone straight at Guobao, hitting him full in the face and hurling him head over heels from his horse. Scimitar and Leopard's Head immediately pressed home the attack. Now leaderless, the Tartar troops fled in all directions.

So in a single engagement ten thousand Tartars were routed, the two commanders' horses and all their trappings seized, together with two gold shields, jewelled coronets and armour. The heads were cut off, in accordance with custom. A thousand more battle chargers were rounded up, and all this was taken to Miyun and presented to Song Jiang. Well pleased, Song Jiang rewarded the three commanders, and it was noted in the record that this second achievement was by Hotshot and Twin Spears, a fact which would be reported to the Emperor once Tanzhou had been taken.

Song Jiang and the Professor conferred till evening and then wrote out the orders. Leopard's Head and Scimitar were to lead a determined attack on the city from the northwest; Twin Rods and Twin Spears to head another from the northeast; the Unicorn to approach from the southwest; they themselves would bring up the main army from the southeast. A gun would be fired as a signal for everyone to attack at once. Thunderer, chief of artillery, protected by Iron Ox, Demon King, Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost with a thousand shield-bearers, was to take up a position close to the city walls where he could fire the gun. Nine o'clock was set as the time for the joint attack by land and water to begin. Every man was eager for the fight and after receiving their orders all prepared for the storming of the city.

The Chancellor had just strengthened the city's defences and was awaiting reinforcements when the remnants of the two princes' defeated armies straggled into town and told of what had happened. Of the two princes they told how the elder had been wounded by a warrior with two spears, and the younger knocked off his horse by a stone thrown by one with a blue turban and taken captive.

Trembling with apprehension, the Chancellor cursed: "That savage again! If we've lost both princes, how am I ever going to face the King? If I catch that devil with the blue turban I shall cut him into a thousand pieces!" Later a soldier reported: "There's five or six hundred cargo boats have sailed into Lu Water. They're tied up on both banks. And there's some troops approaching far away."

The Chancellor said: "The savages are not familiar with our waterways. Their supply vessels have come here by mistake. The troops on the bank must be coming to collect the supplies." He gave instructions to his three remaining commanders: "Song Jiang and his savages are moving some of their troops here, and some supply boats have just appeared in our river. Let Yao'er Weikang take a thousand men and attack them while the other two open the water gate and let the current carry the boats in. If you can get just two out of three you'll have done us good service." Little did he know! As the poem says:

The result is never exactly as planned.
Outside the city the boats now stand.
But the Chancellor hasn't understood,
He opens the gate and lets in the flood.

That evening at dusk the infantry led by Iron Ox and Demon King on the left approached the city walls and started hurling insults. The Chancellor urged Yao'er Weikang to make a sortie against them. The gates were opened and the drawbridge lowered. But then Iron Ox and Demon King, Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost with a thousand infantry, all shield-bearers with knives, sprang onto the drawbridge and there was no way the enemy troops could get out of the city. Thunderer now had his guns ready to fire and was just waiting for the right moment. He was surrounded by shield-bearers to protect him from arrows fired from the battlements and Pluto's men were behind him yelling. Although they were only a thousand, they gave the impression of ten thousand. The Chancellor seeing his own men were unable to get out of the city hurriedly called the other two to open the water gate and seize the boats. Song Jiang's water leaders were all ready and waiting in the holds of the boats but they had not made their move yet. When the water gate was opened, they gradually removed all the planking from the decks and the true nature of the war vessels was revealed. Thunderer got the message and let off his first shell — a wind fire shell. As the report echoed around, the war boats from both banks converged on the enemy boats. From the left bank the White-Water Dragon, Pilot and White Eel, from the right bank the three Ruan brothers. They steered their vessels in amongst the enemy. The Tartar commanders saw the enemy boats bearing down on them and did not want to face them, assuming it was a trap. They hastily tried to turn their boats around but the sailors all jumped overboard and swam to the bank. By now Song Jiang's captains had taken control of the water gate. The enemy guards on the gates either were all killed or ran away. The two commanders saved themselves as best they could. On the water gates a previously prepared fire was lit and Thunderer let off a cart box shell which shot high into the sky and exploded. The Chancellor heard the long-drawn-out echoes and the spirit nearly fled from his body. Iron Ox, Demon King and Pluto with the shield-bearer chiefs Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost rushed into the city. The Chancellor and Yao'er Weikang, seeing the gates had all been captured and Song Jiang's four armies were advancing from every side, could do no better than mount their horses and abandon the city, leaving by the north gate. In less than a mile they ran into Scimitar and Leopard's Head blocking their escape. It was indeed a case of Heaven's web spread so thickly it's hard to move a step, Earth's net stretched so high, how can one escape?

Song Jiang Attacks Qizhou City & hi s forces capture another city; The Unicorn Lu Junyi's great Battles at Green Fields in Yutian County

Vice-Minister Dongxian and Yaor Weikang had no stomach for a fight after a brief fierce encounter with Lin Chong and Guan Sheng. Desperately, they broke through at an angle and fled. Since it was Tanzhou they were after, the chieftains did not pursue but moved quickly instead into the city.

After the Song forces took Tanzhou and scattered the remaining Tartar troops, Song Jiang posted notices guaranteeing that the local population would not be harmed in the slightest. He directed that as many as possible of his war vessels should sail into the city, then rewarded his soldiers. As to the Tartar officials, those who had some prestige he kept on in their original positions. The remainder he pressured to leave the city and return to the desert. He sent a written report to the emperor on the conquest of Tanzhou, together with the valuables he had removed from the city's treasury. He wrote also to Marshal Su, requesting him to convey the news to the sovereign.

The emperor, on being informed, was delighted. He ordered that Zhao Anfu, a commissioner from the Council of Military Affairs, proceed at once to the front with twenty thousand imperial cavalry troops.

Song Jiang and his chieftains, learning of Zhao's impending arrival, travelled a long distance from the city to meet him. They then escorted him to quarters in the prefectural residence, being used temporarily as the army's high command. All the generals came to pay their respects. Zhao Anfu, a direct descendant of the imperial Zhao family, was a man of benevolence and virtue who conducted his affairs in a correct and upright manner. It was this person, recommended by Marshal Su, that the emperor had chosen to oversee the military operations.

Zhao was very pleased to find Song Jiang such an honorable man. He said: "His Majesty is well aware how dedicated you and your officers and troops are. He has deputed me to supervise. He also sends you gifts of gold and silver and bolts of satin laden on twenty-five carts. I am to report to the throne the names of those who especially distinguish themselves and petition that they be awarded official rank. I shall also report again those prefectures and shires you have already taken. All of you commanders must do your utmost and cover yourselves with glory. When you return victorious to the capital, His Majesty will surely make important use of you."

Song Jiang expressed thanks and said: "Can I trouble Your Excellency to take over control of Tanzhou? I propose to divide my forces and attack the other major prefectures of the Kingdom of Liao, so that the enemy won't be able to coordinate."

He distributed the gifts among his officers, then called back all his troops and directed that they wait for orders regarding the forthcoming attack on the Tartar cites.

"Qizhou isn't far ahead," said Yang Xiong. "Beyond that is a vast area rich in money and grain, rice and wheat. It's truly the Liao treasury. Conquer Qizhou and you can get the rest."

Meanwhile, Vice-Minister Dongxian and Yaor Weikang, heading east, ran into Chu Mingyu and Cao Mingji and the remnants of their defeated army. Like a dog whose master has just died, like a fish which has escaped the net, they were scurrying along. All joined forces and hastened to the prefectural city of Qizhou. There they were received by Prince Yelu Dezhong, younger brother of the king. They told him of the large and mighty army commanded by Song Jiang, and of the remarkable barbarian stone thrower who flung his missiles with devastating accuracy and never missed. It was he who had killed the two royal nephews and General Aliqi.

"In that case you must help me destroy him," said the prince.

Before the words were out of his mouth a roving scout entered and reported: "Song Jiang has divided his army into two columns and is attacking our prefecture. One column is advancing on Pinggu County, the other is moving against Yutian County."

"Lead your troops to Pinggu," the prince said to the vice-minister, "but don't engage the foe. I'll wipe out the barbarians at Yutian with my army, then slip around and come at the ones near Yutian from the rear. They won't be able to get away."

He also notified the prefectures of Bazhou and Youzhou to send reinforcements immediately. He set out with a large army, accompanied by his four sons. They flew towards the beleaguered Yutian.

Commanding a column of thirty thousand men each, Song Jiang and Lu Junyi were advancing on the target county seats. When he neared Pinggu Song Jiang found the approaches firmly held. He did not venture to push on, but encamped west of the town.

Lu Junyi, with his force of thirty thousand strong, was soon within sight of the Tartar foe at Yutian. He conferred with his general Zhu Wu.

"I don't know this border area," he said. "I'm not familiar with the terrain. How should we go about it?"

"In my humble opinion being strangers to these parts we should proceed cautiously. Spread our troops in a long curved-snake formation. If the enemy attacks our head, our tail can come to its aid. If our head is attacked, our tail can aid. If our middle is attacked, both head and tail can provide support. They won't be able to break any link in our circle. In that way we won't have to worry about being unfamiliar with the terrain."

"My own feeling, exactly," said Lu, very pleased. He ordered his troops to advance.

In the distance, they could see the Liao soldiers swarming towards them, like a dense dark fog, like rolling yellow sand dunes. Their black flags were rows of raven clouds, their fine steeds were charged with a lethal spirit. Their broad-brimmed hats of green felt were like lotus leaves stirred by the breeze in a thousand ponds, their iron helmets were ten thousand leagues of ocean seas gleaming dully neath the winter sun. Each buttoned his tunic on the left side, wore his hair down to his shoulders, and dressed in double chain mail over a thick tightly woven robe. Stalwart, dark complected men, they had green eyes and brown hair.

The Tartar cavalry were broad-shouldered, with waists of steel and legs of iron, and they rode excellent mounts. Their bows were tipped with rams' horns, their poplar arrows had been scoured with sand. Their broad tiger skin capes contrasted with their narrow saddles of incised leather. Raised in the border regions, they grew up skilled in weaponry. For generations they had been riding the most spirited horses. Their infantry marched to the blare of bronze trumpets and the throb of sheepskin drums, their cavalry played flutes and fifes as they cantered along.

Prince Dezhong arrived at Yutian and deployed his troops for battle. Zhu Wu climbed a "cloud ladder" to observe them. He came down and reported to Lu Junyi.

"The barbarians have spread out in a 'Five Tigers Backed by a Mountain' position. Nothing special," said Zhu. He went up the ladder for another look.

"What battle position is this?"

"It's called 'Leviathan into Roc.' "

"How can a 'leviathan become a roc'?"

"In our North Sea we have a fish known as the white leviathan. It can turn itself into a roc and fly ninety thousand li. This battle position at first glance appears quite small. But as soon as the fighting starts it can expand enormously. That's why it's called 'Leviathan into Roc.' "

Lu Junyi heartily approved. Then the enemy's battle drums pounded, their pennant gate opened and the prince, the king's younger brother, rode forth together with his four sons, two on each side, all dressed alike. Small mirrors fringed by black tassels dangled from the young men's shoulders, and each carried a good sword and sat a swift horse. They reined in at the edge of the battlefield in a straight line. Behind the prince in deep ranks were many officers.

"How dare you marsh bandits invade our borders!" the sons shouted.

"The two armies are face to face," said Lu to his chieftains. "Which of our heroes will be the first to do combat?"

Almost before the words were out of his mourn Guan Sheng the Big Halberd rode forward waving his big blade. The prince's son Zongyun, brandishing his sword, clapped his horse and galloped to meet him. Before they had fought five rounds, another son, Zonglin, joined in the fray.

At this, Huyan Zhuo, swinging his rods, quickly engaged him. The other two sons, Zongdian and Zonglei, raced forward, to be met by Xu Ning and Suo Chao. The four pairs clashed in a wild melee.

Featherless Arrow Zhang Qin, meanwhile, rode quietly to the edge of the field of combat. Soldiers of the Tartar force which had been defeated at Tanzhou recognized him, and hurriedly reported to the prince.

"That savage in the green robe is the stone-thrower. He's coming close on his horse, and must be up to his old tricks!"

Tianshanyong, the famous Tartar bowman, overheard this and said: "Don't worry, Your Excellency. I'll give him a taste of my skill!" Tianshanyong used a painted crossbow and feathered iron bolts one foot long and shot from the saddle. His nickname was Drop of Oil.

Now he cocked the trigger and advanced stealthily, partly concealed by two Tartar officers who rode before him. But Zhang Qin caught sight of him, drew a stone from his pouch and flung it with a yell. It whizzed past the bowman's helmet. Tianshanyong slipped behind his horse's back and fitted a bolt to his crossbow. As soon as Zhang Qin was near enough, Tianshanyong fired.

"Aiya!" cried Zhang Qin. Hastily, he attempted to dodge. But the bolt struck him in the neck and knocked him from his saddle. General Two Spears and Nine Dragons Shi Jin, followed by Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, in a desperate rush, rescued him. The arrow was extracted, but a bandage around Zhang Qin's neck couldn't stop the flow of blood. Lu directed Zou Yuan and Zou Run to take him in a cart to Tanzhou and have him treated by the physician An Daoquan. They departed on the cart. Of that we'll say no more.

Shouts again rose at the front, and a scout reported: "A cavalry detachment is racing this way from the northwest. They don't respond to hails. They're just knocking everyone aside and plunging directly into the battlefield."

With Zhang Qin hit in the neck by an arrow, Lu had not much eagerness for combat. The four chieftains pretended to be losing, and retreated to their own lines, pursued by the four Tartar princelings. Meanwhile, Liao attackers were smashing through from the northwest like an avalanche. Nothing could stop them. The Song forces, split into fragments, were unable to come to each other's aid.

Lu Junyi, alone with his one mount and single lance, fought past the enemy lines. It was dusk, and he ran into the four Tartar princelings who were just returning. Fearlessly he fought them all. Suddenly he executed a feint and Zonglin closed in, hacking with his sword. Lu froze him with a yell. Before Zonglin could recover his wits, Lu's lance stabbed him from his horse. The other three, startled and a bit frightened, rode quickly away. Lu dismounted, cut off his adversary's head and hung it on his steed's neck. Vaulting into the saddle, he proceeded south.

Encountering a unit of Liao troops, well over a thousand, he charged them so savagely they broke and ran. A few li further on, he saw another detachment. In the dark moonless night he couldn't at first tell who they were. But then he heard voices speaking in his own Song accents.

"Whose army is that?" he called.

Huyan Zhuo answered. Lu was delighted. He joined them.

"We were broken up by the Tartars, and couldn't help each other." said Huyan. "The four princelings fought here with Han Tao and Peng Qi for a time. I don't know what became of them after that."

"I killed one, and three ran away. Then I barged into over a thousand more, and scattered them. I never thought I'd meet you here."

They all headed south. After travelling only about a dozen li they saw their path blocked by another detachment.

From the opposite side a voice sang out: "Is that you, General Huyan Zhuo?"

All the chieftains dismounted and sat down on the grass to confer. Lu and Huyan told what had happened to them, after which Guan Sheng spoke.

"We lost the initiative and couldn't come to each other's aid. I and Xuan Zan, Hao Siwen, Shan Tinggui and Wei Dingguo were riding around looking for a road, and ran into a thousand of our troops. When we got here it was dark. We don't know the terrain and were afraid of falling into an ambush. We decided to wait for daybreak before travelling on. I never expected to meet you, brother."

The two units joined forces.

At dawn they wound their way south and once again reached Yutian town. They saw a body of men ahead, patrolling outside, and recognized General Two Spears Dong Ping and Metal Lancer Xu Ning. They had camped there after having been scattered by the Tartars.

"Hou Jian and Bai Sheng have gone to report to Song Jiang," they said, "but we don't know where Xie Zhen, Xie Bao, Yang Lin and Shi Yong are."

Lu ordered a count of those who had already arrived in Yutian, and found they were more than five thousand men short. He was quite disturbed. At mid-morning he was informed that the four missing chieftains had returned with over two thousand troops. Lu summoned the chieftains.

"We four managed to fight through and go deep into vital enemy territory," said Xie Zhen. "But we lost the road and didn't know which way to turn. This morning we ran into the Tartars again and killed a whole slew of them. Only then were we able to get here."

Lu ordered that the head of the princeling Zonglin be hung up on display in Yutian town, and rewarded the troops. Around dusk just as the men were preparing to rest, a young officer patrolling the roads entered and reported: "Liao soldiers are surrounding the town. We don't know how many."

Startled, Lu took Yan Qing to the top of the town wall for a look. They saw gleaming torches for a depth of ten li. A junior officer pointed out the princeling Zongyun, riding a fiery steed and supervising troop movement.

Yan Qing said: "Yesterday they hit Zhang Qin with a sneak arrow. Today we'll return the compliment."

He fitted an arrow to his bow and shot. The missile struck Zongyun on the bridge of his nose and knocked him from his saddle. His soldiers hastily rescued him. The Tartar troops retreated five li. Lu conferred with his generals in the town.

"They've pulled back a bit," he said, "but they'll surely encircle us again in the morning. We'll be closed in tighter than an iron bucket. How are we going to get out?"

"Song Jiang would rescue us if he knew," said Zhu Wu. "Striking from within and without, we could break the siege."

Truly, they had gone from the den of tigers and dragons into a snare net covering earth and sky. Was it victory or defeat which lay in store for them?

They waited until daylight and saw that the Liao contingents had surrounded them on all sides without a crack. A cloud of dust arose in the southeast as tens of thousands of soldiers marched towards them. The chieftains stared.

"It must be Song Jiang with our army," said Zhu Wu. "When he attacks south, we here will strike with our entire force!"

The opposing Tartars maintained the siege from mid-morning till mid-afternoon, but then they could withstand the flank attack no longer. They began pulling back from the perimeter of the town.

Lu directed that the four gates of the county town be opened and led his troops out in hot pursuit. They slaughtered the Tartars and scattered them like falling stars and scudding clouds. Song Jiang also chased the fleeing enemy a long distance. Only at daybreak did he sound the trumpets to regroup and enter the county town.

Both armies would march on Qizhou simultaneously, Song Jiang's column from Pinggu, and Lu's column from Yutian. Zhao Anfu and the twenty-three chieftains held Tanzhou. Of that no more need be said.

Originally Prince Yelu Dezhong the Tartar king's younger brother was defending Qizhou with the aid of his four princeling sons, a dozen generals, and over a hundred thousand troops. His chief general was called Baomisheng. The second in command was Tianshanyong.

Song Jiang's troops had campaigned several arduous days in a row. Song saw that they were weary and ordered a temporary rest. For the assault on Qizhou he already had a plan. But first he dispatched a man to Tanzhou to inquire about Zhang Qin's arrow wound.

"The injury is superficial. Tell our highest leader not to worry," was Dr. An's reply. "Once the pus is drained he'll recover quickly. But our soldiers are suffering from many ailments because of the heat. I've asked Commissioner Zhao to send Xiao Rang and Song Qing to the Eastern Capital to buy heat-stroke medicine in the Imperial Hospital. Huangfu Duan, our veterinary, wants medicine for our horses. They will attend to that, too."

Very pleased, Song Jiang consulted with Lu regarding the attack on Qizhou. "I had this plan before I knew you were surrounded at Yutian," he said. "Gongsun Sheng is a native of Qizhou, Yang Xiong used to be a bailiff in the local government, and Shi Xiu and Shi Qian both lived there for a long time. The other day when we defeated the Tartars, I instructed Shi Xiu and Shi Qian to mix with the remnants of their army and retreat with them into the town. Once they get there they'll have a place to stay.

"Shi Qian said to me: 'In Qizhou there's a big temple called the Baoyan Monastery. Its vestibule houses scriptures and precious objects. In the center of the compound is a magnificent hall, and in front of this is a fine tower that pierces the clouds.' And Shi Xiu said: 'I've told him to hide on the roof of the vestibule. I'll bring him food every day. For calls or nature he'll just have to wait till dark. As soon as you and our troops assault the town he'll set fire to the top of the tower.' Shi Qian is a veteran roof-climber and wall-sealer. He won't have any trouble concealing himself. When the time comes he'll put the prefectural government offices to the torch. They've talked it over and have already gone. I'm mobilizing our attack forces."

The next day, Song Jiang and his soldiers quit Pinggu County and joined Lu and his men. Together, they marched on Qizhou.

Meanwhile, the prince was raging over the loss of two of his sons. He conferred with his chief generals Baomisheng, Tianshanyong and the Vice-Minister Dongxian.

"Last time the relief columns from Zhuozhou and Bazhou both advanced widely spread out," he said. "But now Song Jiang has concentrated his forces at Yulian. Sooner or later he'll attack Qizhou. What are we going to do?"

"I'd have nothing against those barbarians if they hadn't invaded," said Baomisheng. "But since they have, I must fight them as enemies. I'm going out and capture a few. Otherwise, they'll never leave!"

"One of them wears a green robe and is fantastically good at throwing stones," said the vice-minister. "Be careful of him."

"I hit him in the neck with an arrow," said Tianshanyong. "He's probably dead."

"Except for that fellow," said the vice-minister, "the others don't matter."

The prince hastily mustered his troops and flew out to engage the foe. Thirty li from the town the opposing contingents met, and both deployed in battle positions. Baomisheng, his long lance held athwart, rode forth.

Before the words had left his mouth, Panther Head Lin Chong was in the field, contending with the Tartar general. They fought over thirty rounds, with neither the victor. Lin Chong wanted to be the first to distinguish himself. He closed in with his eighteen-foot lance and its snake-shaped point. Uttering a thunderous roar, he brushed aside his opponent's weapon and thrust into Baomisheng's neck. The Tartar general fell from his horse.

Song Jiang was very pleased. Both armies yelled. Tianshanyong rode forward next. From Song Jiang's ranks Xu Ning emerged to meet him, bearing a sickle-bladed lance. The two had fought less than twenty rounds when a thrust from Xu Ning brought his opponent tumbling to the ground.

Two generals vanquished in a row! Song Jiang was delighted. He waved his army into action. The Liao Tartars, frightened by the death of two top commanders, fled towards Qizhou. Song Jiang's forces pursued them a dozen //or so, then pulled back.
That night they set up camp and Song Jiang rewarded the troops. The following day they struck camp and headed for Qizhou. On the third day the prince, having lost two senior generals, grew very nervous when informed that Song Jiang's army was approaching. He hastily gave instructions to Vice-Minister Dongxian.
"Go out there and meet the foe! Take some of the pressure off us!"
The vice-minister couldn't very well refuse. He set forth with Yaor Weikang, Chu Mingyu, Cao Mingji and a thousand soldiers and deployed outside the town walls.
Song Jiang's contingents drew near and assumed a goose-wing formation. Their pennant gate opened and Suo Chao cantered forward, holding a large battle-ax. Yaor Weikang sped out from the Tartar ranks, lance in hand.
They met and fought for more than twenty rounds. The Tartar began to lose courage, and with it his taste for combat. He longed to get away. From the top of the town wall the prince saw him turn his steed and start for the Tartar position. But Suo Chao caught up, raised his big ax, and brought it down on Yaor Weikang's skull, cleaving it in two.
The vice-minister ordered Chu Mingyu and Cao Mingji to rush into the fray. They were both eight-tenths scared, but since they couldn't get out of it they advanced with their lances.
Nine Dragons Shi Jin, brandishing his sword, emerged to take on the two of them. Shi Jin was a great warrior. One sweep of his blade hacked Chu Mingyu from his saddle. Cao Mingji tried to flee, but Shi Jin caught up and, with another swing of his sword, cut him to the ground. Then he galloped directly into the Tartar position.
Song Jiang pointed with his whip, and his men rushed the drawbridge. In an ever-deepening gloom the prince ordered that all the gates be shut and every general take a stand on top of the walls. He sent a hurried report to the king, and dispatched emissaries to Bazhou and Youzhou requesting immediate assistance.
"They've locked the town up tight," Song Jiang said to Wu Yong. "What should we do?"
"We've got Shi Xiu and Shi Qian in there. They'll stay as long as necessary. Prepare scaling ladders and cannon on four sides for the attack. Have Ling Zhen launch an artillery bombardment first. If we hit them hard they're sure to crack."
"Precisely what I was thinking." Song Jiang ordered an offensive that very night.
The assault was intense. The prince directed that the entire populace man the walls. Shi Xiu, who for several days had been hiding in the Baoyan Monastery, bad been growing impatient at the lack of action. Now Shi Qian came to him excitedly.
"Brother Song Jiang is hitting the town hot and heavy. There'll never be a better time for setting those fires!"
They made their plans. Shi Qian would first put the top of the tower to the torch, then the monastery hall. "You burn the government offices," said Shi Qian. "When our forces at the South Gate see all these important places ablaze they'll strike even harder. They'll crack this town wide open!"
Both set out with powder, flint and steel, pipe length and coal, concealed on their persons. By nightfall Song Jiang's troops were assailing the town relentlessly.
The nimble Shi Qian could skim along eaves and skip over walls as easily as on level ground. He soon had the top of the tower in flames. Since it was the highest point around, the blaze could be seen plainly inside the town and out for a distance of over thirty //; like a fiery gimlet. Then Shi Qian ignited the monastery hall.
These two fires threw the town into an uproar. Among the citizenry, old and young panicked, boys cried, girls wept, and all ran for their lives. At this moment Shi Xiu climbed to the top of the government office and set it ablaze. The authorities realized the enemy had concealed agents at work. What did the populace care about defending the town walls? Nobody could stop them. They dashed off to look after their homes. Soon the monastery was also in flames. On the way out, Shi Qian had put it to the torch.
Four or five fires in less than half a watch told the prince that Song Jiang had operatives in the town. Hurriedly, he mustered some troops, took his wife and two children, loaded a cart, opened the North Gate and left.
Qizhou was in great confusion. Song Jiang urged his men to drive harder. Murderous yells rose inside the town and out. The attackers captured the South Gate. Vice-Minister Dongxian knew he couldn't hang on alone. He departed in the wake of the prince through the North Gate.
Song Jiang and his army surged into Qizhou. First, he had the fires extinguished. At daybreak, he posted notices reassuring the populace. He billeted as many of his troops as possible inside the town and issued them rewards. The achievements of Shi Qian and Shi Xiu were recorded in the distinguished conduct book for officers. Song Jiang sent a written dispatch to Zhao Anfu.
"We have taken the large prefecture of Qizhou. We would be pleased to have Your Excellency move your quarters here."
To which the commissioner wrote a reply: "I shall remain in Tanzhou temporarily, while Vanguard General Song Jiang holds Qizhou. Due to the severe summer heat, this is not a good time to shift troops. We can discuss this again when the weather is somewhat cooler."
Song Jiang then instructed Lu Junyi to encamp with his forces in Yutian County. The remainder of the army would occupy Qizhou. When the weather cooled, new orders would be given.
Meanwhile, Prince Yelu Dezhong and Vice-Minister Dongxian, together with their wives and children, fled to Youzhou. From there they went to Yanjing to report to the king. The monarch of the Liao Tartars was seated in his Golden Hall. Before him his civil and military officials stood in ranks. Court was just concluding.
The privy councellor announced: "The prince has arrived from Qizhou and awaits an audience."
The king immediately had them summoned. On entering the hall the prince and the minister prostrated themselves before the throne and wept aloud.
"Don't distress yourself, dear brother," said the king. "Whatever it is, tell me all about it."
"The Song emperor has sent an expeditionary army under Song Jiang against us. They're very strong. We can't seem to stop them. They've killed two of my sons and four Tanzhou generals. Then they rolled on and took Qizhou. We've come to Your Majesty to request death!"
"Rise, sirs," said the king. "We must talk this over. Who, after all, is this barbarian, Song Jiang? Just a bandit!"
Marshal Chu Jian the vice-premier came forward and explained. "I've heard about this fellow. Originally he was a bandit in a stronghold in Liangshan Marsh. But he never hurt good, ordinary folk, and sought always to act on Heaven's behalf. He killed only corrupt officials who harmed the people. Tong Guan and Gao Qiu led armies against him, but he completely smashed them in only five battles. No one has been able to arrest the gallant men in his band. Three times the emperor sent him offers of amnesty. Finally, he surrendered. He's been appointed vanguard general of the expeditionary force, but has not been given any official rank. The rest of his chieftains have no status either. These are the men who have been dispatched to slaughter us. I hear there are a hundred and eight of them, and each corresponds to a star in Heaven. They are formidable foes. Don't underestimate them, Your Majesty!"
"In view of what you say, what should we do?" exclaimed the king.
His elegant gown sweeping the floor, Minister Ouyang stepped forward confidently. "Long live Your Majesty," he said. "A son should be filial, a minister should be loyal. Although I am without talent, I have a small plan for driving back the Song invaders."
The king was pleased. "If you've any good suggestions, let's hear them." Ouyang was brief and as a result, Song Jiang won great distinction, his name was inscribed in history, deeds in the royal records. His forces returned from the border singing paeans of victory, beating time on their stirrups with their whips. Truly, their skill in defending their country vied with Lu Wang's, their righteous merit exceeded that of Zhang Liang.

The Tartar Chancellor saw Tanzhou was lost and he could do nothing but flee from the city, guarded by Yao'er Weikang and his men. But they ran into Leopard's Head and Scimitar, who set upon them. Having no mind to do battle, they turned aside and ran for their lives. Leopard's Head and Scimitar did not pursue them, being mainly concerned with taking the city, towards which they now sped.
Song Jiang also entered the city at the head of a huge force, which scattered the Tartar troops. He immediately published an order to allay the fears of inhabitants and enemy soldiers alike, promising that not a hair of their heads would be harmed. He ordered all the boats to be brought inside. He also rewarded the army and reinstated all the Tartar officials with Chinese names, while those without Chinese names were expelled from the city and sent back to the wilderness they had emerged from. He also wrote out a report for the court announcing the capture of Tanzhou and had all the silk, gold and other valuables from the treasury sent off to the Eastern Capital. He wrote to Marshal Su asking him to mention this to the Emperor.
When the Emperor heard, he expressed great delight. He issued an edict appointing an official from the capital, Commissioner Zhao, to lead out a force of twenty thousand palace guards and take charge of the campaign. When this news reached Song Jiang and his comrades, they rode a long way out from the city to meet the new commander-in-chief and brought him into Tanzhou to rest. He was taken to the temporary military headquarters in the governor's residence. All the leaders came to pay their respects. Commissioner Zhao was a descendant of the Zhao emperors and was known as a just and generous man, who conducted himself honourably. He had moreover been specially recommended for the job by Marshal Su. When Commissioner Zhao saw Song Jiang's humanity and virtue he was very pleased and said: "The Emperor has heard about the diligence of all your leaders and the efforts of your troops and has sent me here to direct operations. There are twenty carts of gold and silver and silk to reward you. Those who have done particularly meritorious service will be mentioned in despatches and recommended for a government salary. Your armies have already captured this provincial capital. I will bring this to the attention of the court. If you all continue to do your utmost and win success, when you withdraw and return to the capital the Emperor will see fit to advance you."
Song Jiang and his comrades expressed their thanks and said: "May it please Your Excellency to undertake the defence of Tanzhou. We will now divide our forces and set out to capture other strategic cities of the Tartars and disrupt their communica-tions." The bounty was handed out to the commanders and they were ordered back to their armies to await orders for the next action against the enemy.
At this point Morbid said: "I was previously in the Qizhou region. It's a big city, full or wealth and bursting with provisions. It's what you might call the granary of the Liao Tartars. If we take Qizhou, we've got all the rest within our grasp."
Song Jiang heard him out and then summoned the Professor for consultation.
As for the two fleeing Tartars, Chancellor Dongxian and his general Yao'er Weikang, they had continued to head east and had met up with their fellows Chu Mingyu and Cao Mingji who with some of their defeated troops were fleeing towards Qizhou. When they all reached that city they saw the King's younger brother, Prince Yelü Dechong and told him: "Song Jiang's army is vast. They've got a savage devil who throws stones and is very skilled at it, a hundred percent accurate, never misses. He's devastating. Already two princes and the commander Aliqi have been killed by his stones."
The Prince said: "In that case you'd better remain here and help me exterminate the vermin."
He had hardly finished speaking when a scout galloped in and reported: "Song Jiang's army in two divisions is marching to attack Qizhou. One division has attacked the village of Flat Combe and the other is threatening Green Fields."
"Chancellor," the Prince ordered, "position your forces outside Flat Combe but don't engage the enemy. I will first capture the savages at Green Fields and then take the other lot from behind. They'll have nowhere to run. We must also tell the two neighbouring districts to send an army each to support us."
The King, you see, had sent this prince, his younger brother, to organize the defence of Qizhou. He was assisted by his four sons: Zongyun, Zongdian, Zonglei and Zonglin and two subordinate commanders of the Qizhou garrison, Baomisheng and Tianshanyong. The Prince now ordered Baomisheng to guard Qizhou, while he led out the army and together with his four sons and Tianshanyong raced towards Green Fields.
Now when Song Jiang was marching to Flat Combe he came to a narrow defile and deeming it too dangerous to enter this, he made camp there to the west of the village. As for the Unicorn, when with his various commanders and thirty thousand troops he reached Green Fields he met the Tartar army. He consulted with the Strategist. "The problem is," he said, "I just don't know this region. I'm not familiar with the geography. What should we do?"
The Strategist replied: "In my humble opinion, if a commander does not know the lie of the land, he should not attack recklessly. You should draw up your forces in a formation like a long snake whose head touches its tail, an endless circle. If you do that you reduce the importance of not knowing the topography."
The Unicorn said: "That is just what I was thinking." When they resumed their advance, they saw the Tartar horde in the distance, swarming over the face of the earth:
The desert is covered with them, like a pervasive black fog. Flapping like vultures their black banners fill the sky; their linked cavalry strike terror to the heart. Thousands upon thousands of green woollen hats, resembling a lake full of water lily leaves stirred by the breeze; millions upon millions of iron helmets like an ocean of frozen waves under the winter sun. All wear tunics buttoned on the wrong side and hair down to their shoulders, heavy chainmail with a close mesh and tightly woven battle tunics. They are strong and tough, these barbarians, with dark faces, green eyes and brown hair. These riders thundering forward are broad of shoulder, with ribs of steel and legs of iron. Their bows are tipped with ram's horns and their arrows made of scoured poplar. They sport tiger skins and narrow embossed saddles. Born and bred beyond the frontier, they grew up knowing how to shoot; hailing from the north they are accustomed from childhood to mastering mettlesome mounts. They go into battle with bronze trumpets and deerskin drums, playing on reed whistles while they ride.
The Prince's army was already deployed at Green Fields. The Strategist climbed a platform to observe them and when he came down he reported: "The enemy forces are in the 'tiger hugs the mountain' formation. There's nothing clever about that!" Returning to the command platform he waved the signal flags, causing the Song army to wheel this way and that till they were in the desired formation. The Unicorn did not know this manoeuvre and asked what it was. "It's known as 'Leviathan changes into Roc'," the Strategist replied.
"What does that mean?" the other asked.
The Strategist explained: "In the Northern Sea there is a huge beast called Leviathan. It can change into a bird and fly three thousand miles. This formation, from far or near, makes the force appear a small one, but when it comes to fighting it expands into a big one, that's why it has this name."
The Unicorn was hugely impressed.
Among the enemy ranks the drums now began to beat. The ranks opened where the banners were and out rode the King's brother, with his four sons on either side of him. They were all dressed alike. Each had a little mirror hanging down the middle of his back, with a black tassel.
Four bright swords, four swift horses pressed to the front of the Tartar army; and behind the prince stood the serried ranks of his troops with their various commanders. The four sons now shouted out: "You there, the outlaws, how dare you violate the borders of our kingdom?"
The Unicorn turned to his men and asked: "The two armies are face to face, which hero will be first to challenge them?"
Before he finished, Scimitar, brandishing his bright blade shaped like the crescent moon, rode out. On the opposing side Zongyun swung his sword and slapped his horse and rode to meet him. Before they had fought five bouts Zonglin slapped his horse, flourished his sword and rode to join the fight. At that Twin Rods raised his two weapons and charged in. Now the other two brothers levelled their swords and urged on their horses to join battle. So Spearsman and Hasty rode to meet them, each with his own weapon. The four contending pairs coalesced into a single group and the battle raged on for some time.
As they fought, Hotshot quietly slipped out from the government ranks. One of the enemy commanders, a survivor from the defeat at Tanzhou, recognized him and hurriedly informed the Prince: "That devil in the green uniform over there is the one who fights with the stones. He has ridden out in front. He is up to his old tricks."
The Prince's lieutenant, Tianshanyong, said: "Never fear, Your Highness, I will give him a taste of my crossbow." This Tianshanyong was an expert at shooting on horseback, using a black crossbow that fired winged iron bolts a foot long. He was nicknamed Spot of Oil. He cocked the crossbow and rode forward stealthily, shielded by two lieutenants who rode before him. Hotshot saw them and grasped one of his stones. He took aim at the foremost and cried "Pow!" The stone grazed the man's helmet. Tianshanyong ducking behind the other's horse quietly steadied his crossbow, fitted a bolt, waited till the enemy was close enough and fired. Hotshot cried "Aiya!" and ducked, but the arrow hit him in the throat and he fell from his horse. Twin Spears and Tattooed Dragon together with Snake and Scorpion dashed to his aid.
When the Unicorn saw Hotshot he ordered the arrow to be pulled at once. The blood could not be staunched. A cloth was tied about his neck and Snake and Scorpion carried him onto a cart. He was sent back to Tanzhou to be treated by Doctor An.
Just after the cart had left, a cry arose in the front ranks. "Enemy troops attacking from the northwest, coming on at pace, not stopping to parley. They're charging straight in and cutting our lines to pieces!"
The Unicorn, having just lost Hotshot to an arrow, was in no mood to continue the fight. His four leaders feigned defeat and withdrew. The four Tartar princes wanted to follow up their success and gave chase, while the enemy force approaching from the northwest also came in from the flank.
The Tartar horde fell on them like an avalanche. The attack was so fierce there was no opportunity for clever tactics. The commanders of the three Song divisions became separated and no one could go to the aid of anyone else. The Unicorn was forced to defend himself with his spear all on his own.
As daylight began to fade the four princes came upon the Unicorn while they were heading for home. The lone horseman, with only his spear, defended himself against four enemy captains, showing absolutely no fear. After fighting for two hours or so, the Unicorn had some advantage. He feinted and when Zonglin slashed with his sword cried out and lunged. Before his opponent could parry he had transfixed him with a single spear thrust and knocked him from his horse. This took the wind out of the other three's sails. White with fear, they lost all inclination to continue the fight and galloped off. The Unicorn dismounted, cut off the victim's head and tied it to his horse's neck. He vaulted into the saddle again and headed south. He now ran into another body of Tartar troops, around a thousand of them. He attacked and scattered them and then set off again. He had not gone more than a mile or two when he sighted more troops.
On this moonless night it was impossible to make out visually what manner of troops these were. But their voices could be heard and they spoke in the tongue of Song. "Whose men are you?" the Unicorn asked. To his great relief, it was Twin Rods who replied. They joined forces. "We were scattered by the Tartar attack and could not help each other," Twin Rods said. "I managed to break out with Victorious and the Supremo and we fought our way here. I wonder how everyone else fared?"
The Unicorn said: "I killed one of four who were attacking me: the other three got away. After that I ran into a thousand of the enemy and put them to flight. The next thing was meeting you here, to my great surprise."
The two leaders now rode on south with their retinue. They had only gone a few miles when they came upon some troops blocking their path. Twin Rods said: "It's far too dark for us to attack them. Let's wait till daylight. After that we'll sell ourselves dear!"
They were overheard by those who faced them, one of whom shouted out: "Is that General Twin Rods, by any chance?"
Twin Rods recognized Scimitar's voice and shouted: "We've got the Unicorn here!" Everyone dismounted. They all sat on the ground while the Unicorn and Twin Rods told their stories. Scimitar said: "They overwhelmed us. We could not help each other. Myself, the Son-in-Law, Hound, the Water General and the Fire General managed to get away. We rounded up a thousand or so of our troops and came on here. Since we had no idea where we were we decided to lie up until dawn. We certainly weren't expecting to see you."
They combined their forces and all waited until day dawned, before heading on south. When they reached Green Fields they saw a body of troops watching the road. It was two comrades, Twin Spears and Spearsman, who were camping there after breaking up a Tartar force. They said: "Ape and the Daytime Rat have gone off to tell Song Jiang. The only leaders missing are Snake and Scorpion, Panther and the Guv." The Unicorn ordered the troops to be formed up. A count was made of all officers and men and more than five thousand troops were found to be missing. This was distressing news indeed. At nine o'clock someone came and reported: "Snake, Scorpion and the other two are here with two thousand men."
Questioned by the Unicorn, Snake said: "We got ourselves in a bit too deep. Then we lost our way and didn't dare turn back. This morning we ran into some more of the enemy and killed a good many. Finally we made it back here."
The Unicorn ordered the head of Yelü Zonglin to be brought and had it displayed in Green Fields as an example and to encourage the troops. Around dusk when the troops wanted to sleep a scout came and reported: "We are surrounded on all sides by a Tartar army, heaven knows how many!"
Greatly alarmed, the Unicorn went up onto the battlements with the Prodigy to look. There were torches everywhere for miles around. A junior officer pointed out Yelü Zongyun on a prancing steed haranguing his troops. The Prodigy said: "Yesterday Hotshot was caught by a lucky shot of theirs, today we'll repay the compliment!" He took up a crossbow and fired a single shot which caught the enemy general full in the face and knocked him from his horse. The Tartars cried out in alarm. When Zongyun did not regain consciousness they retreated several miles.
The Unicorn now discussed their situation with his com-manders. "Although we had a lucky shot and the enemy have retreated a little, when daylight comes the siege will be renewed. We are caught in the jaws of a steel trap. How can we escape?"
The Strategist said: "When Song Jiang hears about it he's bound to come to our aid. Our combined efforts should get us out of trouble."
They waited. When dawn came they could see the Tartar army drawn up all around them without a break. Then to the southeast amid a cloud of dust thousands of horsemen appeared. Everyone's eyes turned towards the south. The Strategist said: "That must be Song Jiang's army! Wait till they've formed up and start to attack down there. Then we'll all join in."
The Tartar forces maintained their encirclement the whole morning but by the afternoon they were tired and when Song Jiang's onslaught began they were not willing to stand up against it so they regrouped and withdrew. The Strategist said: "This is the time to go and get them! What are we waiting for?"
The Unicorn gave the order to open all the town gates and his troops issued forth to pursue and harry the Tartars, who suffered a great defeat. In fact they were cut to ribbons, smashed to smithereens. Their soldiers fled in all directions and Song Jiang pursued them for miles. When it was fully light he had the bugle blown to recall his men. They entered Green Fields and joined up with the Unicorn's forces. Plans to attack Qizhou were announced.
One group of leaders was now ordered to remain and defend Tanzhou under the orders of Commissioner Zhao. The rest were divided into two armies, left and right: the left army was commanded by Song Jiang, with the Professor and forty-eight others; the Unicorn would lead the other army with thirty-seven commanders, including the Strategist. Song Jiang was to attack via Flat Combe and the Unicorn was to advance from Green Fields, while Commissioner Zhao with the twenty-three other leaders remained to defend Tanzhou. Of this no more.
Seeing that the troops had fought hard all day, Song Jiang ordered a period of rest. He had already made his plans for the attack on Qizhou. First he sent someone to Tanzhou to inquire after Hotshot's wound. The following reply came back from Doctor An: "Although there are some external lesions of skin and flesh, there is no internal damage. There is no need to worry, com-mander. When the pus is fully drained there should be no further problem. But the weather is particularly hot at the moment and many of the troops are sick. Could you ask Commissioner Zhao to send Magic Hand and Iron Fan to the capital to buy medical supplies? They should go to the health department to stock up with medicine for sunstroke. Redbeard also wants a supply of horse medicine from the government stores. Magic Hand and Iron Fan could be asked to do all these things. I hope this is possible."

Song Jiang willingly accepted this request, and held further discussions with the Unicorn about how to proceed against Qizhou. "I made this plan before I heard that you were encircled at Green Fields," he said. "Taoist Gongsun is a Qizhou man and Morbid used to be public executioner there; Madcap and the Flea both lived there a long time. When the Tartar army retreated the other day, I told the Flea and Madcap to disguise themselves as troops of the defeated army and mix with the others who would obviously take refuge in the city. Provided they managed to get inside they'll know where to hide. The Flea even had a plan. 'There's a big temple in Qizhou,' he told me. 'It's called Temple of the Jewel. It has a famous treasury. In the middle is the great hall, and in front of that there's a pagoda, that reaches up into the clouds.' Madcap said that if the Flea went and hid in the top of the pagoda, he would take him food every day. Then when our army was ready to storm the city the Flea would start a fire up there to give the signal. The Flea is an experienced cat burglar. He should know how to conceal himself. Madcap can go and start a fire in the government offices at the same time. They decided all this between them before they left. So I've been busy preparing the army here."

Next day Song Jiang led his army out of Flat Combe and joining forces with the Unicorn marched on Qizhou.

Now the Prince had lost two of his sons and could not get over his grief. He held a meeting with his leaders and Chancellor Dongxian to decide what to do. "Last time the advance of our relief columns was uncoordinated," he said. "Now Song Jiang and his armies are at Green Fields. Sooner or later they will advance and attack this city. We have to make a plan!"

General Baomisheng said: "If they would keep to themselves there wouldn't be any trouble. But now that the savages have decided to invade I shall be obliged to go out and fight them. As soon as I've captured a few of them they'll take themselves off."

The Chancellor said: "There's one of them who wears a green robe who throws stones. He's extremely dangerous, you want to watch out for him."

General Tianshanyong said: "I got him in the throat with a crossbow bolt. I reckon he's dead by now!"

The Chancellor said: "He's the only one that matters."

During their discussion it was reported that Song Jiang was attacking. The Prince hurriedly gave orders to his armies and told Baomisheng and Tianshanyong to march out of the city and encounter the enemy. They were to halt Song Jiang's advance about ten miles outside.

The two armies were drawn up for battle. Baomisheng was on horseback with a gigantic lance. Song Jiang, at the head of the opposing army, saw him and said: "Who's the first to win glory by knocking out that general and taking his flag?"

Before he'd finished, Leopard's Head was out in front engaging the Tartar general in fierce combat. They fought thirty bouts and neither had the advantage. Determined to have first honours, Leopard's Head flourished his long serpent lance. He came in close and uttering a cry like thunder he thrust with the lance, piercing the Tartar's neck and hurling him from his horse. As Song Jiang looked on delightedly a great cry went up from the armies. The other Tartar general, Tianshanyong levelled his lance and charged. On Song Jiang's side Spearsman readied his hooked spear and galloped to oppose him. The horses met and before they had fought twenty bouts a thrust of Spearman's lance unseated and killed the Tartar. Now both enemy leaders had bitten the dust and Song Jiang was doubly pleased. He threw his whole army into the attack. The Tartars were routed and fled back into Qizhou. Song Jiang pursued them a little way and then recalled his forces.

Song Jiang pitched camp and rewarded the troops. Next day they struck camp and marched on Qizhou. Having lost two of his leaders, the Prince was thoroughly disconcerted, and when it was reported that Song Jiang was attacking he hurriedly told Chancellor Dongxian: "You'd better take some troops out to oppose him and buy us some time!"

The Chancellor dared not disobey. Reluctantly he led out Yao'er Weikang, Chu Mingyu and Cao Mingji, with a thousand troops, and took up a position outside the city. Song Jiang's army slowly advanced in V formation. Hasty rode forward from the gate of pennants hefting his big axe. Yao'er Weikang rode out from the Tartar ranks. Without more ado the two warriors clashed and fought twenty bouts. Then the Tartar's nerve failed him: he had no more stomach for the fight and he fled. Hasty galloped in pursuit, whirling his axe in both hands. Aiming directly at his opponent's head he brought the axe crashing down and split his skull. The Chancellor hurriedly ordered the other two to take the field. They were already terrified but they could hardly refuse, so there was nothing for it but to take up their spears and ride forward. From Song Jiang's side the Tattooed Dragon waved his sword and slapped his horse and rode out to take them on. Eager to show his prowess, the Tattooed Dragon raised his sword arm and slashed downwards, knocking the first of them from his horse. His companion immediately tried to flee but a thrust of Tattooed Dragon's sword caught him from behind and he too fell. Tattooed Dragon gave his horse its head and galloped about among the Tartar ranks, while Song Jiang gave the signal for the rest of his troops to attack in a charge which took them right up to the drawbridge. By now utterly terrified, the Prince commanded that the gates be bolted and barred and ordered all his commanders up onto the battlements to defend the city. He informed the King and sent to the two neighbouring districts for reinforcements.

Song Jiang conferred with the Professor. "With the city barricaded against us like this, how are we going to deal with them?" he said.

"Don't forget we've got Madcap and the Flea inside," said the Professor. "It can't possibly take long. Have siege ladders put up all around and ballistas positioned for the attack. And have Thunderer launch incendiary shells from every side before we go in. If we hit them hard they're bound to break." Song Jiang gave the order for the assault on the city to begin that afternoon from all sides at once.

When the Prince heard that they were under attack on all sides from Song Jiang's army, he ordered the entire population of the city up onto the battlements to defend it. Madcap by now had spent several days hiding in the city at the Temple of the Jewel and had seen no signs of activity. Then the Flea came and told him: "The Leader is outside the city with our army; they're mounting a ferocious attack. We must start the fires, what are we waiting for?"

After conferring they agreed that the Flea would start a fire in the pagoda first and then set fire to the Buddha hall. "And you go and set fire to the government offices," said the Flea. "When our comrades outside see all these important buildings near the south gate in flames they will be encouraged in their efforts to fight their way in." Having made their plans they secreted the necessary incendiary materials — steel and flint, fuses and gunpowder — about their persons. That evening Song Jiang launched an all-out attack.

Well, the Flea was someone accustomed to flying over walls and floating on rooftops; leaping barriers and crossing city defences was no harder to him than walking on level ground. First he went to the pagoda and started a fire there. It was a tall building and when the fire broke out no one within the city or without could miss it. The conflagration was like a beacon, visible for miles. Afterwards he went to the Buddha hall to start a fire. These two fires turned the city into a flaming cauldron. Everywhere people poured out of their houses with cries of terror and fled for their lives. Madcap rushed to the government offices and started a fire in the main hall. With fires burning in three areas of the city, it now became obvious that spies had infiltrated. The people had no more thoughts of defending the city. Rather than standing firm they all rushed off to look after their families.

A little later another fire started in the temple gate. The Flea had torched it as he was leaving. The Prince, having seen all these fires break out in the space of less than an hour realised that Song Jiang must have some of his people on the inside. He hurriedly mustered some troops, collected his family, including his two remaining sons, loaded up a cart, had the north gate opened and fled. Song Jiang could see there was panic in the city and urged his troops forward to storm it. The battle raged inside and outside the city and in no time the south gate had fallen. The Chancellor, completely outnumbered, could only follow the example of his royal master and exit through the north gate.

Song Jiang led his army into Qizhou. He ordered the guns on every side to stop firing. At dawn he published an edict to reassure the people. He brought all his troops inside the city and rewarded all the commanders. Madcap and the Flea came in for a special mention in despatches and a special report was sent to Commissioner Zhao to let him know Qizhou had been taken and to invite him to make it his headquarters. The Commissioner replied: "I shall continue to reside for the time being in Tanzhou. Let General Song Jiang undertake the defence of Qizhou. Right now it is the hot season and the weather is too warm for moving troops. I will review these arrangements when the weather is cooler." Song Jiang ordered the Unicorn to go with the same commanders as before to Green Fields and camp there, while the others remained to guard Qizhou. These arrangements were to last until the weather became cooler.

The Tartar Prince and the Chancellor, after fleeing with their families to the nearby district of Youzhou, went straight to see the King in Yanjing. The King was sitting on his throne in his palace, with his officials, civil and military, drawn up in two ranks before him. He had just ended his audience, when a chamberlain entered and announced: "The royal brother has come from Qizhou and is waiting outside!"

The King immediately ordered him to be shown into the hall. The Prince and the Chancellor flung themselves down in front of the throne and set up a tremendous wailing.

"My own dear brother," the King said, "Please do not distress yourself so! Whatever it is that is troubling you, tell me all about it!"

The Prince said: "The Song emperor has sent Song Jiang with an army to attack us. Their forces are very strong, it is hard to withstand them. Two of my sons have lost their lives, in Tanzhou four generals have been killed. Their army have swept all before them. We have lost Qizhou. We come asking for death!"

The King graciously replied: "Please rise, we must discuss the situation seriously." He went on: "This leader of theirs can't be anything much, surely? Isn't he just a common bandit?"

Amongst the ranks of officials was Chief Minister Chu Jian, who now stepped forward and said: "I have heard that this Song Jiang and his gang used to be outlaws operating among the swamps and waterways around Mount Liang. But it is said that they never harmed ordinary folk and did heaven's will, killing only greedy officials and corrupt ministers, the oppressors of the people. Marshals Tong and Gao — Gao the Ball they sometimes call him — were sent to capture them with armies that got totally destroyed. No one has been able to get the better of this bunch. Three times the Emperor sent them an edict proclaiming an amnesty and finally they gave themselves up. Song Jiang was made a general, but no other official honours were conferred and the rest of them have no official status. Now they have been sent to fight us. There's supposed to be one hundred and eight of them, representing heavenly stars. They are exceedingly brave and it is essential not to underestimate them!"

The King said:" If that is what you think, what do you say we should do about it?"

Another official now stepped forward. This was Chancellor Ouyang. His scholar's robe brushing the floor and clutching the ivory tablets to his chest, he said: "Long live Your Majesty! Humbly and respectfully I would like to venture a proposal for getting rid of the Song army."

The King said: "I know you've great experience. Let us hear what you have to say." Chancellor Ouyang spoke and his words were few but to the point. What he said was to have the result that Song Jiang's name would be inscribed in the annals of history and immortalized in the imperial record.

Song Jiang at Night Crosses Yijin Pass; The Professor Wu Yong devises a way & Captures Wenan Town by a Ruse

Ouyang explained, "Song Jiang and his band are bold gallants from Liangshan Marsh. But the emperor of Song today is manipulated by Cai Jing, Tong Guan, Gao Qiu and Yang Jian. These four crooked ministers are jealous of real talent and block righteous conduct. If you're not their intimate you can't advance, if you don't give them money they don't want you. They'll never permit the Song Jiang faction to exist for long. In my humble opinion, Your Majesty should grant him high rank, bestow on him gold and silks, fine furs and horses. I'll be glad to go as your emissary and urge him to serve our great Liao kingdom. If he and his chieftains join us, Your Majesty can take the Central Plain as easily as turning over your hand! I beg you to consider!"

"What you say is quite true," mused the king. "You shall be my emissary. Take with you a hundred and eight fine saddle horses and a hundred and eight bolts of the best silk. Tell Song Jiang that he shall be a Grand General, the Supreme Commander of our Liao soldiery. As a sign of our faith in him, he shall also have a bountiful gift of gold and silver. Write down the names of the chieftains. They too shall be given official rank."

From the attending ranks Wuyan, the commander-in-chief, stepped forward and addressed the throne. "Why amnesty Song Jiang and his gang of petty bandits?" he cried. "I have under my command twenty-eight star-blest generals and eleven Heaven-guided officers. With our powerful army and bold commanders, what have we to fear? If the barbarians refuse to withdraw, I'll lead our troops personally and slaughter the lot!"

"You're a splendid warrior, a winged tiger, true," said the king. "But if we add them to our forces, your wings will be doubled. Don't try to prevent it."

After this rebuff, no one else dared speak. Wuyan was the country's leading general, versed in all eighteen branches of military art, an excellent strategist and tactician. Around thirty-five, tall and stalwart, he had a fair complexion and rosy lips, brown hair and green eyes, and was possessed of matchless courage and strength. In battle he used a long iron lance flecked with steel, and when in the thick of combat the iron slabs at his waist clanked fearsomely. Truly a formidable fighter!

On receipt of the governmental decree, Ouyang assembled the many gifts, mounted his horse and proceeded towards Qizhou where Song Jiang was resting his troops. Informed that a Liao emissary was approaching, Song didn't know whether this boded good or evil. He brought out the Books of the Mystic Maid and cast divining sticks. They fell in a pattern auguring great good fortune.

He told Wu Yong about the omen and said: "It probably means the Liao emissary will offer us an amnesty. What should we do?"

"If that is so, we can match their plan with one of our own. Accept it. Let Lu Junyi hang on to Qizhou, then take Bazhou prefecture. Once we've got Bazhou, the Liao kingdom is sure to crack. Tanzhou we already have. First become a high general of the Liao kingdom. The rest will be simple. Do the difficult things first and the easy things later. Don't let them suspect."

When Minister Ouyang arrived at the town, Song Jiang ordered that the gate be opened and the Tartar official be allowed to enter. Ouyang dismounted in front of the prefectural office and went directly to the main hall. Ceremonial greetings were exchanged. Host and guest took their seats.

"What brings you here, sir?"

"There is small matter. Could I speak to Your Excellency alone?"

"Our Liao kingdom has long known of your fame, General. Because of the vast distance between us, unfortunately we never had the opportunity to view your noble countenance. We have heard, too, that when you were in your mountain stronghold you acted always in Heaven's behalf, and that you and your brother chieftains were of one heart. Today, in the Song court evil ministers block the path of righteousness. If you dispense bribes among them you can obtain high office and important duties. If you don't, even though you do great deeds for your country, you are kept in obscurity and never rise in rank. This wicked clique holds power. They slander the upright, are jealous of ability, make no distinction between what is worthy of reward and what deserves punishment, and have sown confusion throughout the land. Bandits run wild south of the Yangzi, on both sides of the Zhejiang River and in the provinces of Shandong and Hebei. The people are so despoiled by them they can barely sustain themselves.

"Out of a desire to serve your emperor loyally, you surrendered with a hundred thousand crack troops. But you were given only the position of a mere vanguard general, and have not been elevated to official rank. Nor has any rank been granted to your brother chieftains, despite their devoted efforts to serve their country. Although you have led your army into the desert, suffered privations and performed meritorious deeds, the imperial court has bestowed no rewards. This is all due to the schemes of the wicked monsters. Only by sending whatever plunder you may acquire to Cai Jing, Tong Guan, Gao Qiu and Yang Jian can you be sure of attaining official rank and winning royal favor. Should you fail to do this, no matter how faithfully you perform and how conspicuously you distinguish yourself, when you return to the capital you will be branded a traitor.

"I have been dispatched as the emissary of the king of Great Liao to inform you of His Majesty's desire to designate you his Grand General and Supreme Commander of the Liao soldiery, and to present you with gold and silver plus a hundred and eight bolts of silk and a hundred and eight fine mounts. I am also to write down the names of all one hundred and eight of you so that official titles may be bestowed. I have no wish to cajole you, General. I am here because our king, who has long known of your virtue, has deputed me to invite you and your chieftains to accept an amnesty and submit to his rule."

Song Jiang heard him out, then replied. "What you have said, sir, is very true. Because I was born of mean estate and was just a petty functionary in Yuncheng City I had to flee after committing a crime and take temporary refuge in Liangshan Marsh. Yet the Song emperor offered me an amnesty three times, and finally pardoned my crimes. Although my position is lowly and I have not yet performed any meritorious deeds, I would like to repay the emperor for his kindness in forgiving me. The Liao king wishes to grant me high rank and present me with valuable gifts. I dare not accept. Please take them back. Since it is now the heat of summer, I have ordered my army to rest and have borrowed two of your monarch's towns to quarter them in. Let's wait until the cool of autumn. Then we can discuss this again."

"If you don't scorn them as too trivial, General, at least accept the gifts. I will come for another talk later on."

"You must realize there are a lot of eyes and ears among the hundred and eight of us. If word of this leaks out, there will be trouble."

"But power is firmly in your hands. Who would dare disobey?"

"You don't understand. The majority of my chieftains are fearless straight-forward warriors. Better let me prepare them. When we're all agreed, there'll be time enough to give you an answer."

After wining and dining Ouyang, Song Jiang saw him out of the town. The emissary mounted and left. Song Jiang told Wu Yong what had transpired.

"What shall I do?"

Wu Yong sighed, head down, but did not reply.

"Why do you sigh, Military Advisor?"

"I've been wondering. Since you place loyalty first, I'm afraid to say too much. It seems to me there's a great deal of truth in Minister Ouyang's statements. Our Song emperor, though noble and intelligent, has lost much of his power to Cai Jing, Tong Guan, Gao Qiu and Yang Jian. What's more, he trusts them. Even if we distinguish ourselves, there's no assurance we'll be elevated. After three amnesty offers you, our leader, have been given only the empty title of Vanguard General. In my humble opinion going over to the Tartars at least would be better than maintaining a fortress in Mount Liangshan. Of course it might violate your sense of loyalty."

"You're badly mistaken! Going over to the Tartars is out of the question! Even if the Song Dynasty wrongs me, I can't wrong the Song Dynasty. I may not receive any rewards, but I'll leave behind a clean name. Heaven will not forgive me if I turn traitor! We ought to be loyal and serve our country unto death."

"Since that's how you feel, brother, we can use this opportunity to take Bazhou. But we'll have to rest our soldier and horses temporarily because of the summer heat."

The two reached agreement, but they didn't tell the other chieftains. They remained in Qizhou waiting for the heat to pass.

While chatting with Gongsun Sheng the following day Song Jiang said: "I've often heard you speak of your teacher Luo the Sage as a lofty scholar of a prosperous era. That time we attacked Gaotang Prefecture, and I sent Dai Zong and Li Kui to request your aid in countering Gao Lian's magic, you mentioned that Luo the Sage's occult skill was extremely effective. Could I trouble you, brother, to take me to his temple so that I may burn incense and pray, and wash the earthly dust from my soul? Would that suit you?"

"I've been thinking about going home to see my old mother and paying my respects to my old teacher at the same time. But I saw you were busy settling down our troops, and didn't dare ask. I was going to request leave today. It never occurred to me that you would want to go, too. We can start tomorrow morning. I'll present you to my teacher and go visit my mother."

The next day Song Jiang turned over command of the army to his military advisor, and prepared famous incense, fresh fruit, gold and jewels and fine silks. Together with Hua Rong, Dai Zong, Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, Yan Shun and Ma Lin, he and Gongsun set out for Two Fairies Mountain in Jiugong County at the head of five thousand infantry.

Astride their horses, the chieftains rode deep into the mountains. Green pines mantled the slopes, and the air was cool and clear. The summer heat was left far behind. Truly, mountains of great beauty. Gongsun pointed.

"That is called 'Fish Snout Mountain.' "

Gongsun led Song Jiang to the Temple of Purple Shades where all dismounted and straightened their clothes. A junior officer carrying the incense and gifts, they proceeded to the Crane Pavilion. Taoist priests greeted Gongsun and Song Jiang respectfully.

" 'Where is my teacher?" Gongsun asked.

"For the past few days the master has been meditating in the rear," replied the priest. "He hasn't been seeing anyone and seldom comes to the temple."

With Song Jiang, Gongsun followed a hilly winding path behind the temple towards the sage's retreat. Before they had gone a //; they saw a fence of brambles. Outside it were green pines and cypress, within were pretty shrubs and flowers. In the center were three connected snow caverns. It was here that Luo the Sage read scriptures.

An acolyte, seeing them arrive, opened the gate and came out. Gongsun entered a thatched shack in front of the Crane Pavilion and kowtowed before his teacher, Luo the Sage.

"Song Jiang, my old friend from Shandong, has received an amnesty. By imperial order, he leads an army against the Liao, and has already reached Qizhou. Today, he has come specially to pay you his respects."

Luo directed that he be invited in. As Song Jiang entered, Luo came down from the dais to greet him. Song Jiang begged Luo to be seated so that he might kowtow before him.

"You are a mighty minister of our state, General," protested the Taoist, "with gold at your waist and purple in your clothes. You're on a mission for His Majesty. I'm only a poor rustic priest. How do I dare?"
But Song Jiang insisted, and Luo finally sat down. Song Jiang first placed the fine incense in the burner and lit it, then he kowtowed eight times. He summoned Hua Rong and the other chieftains, and they did the same.
Luo asked them all to be seated and instructed his acolyte to serve tea and fruit. After making a few polite inquiries about their journey, the Sage addressed himself to Song Jiang.
"You correspond to a star of Heavenly Spirit, General, you're famed throughout the Central Plain, you're surrounded by other Star Spirits, and together you act in Heaven's behalf. Recently you have submitted to the rule of the Song court, for which virtuous deed you shall be remembered for countless generations.
"My pupil Gongsun Sheng I introduced into our order personally, and he shunted off earthly interests and devoted himself to truth. Subsequently, he had no choice but to join you, since he too was a spirit descended from a star. Today you have deigned to visit me, General. I am not worthy. Please overlook my faults."
"I was just a petty functionary in Yuncheng, and had to run away to the mountains because I committed a crime. Fortunately, heroic companions came like the wind from every direction. We're of one voice, one breath, as close as bone and flesh, limbs of the same body. Only after Heaven sent a sign did we know that we were united as stars of Heavenly Spirits and Earthly Fiends.
"Three times the Song emperor granted us amnesty and forgave our crimes, and my chieftains joined me in submitting to imperial rule. I have been put in command of an expeditionary force against the Liao. Since we were passing your holy place, I thought I might take advantage of this lucky chance to offer my respects. If you could tell me what lies ahead, sir Sage, I would consider myself infinitely fortunate."
"Stay a while, General. Have a vegetarian meal with me. It's getting late. Spend the night in our crude thatched shelter and go back in the morning. What do you say?"
"I'm longing to have you unravel the mystery, Teacher. Only then will I be able to go on with peace of mind." At Song Jiang's signal, his retainers proffered the gold and jewels and silks to Luo the Sage.
"I'm an old man living quietly in a rustic retreat," said the Taoist. "I have no use for riches. A cloth gown to cover my body is good enough. I have never worn silks. As a commander of whole armies you have to spend thousands every day, General. Take back your gifts. Use them for your soldiers. I have no need for such things. I'll just keep the platters of fruit."
Song Jiang again kowtowed and begged Luo to accept, but the old man was adamant. A vegetarian meal was served. When they had finished eating, they drank tea. Luo told Gongsun to go home and see his mother.
"Come back early in the morning and accompany the general back to the city," he admonished.
That evening Luo chatted with his visitor. Song Jiang told in detail what was troubling him, and pleaded for a prophecy.
"You have a loyal heart, General, and you act in conformity with Heaven's will. God will surely protect you. Some day you will be entitled a noble. Have no doubt, after your death sacrifices will be made to your spirit in a temple. But in life your future is rather dim. It's far from perfect."
"Do you mean, Teacher, that I won't come to a good end?"
"Oh, no. You'll die in your bed, and be buried in a proper grave. It's just that in your life there are many abrasions among the smooth, more sorrows than joys. When you're at the height of your success, you should pull back a bit. Don't strive too long for wealth and rank."
"Such things have never been my desire. I want only to be together always with my brothers. If I can have that, I'll be content though I live in poverty. My sole wish is peace and happiness for all."
Luo the Sage smiled. "When the final parting comes, who of us can hope to stay!" Song Jiang bowed and begged him for a prophecy. The old Taoist directed his acolyte to bring paper and pen. Then he wrote this eight-phrase prophecy and handed it to Song Jiang:

Few are the loyal,
Rare are true friends.
Success in the Northland
Is but the moon's sickly glow.
At winter's start
The geese fly away.
When dynasties change

Song Jiang didn't understand. He bowed to the Sage and said: "Please explain, Teacher. What's the meaning of this riddle?"
"It's decree from Heaven and cannot be revealed. When the time comes, you will know. The night is dark and the hour is late. Please return to the temple, General. We'll meet again in the morning. Some years ago I received something while asleep. I want to enter that dream again so that I can return it. Forgive me, General."
Concealing the eight-phrase prophecy on his person, Song Jiang took his leave of the sage and went back to the temple. The Taoist priests conducted him to their meditation hall, and there he spent the night.
Early the next morning, he again went to call on Luo the Sage. Gongsun was already waiting in the thatched shack. Luo had a vegetarian breakfast served. When it was over, he addressed Song Jiang.
"I have a request. My pupil Gongsun's mundane pursuits are only temporary. His destiny is to follow the Way. But if he remains here now to look after me, he'll be neglecting his brothers. I'll let him go with you, General, and achieve great merit. But when you return to the capital and report your victory to the throne, I hope you will allow him to come back here. Thus he will be able first to carry on the Way and then end his mother's constant longing. I have no doubt that as a gallant warrior, General, you behave in a righteous manner. I wonder whether you would be willing to accept my suggestion?"
"Teacher's word is my command! Whether brother Gongsun remains with me is up to him. I wouldn't dare interfere."
Luo the Sage and Gongsun Sheng in a pious gesture placed their palms together before their faces. "We thank you, General," they said, "for your golden promise."
The chieftains bid farewell to Luo. He saw them to the outside of the retreat. "Look after yourself, General. May we hear soon of your being entitled!"
Song Jiang bowed and departed. The horses had been fed and groomed, and were waiting for him and his chieftains in front of the monastery. The Taoist priests saw them off to the outskirts of the temple grounds, and there bid them farewell. The Visitors led their steeds to a level halfway down the slope. Then all mounted and rode back to Qizhou.
The journey was uneventful. They dismounted in front of the municipal government office in the center of town. Li Kui the Black Whirlwind was there to greet them.
"You went to see Luo the Sage," he said. "Why didn't you take me along?"
"Luo claims you tried to kill him. He's got it in for you."
"He gave me a hard enough time!"
Everybody laughed.
Song Jiang entered the government compound, and they all went to a hall in the rear. He showed the eight-phrase prophecy to Wu Yong, but no one could decipher it.
"Brother," said Gongsun, "this is a mystic decree from Heaven. Its meaning is not intended to be clear. Put it away, it will serve you all your life. Don't try to guess. Remember what my teacher said—when the time comes, you will know."
Song Jiang acceded to Gongsun's advice. He placed the decree inside the Three Heavenly Books for safekeeping. The army remained in Qizhou for the next month or more. There were no military developments.
In the latter half of the seventh lunar month a dispatch arrived from Commissioner Zhao in Tanzhou. He said the imperial court had sent a directive urging an offensive. Song Jiang talked it over with Wu Yong. They went first to Yutian and met with Lu Junyi and the others. They held practice maneuvers, got the weapons in order, and settled deployment details. Then they returned to Qizhou, offered sacrifices to their flags, and chose an suspicious day for setting forth.
Song Jiang went out to receive him. It was Minister Ouyang. He was invited to the rear, and courtesies were exchanged.
"What brings you here, Minister?"
"I prefer to speak to you alone."
Song Jiang dismissed his orderlies.
"The King of Great Liao has exceeding admiration for your virtue, General. If you come over, he will surely be moved to give you rank and titles. But that is of relatively small import. What matters is that you join us early so that His Majesty may not be kept in suspense."
"No one else is here, I can speak freely. The last time you called, my chieftains all guessed your purpose. Half of them are not willing to submit. If I go to Youzhou Prefecture with you to visit the king. Lu Junyi, my Vice Vanguard General, is certain to pursue me with troops. And if we battle there outside the town, the old fraternal feeling among my brothers will come to nought! I must first take refuge in some city—it doesn't matter which—with some of my trusted cohorts. Then, if Lu learns what I've done, and comes after me, I can stay out of his way. If he refuses to take my advice, I can still fight him. If he doesn't know, and returns to the Eastern Capital, I'm going to have trouble anyway. But by then I will have seen the king. I'll have time enough to go forth at the head of a Great Liao army and engage the foe."
Very pleased, Ouyang said: "We're not far from Bazhou. There are only two approaches to it. One is called Yijin Pass. It's flanked by high steep cliffs, and through it runs a post road. The other is called Wenan Pass, and it also has ugly heights on either side. Beyond this is the county town. There two passes are the gateways to Bazhou from the flanks. You can, if you wish, take shelter in Bazhou. The city is ruled by Kangli Dingan, the king's brother-in-law. You can stay with him, General, and see what develops here."
"In that case, I'll send people to my home immediately to fetch my father, so that he won't be caught. You may dispatch men to me secretly, Minister, to lead the way. I'll start preparing tonight."
Song Jiang summoned Lu Junyi, Wu Yong and Zhu Wu to Qizhou, and they evolved a ruse for taking Bazhou. Lu then returned, and Wu Yong and Zhu Wu gave secret instructions to the other chieftains. With fourteen of these Song Jiang readied a force of ten thousand. Now, they had only to wait for Minister Ouyang to reappear.
Two days later Ouyang came again at a gallop. "The king of Great Liao is convinced of your good intentions," he announced to Song Jiang. "With you on our side what have we to fear of the Song army! His Majesty will also be supported by cavalry from Yuyang and infantry from Shanggu. Since you're worried about your father we're sending people to invite him to Bazhou. He and the king's brother-in-law can keep each other company."
"The chieftains who are willing to go with me are all prepared. When shall we start?"
"Tonight. Please issue your orders."
Song Jiang directed that to ensure silence every metal part of the horses' equipment be muffled and that the men march with wooden gags in their mouths. They would be leaving that very night. He entertained the emissary until dusk, then he ordered that the town's West Gate be opened.
Ouyang led the way with a few dozen horsemen. Song Jiang and a body of troops followed. When they had gone something over twenty li Song Jiang suddenly uttered a cry of dismay.
"Aiya! I arranged with Wu Yong, my military advisor, to go over to the Great Liao together. We left in such a hurry, I didn't wait for him. Let's slow down a bit, and send someone to get him."
Around midnight, the gate of Yijin Pass loomed before them. Minister Ouyang shouted a command.
"Open the gate!"
The officer in charge complied. The army marched through and continued on to Bazhou. Shortly before dawn Ouyang invited Song Jiang to enter the city. Kangli Dingan, the king's brother-in-law, was notified of their arrival. Brother of the queen, he was extremely influential. What's more, he was possessed of remarkable courage. Serving under him in the defense of Bazhou were two ministers. One was called Jinfu, the other Yeqing.
When he heard that Song Jiang had come to surrender, Dingan ordered that the army camp outside the city, and that only Vanguard General Song Jiang be allowed to enter. Ouyang led Song Jiang into the presence of the Royal Brother-in-Law. Impressed by his handsome appearance, Dingan came down from the dais to greet him. After courtesies were exchanged in the Rear Hall, Dingan invited him to be seated.
"The Royal Brother-in-Law is a tree of gold branches and jade leaves, while I am only a small officer who surrenders. How dare I accept such ceremony? How can I ever repay?"
"Your fame as conqueror of the Central Plain is known throughout the land. You have won the admiration of our Liao king. He will surely make important use of you."
"Basking in your reflected glory, Royal Brother-in-Law, I shall do my utmost to display my gratitude for His Majesty's vast beneficence." Very pleased, Dingan ordered that a feast of congratulations be laid for Song Jiang, and that cows and horses be slaughtered to feted his soldiers. A house was provided in which Song Jiang and Hua Rong and the others could stay. Only then were the troops allowed into the city. The chieftains paid their respects to the Royal Bother-in-Law and the Tartar generals, then joined Song Jiang in their special quarters.
Song Jiang sent for Ouyang and said: "Would you please notify the officials at the pass gates to let Wu Yong through when he arrives. He will live here with me. I forgot about him last night, we travelled so quickly. Wu Yong is indispensable to me in major military affairs. He's equally adept in civil matters, and he knows every aspect of strategy and tactics."
Ouyang sent word to both Yijin and Wenan: Should a scholarly looking gentleman named Wu Yong appear, let him in.
From atop the gate at Yijin Pass the official in charge saw a huge cloud of dust stretching from earth to sky. It heralded the approach of a large army. The official primed his cannons and prepared to engage the foe.
In front of the mountain a lone horseman appeared. He looked like a scholar. With him, on foot, were a monk and a pilgrim. They were followed by about a dozen villagers. All hurried towards the gate. The horseman drew rein before it and raised his voice in a shout.
"I am Song Jiang's military advisor Wu Yong. I'm trying to find him. The Song troops are hot on my heels! You must open the gate and save me!"
"That's the man, all right," thought the official. He ordered that the gate be opened to admit Wu Yong. The monk and the pilgrim promptly barged in with him. Soldiers at the entrance tried to stop them. The pilgrim was well inside by now.
"We are two men who have spurned the material world," cried the monk. "The Song troops are on our trail. Please save us!"
Soldiers attempted to push them out. The monk and pilgrim lost their tempers. "We're not monks at all," they yelled. "We're Lu Zhishen and Wu Song the Lords of Slaughter!"
The Tattooed Monk began swinging his iron staff, cracking every skull he encountered. The Pilgrim wielded his pair of swords, killing soldiers like slicing melons and cutting vegetables. The dozen "villagers" were actually all chieftains. They rushed the gate and took it over. Lu Junyi and his army then poured through the pass into Wenan County. The officials at the gate couldn't stem the tide. The entire county soon fell to the attackers.
Wu Yong galloped to the walls of Bazhou. The officials at the gate reported his arrival. Song Jiang and Minister Ouyang went to meet him and led him to the presence of the Royal Brother-in-Law.
"I was a bit late getting started," Wu Yong explained. "I hadn't expected Lu Junyi to hear about my leaving the town. He came tearing after me, and chased me as far as the pass. Now I've reached this city. I don't know what Lu did after I escaped him."
Just then a mounted comet scout entered and reported: "The Song army has captured Wenan County and is heading this way!"
The Royal Brother-in-Law mustered troops and prepared to go out and meet the foe. "You needn't do that," said Song Jiang. "Wait till Lu reaches our walls. I'll try to persuade him to come over. If he doesn't agree, there'll still be time to fight him."
Dingan the Royal Brother-in-Law and Song Jiang mounted the walls for a look. They saw the Song troops deployed in neat ranks outside the city. Lu Junyi, in helmet and armor, grasping his lance astride a spirited steed, was positioning his forces. An imposing martial figure, he reined in beneath his gate of pennants.
"Let Song Jiang, the opposer of the imperial court, come out," he shouted.
Standing in the ramparts beneath the watch tower, Song Jiang called back: "Brother, the Song court makes no distinction between what should be punished and what should be rewarded. Slanderers and intriguers hold power. I have already gone over to the king of Great Liao. Come and help me. Let's both support the king. Don't forget the many days we were together in Liangshan Marsh."
"I had a happy family and a prosperous business in the Northern Capital when you inveigled me up the mountain! Three times the Song emperor offered us amnesties. He's been more than kind to you. How could you betray him? You swarthy sawed-off incompetent! Come out and fight! We'll see who's the better man!"
Angrily, Song Jiang commanded the guards to open the gate. He directed Lin Chong, Hua Rong, Zhu Tong and Mu Hong to go forth and capture Lu Junyi. Lu restrained his officers from assisting him, and fearlessly charged directly at all four. They battled for more than twenty rounds. Then the four turned their mounts and withdrew towards the city. Lu waved his lance and swept forward with a large contingent in pursuit. Lin Chong and Hua Rong took a stand at the drawbridge over the moat. Then, feigning defeat, they retreated into Bazhou, still battling. The large Song army massed outside set up a mighty cheer.
Inside the city, Song Jiang and his forces immediately turned on the Tartars and joined in the assault. The slaughter was widespread. Many surrendered. Dingan the Royal Brother-in-Law stared, open-mouthed. He was utterly helpless. Together with his ministers, he was caught and bound.
Song Jiang led in the troops which were still outside the city and had a reunion with his chieftains in the prefectural government center. He sent for Dingan the Royal Brother-in-Law and Ministers Ouyang, Jinfu and Yeqing, invited them to be seated, and received them courteously.
"You Liaos didn't understand," he said. "You figured us all wrong. My band of gallants were never bandits racketing around in the wooded hills. Every one is a star spirit. They wouldn't betray their emperor. All we wanted was to capture Bazhou, and we took this opportunity to do so. Now that we have succeeded, you, Royal Brother-in-Law, may return to your native land. Have no fear. We have no intention of killing you. Those under you may also go back, with their families. Bazhou now belongs to our empire. Don't contend for it again. Our soldiers will be everywhere. We won't permit any interference."
Song Jiang directed all Tartar officials in the city to leave, and return with Dingan to Youzhou. He also posted proclamations reassuring the local populace, and instructed Lu Junyi to go back with half the troops and hold Qizhou. He himself remained in control of Bazhou with the other half. He sent a messenger with the news to Commissioner Zhao. Overjoyed, Zhao relayed the information in a report to the emperor.
Dingan and his three ministers, plus many officials, travelled to the Tartar capital in Yanjing. They told the king of Song Jiang's false surrender. "And as a result, the barbarians have conquered Bazhou!"
The monarch was furious. He cursed Minister Ouyang. "It's all because of your slavish intrigues, shifting everything around! You've lost us the vital city of Bazhou! How are we going to hold Yanjing!" He shouted an order: "Take him out and execute him!"
Wuyan the commander-in-chief came forward. "Don't worry, Your Majesty. There's no need for our country's king to exert himself over that rogue Song Jiang. We have a plan. Forgive Minister Ouyang. If Song Jiang finds out you had him killed, he'll laugh at us."
The monarch pardoned Ouyang, then questioned Wuyan. How could he defeat the barbarians and recapture the cities?
"I shall go with twenty-eight star-blest generals and eleven Heaven-guided officers and deploy in battle formation. We'll flatten those barbarians in a single action!"
Before the words were out of Wuyan's mouth, Commanding General Ho stepped forward and added his guarantee. "Rest assured, Your Majesty. It seems to me the old saying is correct: You don't kill a chicken with an ox-slaughtering knife. Why use our regular army for a thing like this? I have a little plan that will send all the barbarians to a grave-less death!"

"We'll be delighted to hear it, my dear Minister," said the king, very pleased. Opening his mouth and wagging his tongue, Ho detailed his shrewd plan. And as a result, Lu Junyi was lured to a place where the horses had no fodder and the soldiers no grain. The entire Song army almost perished, a band of heroes nearly ended.

Here then is what Chancellor Ouyang said: "These troops of Song Jiang's are all tough characters from the Marshes of Mount Liang. The Song Emperor is young and is controlled by Grand Preceptor Cai and Marshals Tong, Gao and Yang, four corrupt ministers, jealous of virtue and resentful of ability, who prevent the rise of good men, advance none but their own kin, and give employment only to the rich. How much longer will this be tolerated? In my humble opinion, Your Majesty should offer high honours and rich rewards, cash, silk, costly furs and well-fed horses, and I will go to them as your envoy to persuade them to come over to the service of Liao. If you can get this group on your side, the central plain is yours for the taking. Of course it is not for me to decide, but I beg your Majesty to look favourably on my suggestion."

The King said: "You are absolutely right. You shall go yourself as ambassador, and take one hundred and eight good horses, a hundred and eight rolls of brocade together with my personal order appointing Song Jiang head of national security, field marshal and commander in chief of our national forces. Present him with quantities of gold and silver as a token of good faith. Get a list of names of all the leaders so that honours can be conferred on each and every one of them."

At this point Marshal Wuyan stepped forward from the ranks of officials and petitioned the King as follows: "This bunch of outlaws of Song Jiang's — what's the point of making peace with them? I've got twenty-eight war-hardened brigadiers in my command plus eleven generals, with fearless troops and commanders like these what have we got to fear from such savages? If they do not withdraw, I shall personally lead the army against them and destroy them."

The King said: "An audacious plan indeed! You are like a tiger with wings. But let us rather add this company from Mount Liang to your numbers. It simply means you will grow two more wings. So cease your objections!"

Naturally, after the King had rebuffed Marshal Wuyan's proposal no one else had anything to say. This Wuyan was the Tartars' foremost general, he had a complete knowledge of all the eighteen branches of military art and was thoroughly experienced in strategy and tactics. He was around thirty-five years old, a tall man of impressive stature and dignified bearing. With his pale complexion and reddish beard, brown hair and green eyes, he was altogether a fine figure of a man. In battle he wielded a massive lance of solid steel. In hand to hand fighting he would reach for the sword at his belt and wield it with a mighty clanging sound. Truly one in a thousand!

We will say no more of Wuyan's objections, but tell of how Chancellor Ouyang with the Liao king's commission and a good stock of gifts, horses among them, mounted and departed for Qizhou. Song Jiang was resting his troops there when he heard that the Liao king was sending an ambassador. Not knowing if this boded well or ill for him, he got out the Mystic Lady's books and made a random selection. He came up with an extremely lucky omen. He told the Professor: "I have picked a first-rate sign. It sounds as if the Tartars want to offer us a treaty. How should we respond?"

The Professor said: "If they do, we will counter any schemes they may have with one of our own. First you must accept. Hand over the defence of Qizhou to the Unicorn and we will take Bazhou from them. Once we get Bazhou their defeat is assured. We've already got Tanzhou, and if you can win their confidence, it'll all be perfectly simple. Just make a few difficulties at the start before you accept, to prevent suspicion."

When Chancellor Ouyang reached the city Song Jiang ordered the gates to be opened to let him in. The ambassador dismounted in front of the government offices and entered the court room. The ceremonies completed, they seated him in the place of honour and Song Jiang asked: "What is the reason for this visit?"

"There is a little matter I wish to discuss with you," the ambassador replied. "But it is for your ears only. Please ask your aides to leave the room."

Song Jiang told everyone else to withdraw and led the ambassador to an inner room to talk. Chancellor Ouyang bent close to Song Jiang's ear and said: "We of Liao know all about you, General, even if so many rivers and mountains separate us that we did not hitherto have the opportunity of meeting you face to face. We have heard of your exploits at the stronghold on Mount Liang, how you do heaven's will, how you are all a united band of brothers. At present wicked ministers of the Song court are preventing the rise of virtue and only those with sufficient wealth to bribe their way in can obtain high office. Those who are too poor to hand out bribes, even if they do the state great service, remain plunged in obscurity and go unrewarded. This gang of evil counsellors abuses power through flattery and luck; they are jealous of virtue, envious of ability; rewards and punishments are not fairly allotted, disorder rules. In the provinces south of the river bandits abound and gangs of wild outlaws, while honest men suffer their depredations and cannot make a living. Now with a hundred thousand men you have pledged allegiance to the throne again and been appointed commander-in-chief of this expedition, but you have not received any real honours. And though your comrades toil on behalf of the country they are still all commoners. Following your orders you lead your troops into distant regions, suffer much hardship and gain glory for the nation, yet the court offers nothing in return. This is all a conspiracy. Any booty you may seize along the way must be presented to that gang of four corrupt ministers, otherwise you will have no hope of obtaining honours and the Emperor's favour. And if you object to this state of affairs, you will be treated as a criminal when, after doing honest service and achieving glory, you return to the court. Now I have a message for you from the King of Liao. He has sent me to present you with an order appointing you Field Marshal and Commander-in-Chief of the Liao national forces. He offers you quantities of gold and silver, one hundred and eight rolls of silk, one hundred and eight horses. He wishes to have a list of the names of the one hundred and eight leaders in order that titles may be conferred. I do not come to deceive you, General. It is because our king has long known of your virtue that he has sent me here, to ask you and all your comrades to join us."

Song Jiang replied: "All that you say is correct. It is true that I am of humble origins and only served as a minor official in Yuncheng, that I had to flee after committing a crime and made my residence temporarily in the Marshes of Mount Liang to escape from trouble. The Emperor three times issued an edict offering pardon for all crimes, although my government post was minor and I had not really done anything to deserve such benevolence. Now your king does me great honour and offers rich rewards. All the same, I cannot accept and I must ask you to leave now. I want my troops to rest, because the weather is very hot at the moment. I shall hold these two towns temporarily for the King. In the autumn, when the weather is cooler, we can consider the matter again."

Chancellor Ouyang said: "Do not reject the proposal, general. Keep the King's gifts for the time being. I will leave now, but in due course I will come and talk to you again. There is no need to rush things."

"You must know, Ambassador, that among the one hundred and eight of us there is a great deal of gossip. If word of this should get out, there would be big trouble."

"But they are all under your command, General. How would anyone dare disobey?"

"You don't understand the situation. There are many strong and unruly characters among us. Wait until I have put them in the right mood and got general agreement and when the time is right we can talk again. As you say, it's best not to hurry."

Well, Song Jiang held a banquet for the ambassador and then saw him off as he rode out of the city. Then he consulted the Professor. "This great long speech from the Tartar ambassador, what was all that about?" he asked.

"Why the sigh, Professor?" Song Jiang asked.

"I've been thinking," he said. "But in view of your insistence on honour, I'd better keep my mouth shut. Really everything the ambassador said was perfectly reasonable. Our emperor is illustrious, but the four corrupt ministers control him, he is in their hands. Even if we do achieve something later on, we won't get rewarded for it. After the three amnesties your only recompense has been the empty title of commander-in-chief of this expedition. If you want my opinion, our best policy would be to abandon Song and follow Liao. We wouldn't lose anything by it. The only problem is your obsession with honour."

"You're wrong," said Song Jiang. "If we go over to Liao, it still won't profit us. Even if the Song dynasty fails me, it is still not honourable for me to let the dynasty down. Years later even if I have not been rewarded, I still leave an honourable name. But if I abandon my principles, heaven will not forgive me. If I am allowed to serve my country with honour, death is a small price to pay!"

"Then if you're determined to stick with your honour, there is only one course for us to follow. We must take Bazhou from them. At present it's the hot season, however, and we must rest our troops for a while."

The Professor and Song Jiang made their plans, but they did not divulge them to the others. They all rested in Qizhou, waiting out the hot weather.

One day as he was chatting with Taoist Gongsun at their headquarters. Song Jiang said: "I have heard a great deal about your teacher, the Blessed Sage. They say he has attained ripe age and wisdom. Previously, because we were attacking Gaotang and wanted to overcome Gao Lian's sorcery, I secretly sent Magic Messenger and Iron Ox to find you and you said: "My teacher, the Blessed Sage, has mystic powers." May I now trouble you to take me, when you have the time, to the monastery, so that I may burn incense and worship and shake the world's dust off my feet. What do you say?"

Taoist Gongsun said: "I have indeed been wanting to return home to see my mother and to visit my teacher. But I saw that you were worried about settling the army and didn't like to speak of it before. In fact I was going to ask you now, when you surprised me by saying you want to go there. We'll set off together first thing tomorrow so we can pay our respects to my teacher and I can visit my mother."

Next day Song Jiang left the Professor temporarily in command of the army. He provided himself with incense and fresh fruit, gold, pearls and patterned silk, and took Colonel Hua, Magic Messenger, the Little Duke, the Halberdier, the Dandy and Magic Flautist with him. The eight leaders rode at the head of five thousand foot soldiers and took the road for Jiugong on Second Immortal Mountain.

After leaving Qizhou, they soon found themselves deep in the mountains. It was a country full of cool pine forests and the sound of wind in the branches. The summer's heat was absent here and the mountain scenery was magnificent. "This place is called Fish Nose Mountain," said Taoist Gongsun:

Mountain springs are everywhere, all around is the sound of rushing brooks. Dawn spreads a rosy glow over everything; the music of cascading waters fills the air. In the river gorges one can lose oneself in the contemplation of nature's beauty; blue peaks and crags parade into the distance. Before the cave scarlet flowers and green creepers trail among the clouds; in front of jade cliffs stand cinnamon trees and vines writhing upward like smoke. The green apes bring offerings of fruit and nuts; the tailed deer come with flowers in their mouths. A thousand peaks soar upward in rivalry, at evening the white cranes harken to the teaching of the immortals; ten thousand torrents vie with each other in flowing, hidden birds hold a dialogue with the soft breeze. So remote is this spot that the world's dust never settles here, in these fastnesses you'll see no fine carriages.

When they arrived at the Hall of the Purple Void everyone dismounted and arranged their dress. A soldier carried the incense and other gifts inside, leaving them at the portals of the Crane Pavilion. The Taoists from the monastery, when they saw Gongsun Sheng, rushed forward to greet him, and were introduced to Song Jiang to whom they also paid their respects. "Where is my teacher?" Taoist Gongsun asked them.

They replied: "These days he is meditating at the hermitage on the mountain. He rarely comes in here at all."

Taoist Gongsun and Song Jiang went to look for the hermitage. When they passed beyond the monastery they found a precipitous path which led them by a winding route over the mountainside. They had not gone half a mile before they came to a hedge of thorns, set in a grove of dark green pines and paler green cypresses and enclosing a jade-green lawn bejewelled with flowers. In the centre were three snow grottoes and here they found the Sage sitting very upright studying the Scriptures. When his acolyte saw there were visitors he opened the gate to receive them. Taoist Gongsun went straight to the thatched canopy over the Crane throne and made obeisance to his teacher. Then he said: "My old friend, Song Jiang of Shandong, has been pardoned by the Emperor and has been made Commander-in-Chief of the expeditionary army in a campaign aimed at breaking the might of Liao. He has come to Qizhou and wants very much to pay his respects to you. Here he is."

The Sage invited them inside.

When Song Jiang entered the Sage came down from his throne to welcome him. Three times Song Jiang begged the Sage to be seated to receive his homage, but the Sage said: "Great General, I am but a simple Taoist, a mere country bumpkin, who am I to receive homage from you?"

Song Jiang with equal determination sought to belittle himself and to pay homage. Finally the Sage was persuaded to sit while Song Jiang first took out the fresh incense and lit it in the burner. Then he prostrated himself eight times and ordered Colonel Hua and the others to do likewise. The Sage asked them all to be seated and told the acolyte to boil water for tea and serve them with fruit and nuts. He said: "General, you are a manifestation of the chief star of the Dipper, surrounded by other bright planets, come together to do heaven's will. Now you have renewed your allegiance to the Emperor your fame will shine ten thousand years undimmed!"

Song Jiang said: "I started off as just a minor clerk in Yuncheng. I fled to the mountain to escape punishment for a crime. Thanks to the help of many brave men we have found fame. We all speak with one voice and share the same aims. We are as close as bone and flesh, as indispensable to each other as arms and legs. Heaven sent us a sign to tell us that we are heavenly stars and earth stars and our coming together is destined. I received the Emperor's commission to lead a great army against Liao. When my journey brought me close to your retreat, I felt it must be ordained by fate that I was to come here and pay my respects to you. I sincerely hope, Teacher, that you will enlighten me as to the road ahead. This is what I want above all else."

The Sage said: "I am afraid, General, I have lived apart from the world for many years now, my heart is like a dead ember. I can be of little use to you. Please forgive me."

When Song Jiang persisted in his request, the Sage said: "Please sit with me a little, General. We will prepare some vegetarian food. It is getting late. Perhaps you should stay here, rough mountain refuge though it is, just for tonight. Tomorrow morning you can ride back. What do you think?"

Song Jiang said: "I still have not had the benefit of your advice, to spread light on my confusion, how could I leave yet?" He ordered his followers to bring in the gold and valuables and the patterned silk and present them to the Sage. The latter said: "I live here in the wilds, leading a frugal existence, even if I did accept these gifts I could have no use for them. I need only a simple cloth to cover my nakedness, I don't wear rich brocades and silks. Whereas you, General, are in charge of many thousands, you have to pay your troops, you must have many expenses. I beg you therefore to take these gifts back."

Song Jiang kowtowed again and pleaded with him to accept, but the Sage was adamant. The vegetarian food was now brought. They ate and drank tea afterwards. The Sage sent Taoist Gongsun off home to see his mother. He was to return next morning and go back to the city with them. Song Jiang stayed on and sat talking with the Sage. He opened his heart to the old man and requested his advice. The Sage said: "General, a loyal heart, in harmony with heaven and earth, will always find favour with the gods. He who serves his feudal lord in life, and after death provides food for the monks, will feel no anxiety. The only problem you have is that the line of your fate is flawed, not everything will go smoothly."

Song Jiang said: "Is it true then, Master, that I am not going to die peacefully?"

"Not at all," said the Sage. "At your death you will lie in state. After death you will return to the grave. A fate that is flawed means that in life there will always be troubles: worries will be many, pleasures few. When your reputation is at its greatest, you should draw back. Do not become too attached to fame and riches."

Song Jiang again said: "Teacher, I have no desire for riches. But I would like my comrades not to be separated, even if they have led humble lives. That is what would give me most pleasure. I want them to be happy."

The Sage smiled and said: "When you reach the great frontier how'd anything be held against you lot?" Song Jiang prostrated himself again and asked the Sage for a mantra. The Sage told his acolyte to bring paper and brush and wrote out an eight verse mantra for Song Jiang's benefit. Here it is:

True hearts are few,
Honesty rare;
Glory is transient
As the moon's wan light.
Winter sets in,
The wild geese take wing;
One state succeeds another,
Old honours surcease.

When Song Jiang had read it through he did not understand it and begged for an explanation: "Teacher, please give me your analysis for my guidance."

The Sage said: "This is heaven's secret decree. It cannot be disclosed. Later, when the time comes, you will understand it by yourself. But now it is late, the night is advanced. Go back to sleep in the monastery, and tomorrow we will talk again. Some time ago I had a dream. I wish to return to it. Please excuse me."

Song Jiang put away the mantra, bade the Sage goodnight, and went back to the monastery to sleep. The Taoists showed him to his room in the abbot's quarters.

When he went next morning at dawn to see the Sage, he found Taoist Gongsun was already there. The Sage had vegetarian food brought for them. When they had eaten he said to Song Jiang: "General, there is just one thing I would like to ask you if I may. This disciple of mine, Gongsun Sheng, originally left the world to follow me here on the mountain. He withdrew from the cares of the world, as is only right and proper. But because he happens to be one of the heavenly stars he has been obliged to absent himself. Our worldly state is brief and the way is long. If he were to stay here now to serve me, he would forfeit your love. But if he goes with you now to perform deeds of glory, if you are victorious and return to the capital and then decide to part, I trust you will send him back to me. Firstly it will mean I have a disciple again, and secondly his old mother will not be left waiting in vain. You are an honourable man so I know you will behave honourably. Is all this acceptable to you?"

Song Jiang said: "How could I possibly neglect your wishes? Besides, Taoist Gongsun and I are brothers. Go or stay, of course it is up to him, how could I stand in the way?"

The Sage and Gongsun bowed their heads and said: "Thank you for this promise."

They all now took their leave of the Sage, who accompanied them some way down the path before they parted. His last words were: "May good fortune go with you, General, and may you receive great honours." Song Jiang prostrated himself. The monks escorted them till they were outside the temple bounds. There they all mounted and rode back to Qizhou.

The journey was uneventful. When they reached the city they dismounted in front of the government offices. Iron Ox met them and said: "You've been back to see the Sage. Why didn't you take me along?"

Magic Messenger said: "The Sage said you tried to kill him! You are definitely not in his good books!"

"And look what he did to me!" said Iron Ox. Everyone laughed, remembering Iron Ox's embarrassment.

They all followed Song Jiang inside. He took out the Sage's mantra and handed it to the Professor to study. The Professor could not explain it, nor could the others who all examined it in turn. Taoist Gongsun said: "Brother, this is to do with heaven's secret plan. It cannot be elucidated. It has been given to you to keep with you all your life, but there's no point in asking yourself what it means. The meaning of the Teacher's mantra will be made manifest in due course."

Song Jiang harkened to these words and hid the mantra inside the Mystic Books.

The army now remained encamped at Qizhou for over a month and there was no further military action. Half way through the seventh month a letter arrived from Commissioner Zhao in Tanzhou informing them of an order from the court demanding action. Song Jiang conferred with the Professor. They decided to join forces with the Unicorn at Green Fields, train the army, prepare their arms, and after dividing the responsibilities return to Qizhou to sacrifice to the flag and select a day to start their campaign. But just then an aide announced: "There is an ambassador from Liao."

Going out to receive him, Song Jiang found that it was Chancellor Ouyang again and invited him inside. After the exchange of courtesies he asked: "What is the purpose of this visit?"

The other said: "Would you ask your aides to leave the room?"

When Song Jiang had complied, the other said: "The great king of Liao is fully conversant with the General's virtues. If you would consent to surrender and give us the benefit of your assistance, you would certainly receive great honours. My only hope is that you can decide soon, so that my sovereign may not be kept in suspense."

Song Jiang answered: "There are no outsiders present. I can therefore speak openly to you. You need to know that last time you came the whole company learnt of your intention. Among them all exactly half rejected the idea of surrendering. If at that time I had gone with you to Youzhou to see your king, the Unicorn, my second-in-command, would have pursued me. If we had fought there, in front of the city, it would have meant the end of our former loyalty to each other. What I must do now is go with some of the people I can trust totally and find a city somewhere, no matter where, to hide out in. If he comes after me, and if he discovers my whereabouts, we can turn him away. If he won't listen, then we'll have to fight him. If he can't discover our whereabouts and goes back to the Eastern Capital to report, it'll be a different scenario. Then we must see your king and raise a Liao army to march against him: it will be time to fight."

All that Song Jiang said was highly satisfactory to Chancellor Ouyang and he said: "Our city of Bazhou is reached by only two passes. Once is called Easy Passage: it has high rugged mountains on either side and only the one road running between. The other is in Wenan, which lies in the midst of a barren plateau, where the mountains are very wild and a narrow pass leads down into the city. These two places are like the two doors of Bazhou. If things are as you say, you will be quite safe hiding out in Bazhou. The King's brother-in-law, Kangli Dingan, is commander of the garrison. You can stay there with him and wait to see how things go here."

Song Jiang said: "In that case I will send someone home at once to fetch my father and get everything settled. You can get someone to lead me there secretly. If we are agreed on this, I will make preparations tonight."

Delighted with the way things were going, Chancellor Ouyang said farewell, mounted and rode away. The same day Song Jiang sent someone to ask the Unicorn, the Professor and the Strategist to come to Qizhou to work out a plan for the capture of Bazhou. They came, saw Song Jiang and reached a decision. The Unicorn left with his instructions, while the Professor and the Strategist gave out secret orders to their own commanders: do this, do that! Song Jiang chose fifteen leaders and ten thousand men to accompany him. Having picked the troops, he had only to wait for Chancellor Ouyang. After a couple of days the Chancellor galloped in and announced: "My king knows you are truly a man of noble spirit, if he has you on his side, what has he to fear from the Song forces? This nation of ours has fine troops and fine commanders, stalwart men and sturdy mounts, that can all play their part. If you want to bring your father out and are worried about his safety, let him stay with the King's brother-in-law in Bazhou, I will send someone to fetch him."

Song Jiang replied: "The leaders who have agreed to go with me are all ready. When can we start?"
"You can start tonight. Please give the order," said the Chancellor.
So Song Jiang made his dispositions, ordering the bells to be removed from the horses bridles and the soldiers to march gagged, and to be ready to leave the same evening. The ambassador was entertained and when dusk fell the western gate of the city was opened to let them out. Chancellor Ouyang surrounded by a dozen horsemen led the way, Song Jiang following with his own detachment of troops. When they had travelled six or seven miles, Song Jiang suddenly let out an oath: "Oh my God!" he said. "I agreed with the Professor that we would surrender to Liao together and in all this rush I forgot him. Tell the troops to advance slowly and send someone at once to fetch him."
But it was already the third watch and the entrance to the pass at Easy Passage was before them. Chancellor Ouyang shouted for the guards to let them through. The guards on the barrier raised it and the whole party passed through and headed down into Bazhou. The Chancellor welcomed Song Jiang to the city as dawn was beginning to show, and went to inform the royal brother-in-law. This commander was actually the queen's elder brother. He was a very powerful person and also very brave. Under him he had two ministers residing at Bazhou. One was called Jinfu and the other Yeqing. On hearing that Song Jiang was coming to surrender to them, he ordered the army to bivouac outside the walls and invited the commander, Song Jiang, into the city. Chancellor Ouyang and Song Jiang entered together and went to see him. When he saw that Song Jiang was someone quite exceptional, he stepped down to greet him and invited him into the inner hall. After the usual courtesies he told Song Jiang to take a seat. Song Jiang said: "Your Highness is of royal blood, and I am a surrendering enemy, how can I accept such an honour from you? How would I ever repay it?"
The other replied: "I know all about you. Your name is a household word in the Central Plain, and your fame has reached our kingdom too. Our king is hugely impressed with you."
Song Jiang said: "I have received so much honour from you, I am wholeheartedly grateful for your kindness."
The Prince was in the best of moods and ordered a banquet to be served. Oxen and horses were slaughtered to feast the army. A residence was chosen to house Song Jiang, Colonel Hua and the rest and quarters provided for the whole army within the city. Colonel Hua and the other leaders were presented to the royal brother-in-law. When all had rested, Song Jiang said to the Chancellor: "Would you be so good as to send word to the guards on the pass to make sure that when the Professor arrives he is allowed through? He and I will stay together. We were in such a hurry yesterday that we didn't wait for him. Our military planning cannot succeed without him. He is thoroughly versed in tactics and strategy; he has top qualifications and immense practical knowledge."
Chancellor Ouyang gave the necessary orders, and a messenger was sent to instruct the guards of both passes to watch out for "a refined-looking fellow, name of Wu Yong" and allow him through.
The authorities at Wenan got the order first and sent someone on to Easy Passage to put them in the picture. Later the guards, looking out from the pass, observed the dust rising like a cloud to blot out the sun, drawing a veil across the heavens. A crowd of horsemen drew near, and the man in the lead answered the description, "a refined-looking fellow". Behind him were a monk and a pilgrim, and following close behind them a dozen or so peasants — all racing towards the pass. When the foremost of the group reached the pass, he shouted: "I am Song Jiang's second-in-command and military adviser, Professor Wu Yong. I am looking for my commander and the Song army is hard on my heels. Open up and save me."
"This is the one we're expecting!" the guards said to themselves. They opened the gates and let the Professor in. But then the monk and the pilgrim came on too. The guards barred the way but the pilgrim had already got his foot in the gateway. "We are holy men," the monk said, "and the troops are after us. You've got to save us!" When the guards still tried to deny them entry, the monk became angry and the pilgrim was incensed. "We are not what we seem!" they shouted. "We are the deadly Monk Lu Zhishen and Pilgrim Wu Song, that's who we are!" The Flowery Monk swung his steel staff and began to strike out, Pilgrim drew his two swords and began to despatch people, easy as splitting melons or chopping vegetables. By now the peasants had rushed through the gates and seized the pass — these "peasants" were actually Snake, Scorpion, Executioner, Green-Eyes, Panther, the Guv, the Flea, Yellow Dog, the Daytime Rat and Perilous. The Unicorn and his troops now reached the pass and were able to charge straight into Wenan. The guards could not stop them and Wenan was quickly taken.
The Professor had galloped straight on down to Bazhou. When the guard on the door announced his arrival, Song Jiang and Chancellor Ouyang received him and took him to see the royal brother-in-law. The Professor said: "I am afraid I am a little late. As I was setting out the Unicorn somehow got wind of it and pursued me all the way to the pass. I came straight on to the city and didn't wait to hear what happened there."
At this very moment a despatch rider galloped in to report: "The Song troops have taken Wenan and are attacking Bazhou!"
The royal brother-in-law immediately gave orders for troops to move out and face them. But Song Jiang said: "Don't send the troops out. Wait till they reach the city walls. I will parley with him and try to calm him. We only need to fight him if he rejects diplomacy." As he spoke scouts arrived and reported: "The Song army is very close!"
The royal brother-in-law and Song Jiang went up onto the battlements to look. The Song army was drawn up in orderly ranks below the walls. The Unicorn in full armour riding a mettlesome charger and equipped with a spear rode out from the gate of pennants and shouted: "Send out the traitor Song Jiang!" Song Jiang was standing on the parapet beside the gate tower. He pointed at the Unicorn and said: "Brother, our recompense from the Emperor is not assured, corrupt officials stand in the way of our advancement, slander and envy hold sway. That is why I have given my allegiance to the King of Liao. If you agree, join me in the service of Liao and preserve the unity which we maintained for so long on Mount Liang."
The Unicorn reacted furiously: "You lured me from my peaceful life in the Northern Capital to join you on the mountain. The Emperor offered you an amnesty three times. What ill-treatment can you possibly complain of ? How can you betray your country? You are a man of short views and no ability. Come out and let us two decide this matter, win or lose, in a fight to the death."
Song Jiang indignantly ordered the gates to be opened and sent out Leopard's Head, Colonel Hua, the Strategist and Mu the Unstoppable ordering them to "capture the insolent devil". The Unicorn was unimpressed by these four. Ordering his troops to stand firm as he managed his fiery charger and levelled his lance, he charged them all. After twenty bouts, Leopard's Head and his companions turned their horses' heads and fled towards the city, with the Unicorn and his men in hot pursuit. When they reached the drawbridge Leopard's Head and Colonel Hua turned to face their attackers and pretended they were feigning defeat to lure them into the city. The Unicorn's army streamed tumultuously in behind them. Song Jiang and the other leaders now revealed their true colours and welcomed the Unicorn in. There was great slaughter on all sides. The defenders were helpless and terrified. The Prince could only stand and stare in amazement, totally nonplussed. Along with all his counsellors he was taken prisoner.
Song Jiang led his troops into the city and all the leaders went to see him in the government offices. He first ordered the royal brother-in-law and the three counsellors to be seated so he could pay his respects to them. He said to them: "You Tartars don't understand us, you got it all wrong. We are not just a bunch of common outlaws! Each of us has his destined place and rank. How could we betray our country to serve you? We wanted to capture Bazhou, that's all. We took this chance of doing so. Now that we have succeeded, we ask the Prince and the rest of you to return to your own country. You need have no fear, we mean you no harm. But everyone under your command, including all their families, must leave. Bazhou belongs and has always belonged to the Emperor and you must never attack it again. From now on it will be heavily guarded. No disturbance will be tolerated."
Song Jiang's orders were that every single Tartar official in the city administration was to vacate his post and return with Governor Dingan the royal brother-in-law to Youzhou. Song Jiang also reassured the people. He sent his second-in-command the Unicorn with half the army back to fortify Qizhou while he himself remained with the other half of the army in Bazhou. He sent messengers to inform Commissioner Zhao that Bazhou was taken, to the great satisfaction of the latter who immediately sent word to the Emperor.
So Prince Dingan returned to Yanjing, with the three counsellors and all their people. He went to see the King and told him all about Song Jiang's fake surrender which had enabled the savages to take control of Bazhou. The King was furious. He turned on Chancellor Ouyang: "It's all your fault, you incompetent fool!" he yelled. "You kept egging us on to fight, and now you've lost us Bazhou, our most important city, and put Yanjing in grave peril. Take him away and cut off his head!" Thereupon Marshal Wuyan stepped forward and said: "Your Majesty, have no fear, I reckon there's no need for you to waste your time on these curs. To my way of thinking, there is no point in executing Chancellor Ouyang. If Song Jiang heard we had done so he would only laugh at us." The King took note and pardoned the Chancellor. Marshal Wuyan went on: "I with my twenty-eight top commanders and eleven brilliant generals will muster an army and annihilate that rabble."
Hardly had he finished when Marshal Ho also came forward and said, "Don't worry, Your Majesty! I've an idea. There's a proverb that says 'You don't need an axe to kill a chicken'! There's no need for the commander-in-chief to go himself. I've a plan that'll drive these scums to an unknown grave."
"My dear fellow," said the King delightedly. "Tell me quickly what you've in mind." So Marshal Ho began to speak and divulged his plan. And it was to have important effects: the Unicorn was to find himself in a place where there was no fodder for horses and no food for man, a situation to make the valiant faint and heroes knit their brows.

Song Jiang Battles on Lone Deer Mountain & is victorious; The Unicorn Lu the Magnate gets into trouble & is Trapped in Black Rock Gorge Stony Valley

Ho Zhongbao, the commanding general, ranked second after Wuyan, the commander-in-chief of the Great Liao armed forces. Very tall, powerfully built, a shrewd strategist, he wielded a three-pointed two-edged sword. He was responsible for the defense of Youzhou Prefecture, and was in charge of every branch of military service.
"We have a place in Youzhou called Stony Valley," he told the king. "Hemmed in on all sides by high mountains, a single road goes in and ends there. I intend to use a dozen or so cavalrymen to lure the barbarians into that valley and then surround it with troops. The enemy won't be able to go forward, and won't be able to retreat. We'll starve them to death."
"How will you get them to come?" asked Wuyan.
"They've taken three of our big prefectures, and are feeling very proud of themselves," said Ho. "They're sure to want Youzhou, next. If I dispatch troops to provoke them, they'll certainly give chase. We'll lead them into the valley, and they'll be stuck!"
"Your plan is incomplete. Once you get them there, you must send a large force in to slaughter them. Now let's see how you go about it."
General Ho took his leave of the king, donned his armor, buckled on his sword and mounted his horse. He returned to Youzhou at the head of a column of infantry. There he mobilized his soldiers and divided them into three units. One was to defend Youzhou, the other two were ordered to attack Bazhou and Qizhou. These were placed under the commands of Ho Chai and Ho Yun, respectively, younger brothers of the commanding general. They were not to win. In fact they were to pretend defeat and draw the Song army across the line into Youzhou, where the next move of the plan would go into effect.
Meanwhile, in Bazhou, Song Jiang received the report: "The Liaos are assaulting Qizhou. We're in danger of losing it. We hope you'll send relief forces at once."
"Since they're attacking, we've no reason to be resting," said Song Jiang. "We'll use this opportunity to conquer Youzhou."
Leaving behind a small unit to defend the city, he and the rest of the army broke camp and headed for Qizhou. There, they would join forces with Lu Junyi the Magnate's contingent, and set a date for their offensive.
The Tartars under Ho Chai continued their advance on Bazhou. They ran into Song Jiang's troops after they had left the city and were halfway to Qizhou. They clashed only two or three times, and Ho Chai led his soldiers away in a retreat. But Song Jiang did not pursue. He was informed that Ho Yun had assailed Qizhou, and had also withdrawn when Huyan Zhuo came out to give battle.
Song Jiang conferred in his tent with Lu Junyi on how to take Youzhou. Wu Yong and Zhu Wu had some words of caution.
"The enemy wouldn't have split their soldier into two columns if they weren't trying to lure us in. We mustn't fall for their tricks."
"You're wrong," Lu protested. "We've beaten them time after time. Why should they want to pull us towards them? If we don't conquer Youzhou now, when we can, it may not be so easy later. Move immediately, I say. What are we wailing for!"
Song Jiang agreed. "The rogues are exhausted. What kind of plan could they have? This is our chance."
He ignored Wu Yong and Zhu Wu's advice and marched on Youzhou, dividing his forces into three columns, large and small. Soon, the advance unit sent back word: "Liao soldiers ahead, blocking the road." He rode forward to look.
He saw coming around the side of the mountain a swarm of black flags. Song Jiang ordered his advance unit to spread out. The Tartar army rolled towards them, covering the earth. Bearing their embroidered black flags, they separated into four columns and deployed in front of the mountain slope. As Song Jiang, Lu and the chieftains watched, from the hundreds of thousands of Tartars massed like black clouds, a high general emerged. Holding athwart his three-pointed, two-edged sword, he halted his steed at the opposite end of the field of combat. On his banner were inscribed the legend: Vice Commander-in-Chief of the Great Liao Army Ho Zhongbao.
"He must be an excellent warrior," said Song Jiang. "Who dares to vie against him?"
Before the words were out of his mount, Guan Sheng the Big Halberd, waving his crescent-shaped blade, galloped forward on his roan pinto. No talk was exchanged between the two. They met in instant battle.
Truly, they were two dragons contending for a treasure, a pair of tigers fighting over prey. To and fro they twisted like the turning body of a phoenix, up and down they flailed like the beating wings of a fabulous luan. Sword clanged against sword, flashing yards of icy fire. Steed pounded against steed, shaking half the sky with their murderous power.
More than thirty rounds the warriors battled. But Commanding General Ho, instead of intensifying his efforts, turned and rode towards his own lines. Guan Sheng galloped in pursuit. Ho led his troops back around the mountain. Song Jiang and his army chased them for forty or fifty li.
Suddenly, on all sides war drums began to thunder. Song Jiang hastily shouted for his army to withdraw. But a contingent of Tartars, pouring down the slope on the left, blocked his retreat. As he agitatedly divided his forces to meet the threat, another Tartar contingent charged from the right. Ahead, General Ho wheeled his soldiers around to attack from the front. Song Jiang's men were completely enclosed in a giant pincers. The Tartars had cut the Song dynasty army in two.

*

The rear half, fighting hard under Lu Junyi, could no longer see the forward elements. They desperately sought an opening through which to pull back. Another Liao unit assailed them from the side. The Tartar soldiers, yelling savagely, were now attacking all around, tightly hemming them in. Lu sent his chieftains in charges to left and right, front and rear, urgently trying to break through. They fought with magnificent valor.
Dark clouds suddenly massed, blotting out the sky and turning day into night. The men lost all sense of direction. Lu was panic-stricken. Leading his-troops, he struggled to smash free. The Tartars, hearing ahead the tinkling of bridle bells, galloped to meet the foe.
Lu and his men reached a gap in the mountains. He could hear the voices of the Tartars and the neighing of their horses inside the gap, and he urged his army forward. A wild gale arose, whipping up sand and gravel, blinding both sides. Lu battled in this maelstrom until nearly midnight. Only then did the wind fade and the clouds part, revealing a sky full of stars.
The Song soldiers took their bearings. All around were high trackless mountains and steep pathless cliffs. Only twelve chieftains and five thousand troops could be accounted for. Hemmed in by cliffs all around, they sought in vain for a way out.
"The men are weary after fighting all day," Lu thought. "We'll rest here tonight and continue searching tomorrow."
When the dark clouds gathered and the wind blew, Song Jiang's forces were also blinded by sand and gravel and unable to see one another. Gongsun Sheng, on horseback, recognized it at once as a magic spell. He waved his precious sword and muttered an incantation, then shouted: "Speed!" He pointed with his precious sword, and the clouds dispersed and the gale subsided. The Liao army pulled back without giving battle, and the broad evil miasma gradually vanished.
Having broken clear of the encirclement, Song Jiang and his troops withdrew to a high mountain. There they linked up with more of their forces and placed their grain carts in a wide circle to form a rough stockade. A count of the chieftains revealed that thirteen of them, including Lu Junyi the Magnate, were missing, as well as five thousand troops.
At daybreak, Song Jiang sent Huyan Zhuo, Lin Chong, Qin Ming and Guan Sheng with soldiers to look for them. But after searching all day, they could find no trace. He then took out the Three Heavenly Books of the Mystic Maid of Ninth Heaven and lit incense and cast divining sticks. "The general omen isn't bad," he said, "but they seem to have fallen into an evil area and can't get free."
Worried, he sent Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, disguised as hunters, to scour the mountains. He also ordered Shi Qian, Shi Yong, Duan Jingzhu and Cao Zheng to travel around and see if they could pick up any news. The Xie brothers, wearing tiger skin robes and carrying steel fork-spears, pushed deep into the mountains. By dusk they saw no sign of human habitation, only an endless jumble of heights. They crossed another few mountains. By then it was night. In the misty moonlight, they saw a pin-point of lamplight on a far slope.
"Someone must live there," they thought. "We'll go and ask for something to eat."
They strode swiftly in the direction of the lamplight. After walking a li or more, they reached their destination. Beside a grove was a dilapidated shack of two or three rooms. They could see the lamp burning through a crack in the wall. Pushing open the door, they found an old woman of about sixty. They set down their fork-spears and bowed in greeting.
"I thought it was my sons coming home," said the woman. "I never expected guests. No need for courtesy. Where are you from, hunters? What brings you here?"
"We're from a family of hunters in Shandong," said Xie Zhen, "but we came to these parts to do bit of trading. Who knew we'd run into armies fighting and killing all over the place? We lost our capital and haven't been able to earn a living. So we've been hunting in these mountains for a little wild game to feed ourselves with. But we don't know the paths and we've lost our way. Could you put us up for the night, old mama?"
"Nobody can carry his home with him, as the old saying goes. My two boys are also hunters. I'm expecting them back today. Just sit yourselves down and I'll make you some supper."
The Xie brothers thanked her. "We're grateful to you, old mama."
She went inside, and they sat down outside the front door. Before long, two men appeared, carrying a roebuck. "Ma, where are you?" they called.
The woman came out and said: "So you're back, boys. Put that deer down and meet our guests."
Xie Zhen and Xie Bao hastily bowed. The other two returned the courtesy and asked: "Where are you from, sirs? What brings you here?" The Xies repeated what they had told the mother.
"We live here," said the young men. "We're called Liu the Second and Liu the Third. Our father was Liu the First, but unfortunately he died. Only our mother is left. Our family has been hunting for a living for twenty or thirty years. The paths here are tricky. We don't know them all ourselves. You say you're from Shandong? Why come here to seek a living? Don't try to fool us. You're not really hunters, are you?"
"Since it's come to this, there's no use pretending," said the Xies. "We'll tell you brothers the truth." Falling on their knees, they explained. "We are indeed hunters from Shandong. We're brothers named Xie Zhen and Xie Bao. But for a long time we've been following our brother Song Jiang in Liangshan Marsh. Recently, we were amnestied, and we've come with him to smash the Tartars of Great Liao. The other day General Ho scattered one of our units in a big battle, and we don't know what's become of them. We two have been sent out to inquire."
The Liu brothers laughed. "So you both are bold gallants. Rise, please. We'll show you the way. Rest a while. We'll cook you a haunch of venison and warm some local wine. You're our guests."
The meat was soon cooked and the Lius served the Xie brothers. Over the wine they said: "We've long heard how Song Jiang of Liangshan Marsh acts on Heaven's behalf and never harms good people. His fame has spread all the way to the kingdom of Liao."
"Our brother takes loyalty and righteousness as his main guide. He's vowed never to trouble honest folk. He kills only corrupt officials, and uses his strength to aid the weak."
"That's what we heard. So it's really true!"
All four were very pleased. They formed a deep mutual affection.
"That missing contingent of ours," said the Xie brothers. "It has more than a dozen chieftains and four or five thousand men. We can't imagine what's become of them. They must be trapped somewhere."
"You're not familiar with our terrain. This section is under the rule of Youzhou Prefecture. We have a place called Stony Valley. A dead-end road runs into it, and there are steep cliffs on both sides. If that entry is blocked, whoever has gone in can't come out. That's where your unit must be. No other place is broad enough to hold so many troops. Where Vanguard General Song Jiang is camped is called Lone Deer Mountain. Before it is a broad plain where you can fight freely, and from the summit you can see foes approaching from any direction.

"If you want to rescue your unit, you have to crack open Stony Valley at all costs. The enemy must have a large force bottling up the entry. That section is full of cypress trees, and the two tallest ones, looking like big umbrellas, mark the entrance to the valley. You can see them from a long way off. Rut be careful. Commanding General Ho can work magic spells. General Song Jiang must cope with them."
The Xie brothers thanked the Liu's and travelled through the night to return to their camp.
"What have you heard?" Song Jiang asked, the moment he saw them.
They told him what the Liu brothers had said. Startled, he summoned Wu Yong to a conference. While they were talking, a junior officer entered.
"Duan Jingzhu and Shi Yong are here with Bai Sheng."
"Bai Sheng was trapped together with General Lu. It's a wonder he was able to get away," exclaimed Song Jiang. He summoned the three to his tent.
Duan Jingzhu spoke first. "I was scouting with Shi Yong among some high mountains," he said, "when I saw a bundle of felt rolling down from a summit. We watched it roll to the foot of the slope. It looked like a big ball of felt clothing, all tied with cord. We walked over to the edge of the grove, where it stopped, and found Bai Sheng inside."
Bai Sheng explained. "General Lu and twelve of us chieftains were engaged in a fierce battle. Suddenly the sky darkened and the sun lost its lustre. We couldn't tell one direction from another. We heard voices and the neighing of horses. Lu ordered us to charge. Before we knew it we were deep in a cul-de-sac surrounded by high cliffs and no way out, cut off from any grain or fodder. Our whole column is truly in a bad situation. General Lu directed me to roll down the mountain and try to get through to report. Luckily, I ran into Shi Yong and Duan Jingzhu. We hope you'll send reinforcements quickly, brother, and get us out of there. We're sure to die if you don't."
That very night Song Jiang mustered his troops and, with Xie Zhen and Xie Bao leading the way, headed for the two big cypresses, that is, the entrance to Stony Valley. His order was that the infantry and cavalry fight with all their might. Come what may, they had to smash open the valley.
All night they marched, and by daybreak they could see the two big umbrella-like trees in the distance. A troop under the Xie brothers hastened directly towards the entry. Commanding General Ho spread out his soldiers. The two brothers were eager to be the first to give battle, and Song Jiang wanted to launch a general offensive, but Panther Head Lin Chong galloped swiftly to the fore and engaged Ho Chai, After only two rounds, a thrust in the belly from Lin Chong brought him tumbling from his saddle.
Song Jiang's infantry, seeing that the cavalry had drawn first blood, now raced forward. Li Kui the Black Whirlwind, swinging his pair of battle-axes, carved a path through the Liao soldiers. Behind him came Fan Rui the Demon King Who Roils the World, Bao Xu the God of Death, plus Xiang Chong and Li Gun and their ferocious shield fighters, all wielding their weapons with lethal effect.
Black Whirlwind Li Kui made for Ho Yun. He rushed under his mount and broke its leg with one blow of the ax. Animal and rider fell to the ground. Li flew at them with his axes, hacking them both into mincemeat. The Liao soldiers swarmed forward, but they were stopped cold by Fan Rui, Bao Xu and their shield fighters.
Commanding General Ho had seen his two brothers die. He muttered a magic incantation. A wild gale rose and black clouds covered the mountain-tops, plunging the entire valley into darkness. Song Jiang summoned Gongsun Sheng. The Taoist, seated on his horse, murmured a few words, grasping his precious sword. Then, in a loud voice, he shouted: "Speed!"
Strong winds from all sides blew the clouds away to reveal a brightly shining red sun. In full force, Song Jiang's troops tore into the Liao army. His magic having failed and the enemy attacking with such vigor, General Ho could only wave his sword, clap his horse and gallop from the field. The two armies clashed in savage battle. Finally, the Tartars broke and fled helter-skelter.
The cavalry chased them, while the infantry opened up the entry to the valley. The Tartars had piled it high with big stones, blocking the road. After removing the stones, the foot soldiers pushed in quickly. Lu Junyi, when he saw them, cried out that he was ashamed.
Song Jiang ordered a halt to the pursuit of the Liao troops. "Call everyone back to Lone Deer Mountain," he said. "Our men and horses need rest."
Lu wept aloud. "If you hadn't come to my rescue, I surely would have died!"
Song, Lu, Wu Yong and Gongsurt rode back to camp side by side. There, the men removed their armor and rested. The next day, Wu Yong had a proposal.
"We ought to use this opportunity to take Youzhou. If we can do that, we'll have the Liao kingdom in the palm of our hand."
Song Jiang directed Lu Junyi and the twelve chieftains and their forces to proceed to Qizhou and rest there temporarily. Leading the other chieftains and troops personally, he left Lone Deer Mountain and set out for Youzhou.
By then Commanding General Ho had retreated into the city, very distressed by the loss of his two brothers. A cavalry scout reported: "Song Jiang's army is advancing for an attack." Ho grew even more upset.
Tartar soldiers mounted the city walls and looked. From the northeast a contingent bearing red banners, and from the northwest a contingent bearing green banners, were moving rapidly towards Youzhou. General Ho was shocked when the news was transmitted to him. He went up on the walls to see for himself. To his relief, he recognized the banners as Liao standards.
Inscribed with letters of silver, the red banners were those of Taizhen Xuqing, the Royal Son-in-Law, with an army of over five thousand. The green banners, written in gold and decorated with pheasant feathers, belonged to Security General Li. Keeper of the Palace and Vice Minister of Royal Security, Li Ji was a hereditary noble descended from the famous Han Dynasty official LiLing. His headquarters were in Xiongzhou, and he had more than ten thousand troops under his command. It was he who conducted the major raids on the Song borders. When he heard that the king of Liao was losing his cities, he hurried to the rescue.
As Song Jiang neared the city Wu Yong said: "If they bar the gates and don't come out that means they're not prepared. If they march to meet us that means they've laid an ambush, for sure. In that case, we should divide into three columns, one to continue the advance on the city, the other two to guard against flank attacks by the ambushers."
Truly, soldiers must meet all assaults, whether by land or water. Song Jiang instructed Guan Sheng, aided by Xuan Tan and Hao Siwen, to lead the left column, and Huyan Zhuo, with the assistance of Shan Tinggui and Wei Dingguo, to lead the right. Each would consist of more than ten thousand men, and would advance slowly along the paths behind the mountains. Song Jiang would command the main force and march directly on Youzhou.
Meanwhile, General Ho moved out with his troops to meet the attackers. The two armies confronted each other, and Lin Chong rode forth and engaged the general. After less than five rounds, Ho turned and rode away. Song Jiang's soldiers pursued. General Ho split his army into two columns. But instead of entering Youzhou, they skirted round it and continued on.
With a cry of "Halt!" Wu Yong ended the chase. Almost before the command had left his lips, Taizhen the Royal Son-in-Law charged down from the left, to be met by Guan Sheng's column. Huyan Zhuo engaged Security General Li's assault from the right. Three battles were raging at once. Corpses covered the plain, and blood flowed in rivers.
It was obvious to General Ho that the Tartars could not win. He wanted to return to Youzhou, but he encountered Hua Rong and Qin Ming, who engaged him in fierce combat. He tried to get to the West Gate, but he was blocked by General Two Spears Dong Ping, and another savage clash ensued. He turned towards the South Gate, but there Zhu Tong compelled him once again to fight a pitched battle. Not daring to continue in his attempts to reach the city, he struck out north along the main road. He was quite unprepared when Huang Xin the Suppressor of the Three Mountains charged, waving his big sword.
Panic-stricken, Ho became flurried. A blow from Huang struck his horse's head. The general abandoned the animal and ran. Two infantry chieftains, Yang Xiong and Shi Xiu, unexpectedly rushed him from the side and threw him flat on his face. At the same time Song Wan galloped up with levelled lance. Rather than disrupt their fraternal unity in contending to be the general's captor, they killed him on the spot.
The Tartar troops scattered and ran for their lives. The Royal Son-in-Law saw Ho's army banner fall and the soldiers flee. He knew the situation was bad. With his red-bannered column, he skirted round the rear of the mountains and hastily departed. Security General Li, engaged in the frontal battle, guessed that something had gone wrong when he could no longer see the red banners. He led his green bannered soldiers to the rear of the mountains and also withdrew.
All three enemy columns were in full retreat. Song Jiang drove directly on Youzhou. He took it without a struggle. Once inside the city, he billeted his troops and issued proclamations reassuring the local populace. He then dispatched an urgent message to Tanzhou, reporting the victory to Commissioner Zhao and requesting him to send troops to hold Qizhou. The naval chieftains and their craft were to come to Youzhou and await further orders. Lu Junyi the Magnate was to use part of his contingent to defend Bazhou.
Four major cities under Song control—Commissioner Zhao was delighted. He immediately sent a report to the emperor and made the necessary troop deployments to Qizhou and Bazhou. The situation was becoming critical for the Kingdom of Great Liao. Commissioner Zhao instructed the naval chieftains to get ready to sail. The big cities of the north were restored to Song rule—a remarkable feat.
The king of Great Liao in his palace summoned his top officials, civil and military. He conferred with Youxi Bojin the premier, vice-premier Chu Jian, and all the highest generals.
"Song Jiang has invaded our borders and taken four major cities. If he could conquer Youzhou, what's to prevent him from attacking our capital? Yanjing will be hard to defend! Commanding General Ho and his two brothers were all killed and Youzhou has been lost. Our country is beset by troubles. What do you ministers think we ought to do?"
Wuyan, the commander-in-chief, stepped forward. "Have no fears, Your Majesty. Several times I have requested to be sent with troops, but always I was prevented. As a result, the brigands are running amok and causing calamity. I beg a royal decree commissioning me to march with an expeditionary force against the foreign invaders and setting a time limit for their defeat. I shall seize Song Jiang and his chieftains and recapture our fallen cities."
The king acceded to his request. He issued to Wuyan the pearl-encrusted tiger standard, a gold seal and a royal decree, yellow and white panoplies, and banners of red and black. The monarch's orders were strict.
"Everyone—regardless of noble birth, royal kinship, or military affiliation—shall obey the commands of my beloved minister Wuyan. Muster an army quickly and set forth."
Wuyan, carrying the royal seal and official tallies, went to the training field, summoned his generals, and ordered them to gather all the Tartar forces and bring them to the capital. His eldest son, Yanshou, approached him in the reviewing pavilion with a suggestion.
"While you're raising this huge army, father, why not let me go first with a number of fierce generals, join forces with Taizhen the Royal Son-in-Law and Security General Li, and attack Youzhou. We'll slaughter eight tenths of the barbarians, and when you come you'll mop up the rest as easily as catching turtles in a jug! How does that strike you, father?"
"A good idea, my son. Take five thousand cavalry, twenty thousand crack infantry, and go. Since you're joining with the Royal Son-in-Law and the Security General, it'd work out well. If you succeed, let me know by urgent dispatch." Happily, Yanshou mustered his troops and left for Youzhou. And because Wuyan's son dared the Song army to combat, the outskirts of Youzhou became the approaches to the 9 Li Mountains, and the banks of the Wanshui River became busy fording points. Truly, Heaven and Earth tremble when cavalry legions race, demons quake when hordes of infantry charge.

Now this Marshal Ho of the Tartars was second-in-command to Marshal Wuyan. He was tall and immensely strong. He was skilled in magic and wielded a double-edged blade with three points. At the time he was commander of the garrison at Youzhou and responsible for all military affairs there.
Marshal Ho now said to the King: "There's a place in the area of Youzhou called Black Rock Gorge. There is only one way in and it is surrounded by very rugged mountains, with no easy access. What I do is, I send a dozen horsemen to entice the enemy into it, we put a few troops outside and we've bottled 'em up in there. There's no way out for them. They'll starve!"
Marshal Wuyan said: "How do we know they'll take the bait?"
Marshal Ho said: "They've captured three of our most important provinces, they'll be brimming with confidence, they're bound to think of attacking Youzhou. If I send my troops there with instructions to draw them on, they're certain to give chase. Once we've led them into the trap, they're never going to get out!"
Marshal Wuyan said: "I'm worried your plan might not work. We still need the main army to finish them off. But we'll see how you get on."
Marshal Ho bade them farewell and fully accoutred rode off to Youzhou at the head of a small body of infantry. Once there he divided the cavalry into three squadrons, one to guard the city, the other two to advance and threaten Bazhou and Qizhou. After receiving their orders the two attacking parties were ordered out, under the command of the Marshal's two brothers. The elder, Ho Chai, was to attack Bazhou and the younger, Ho Yun was headed for Qizhou. Their instructions were not to seek victory but to feign defeat and draw the enemy on into Youzhou, in accordance with the plan.
Song Jiang meanwhile had fortified Bazhou. Someone reported: "There's a Liao army attacking Qizhou. There could be problems. Please send reinforcements."
Song Jiang said: "Since they've come to attack us, we shall attack them, and make it an opportunity to capture Youzhou."
Leaving a small number of troops to defend Bazhou, Song Jiang ordered the rest of the army to strike camp. He marched them towards Qizhou where he planned to link up with the Unicorn and agree a time for the attack.
When the Tartar force under Ho Chai was approaching Bazhou they ran into Song Jiang and his army coming out from the city. Before they had finished three bouts Ho Chai and his forces fled, but Song Jiang did not pursue them. Meanwhile Ho Yun on his way to Qizhou met Twin Rods and likewise retreated.
Song Jiang conferred with the Unicorn in his tent. They discussed their plan for taking Youzhou. The Professor and the Strategist said: "These two forces that have come from Youzhou must have been sent with the aim of luring us there. We must not go."
The Unicorn said: "You are mistaken, Professor. They've just suffered a string of reverses, how can they be planning anything? We must attack now, come what may, because later it will be more difficult. If we don't take Youzhou now, when can we do it? We'll never have another opportunity like this."
Song Jiang agreed: "They're at their last gasp. They aren't capable of carrying out any plan. We must strike while the iron's hot!"
Ignoring the advice of the Professor and the Strategist, Song Jiang ordered the attack on Youzhou forthwith. The two armies were divided into three columns each and set off. Soon the first column reported: "The Liao army is standing in our path."
When Song Jiang rode out in front to see for himself, a forest of black banners appeared on the hillside ahead. He ordered his vanguard to spread out, whereupon the Tartar horde also split into four divisions and deployed along the slope. As Song Jiang, the Unicorn and their commanders watched, millions of troops poured forth like a black cloud, evidently protecting a Tartar general who wielded a double-edged blade with three prongs and was riding at the head of the army. The banner which preceded him bore the legend: "Marshal Ho, second-in-command of the great Liao army".
Song Jiang said: "This must be one of their top commanders. Who dares to take him on?"
Immediately Scimitar rode out, flourishing the bright crescent of his blade. He flew forward on his lively mount and without a word joined battle with Marshal Ho. After some thirty bouts Marshal Ho's spirits seemed to flag. Turning aside his weapon he galloped towards his own ranks. Scimitar gave chase. Marshal Ho led his defeated army off up the slope. Song Jiang ordered his army forward in pursuit. After they'd covered some fifteen miles, war drums began to be heard on all sides. Song Jiang hurriedly ordered a retreat, but they were threatened by an enemy column on the slopes to their left. When Song Jiang sent some troops to engage them another enemy column appeared on the right. Marshal Ho had now ordered his troops also to turn and charge. Song Jiang's forces, under attack from all sides, were unable to maintain contact and were cut in two by the enemy.
The Unicorn had been bringing up the rear. Having lost contact with the army in front, he searched desperately for a way through. When he tried to retreat he came upon another enemy force lying concealed off to one side. These troops now attacked. The shouts of the Tartars filled the sky as they charged out from every direction. The Unicorn and his men were driven deep into the mountains. The Unicorn ordered sallies this way and that in an attempt to break out. His leaders fought valiantly and made superhuman efforts, essaying charges in every direction. But suddenly a dark cloud engulfed them, a black miasma that veiled the sky, blotting out the world as if night had suddenly fallen, so that there was no telling north from south or east from west. When the Unicorn in consternation led a detachment of men in a desperate charge through the murk, they heard bells ahead of them. They gave the horses their heads and raced forward. At the mouth of a narrow defile they heard men's voices and horses neighing, but as they galloped onward a violent wind got up, flinging stones about and scattering sand. They could see nothing ahead but they pushed on. Around the second watch the wind swept the clouds from the sky and all the stars were visible again.
Looking around them, all they could see were mountains, with forbidding cliffs and crags on every side, and no way to climb them. Of the original force twelve leaders remained: Spearsman, Hasty, Victorious, the Supremo, River-Jumper, White-Spotted Snake, Big Chief, Tiger-Killer, Forester, Rhinoceros, Panther and the Daytime Rat. There were five thousand men. By the light of the stars they searched for a way back, but the mountains enveloped them completely. It was impossible.
"We fought all day, we are all tired to death," the Unicorn said to his leaders. "We'll rest here for the night. Let there be no more fighting for the time being. Tomorrow we'll find a way out."
Song Jiang too had experienced the black cloud all around, while he was fighting, the stones and sand flying, and had likewise been unable to see his opponents. Alone of his force Taoist Gongsun had recognized the workings of a magic spell. Quickly taking up his trusty blade he waved it about while reciting a spell of his own. Then with a cry of "Chrr!" he pointed the sword heavenwards and the dark cloud cleared, the wind ceased. The Tartar forces broke off the fight and withdrew. Urged on by their leader, Song Jiang's troops broke out of the encirclement and withdrew to a hilltop to regroup. They joined the supply carts in a circle nose to tail and made camp. When the roll was called the Unicorn and thirteen others were missing, together with five thousand troops.
When day broke, Song Jiang ordered Twin Rods, Leopard's Head, Thunderclap and Scimitar to lead out search parties in every direction. They searched all day but returned without any news. Song Jiang then took out the magic books and lit some incense, in order to read the signs. When he had done this and read the signs, he said: "It seems likely they have fallen into a dark place and find it very difficult to get out." Finding no relief for his anxiety, he told Snake and Scorpion to disguise themselves as hunters and roam over the mountains in search of news. He also sent the Flea, the Guv, Yellow Dog and Knife off in different directions to see if they could find anything out.
Snake and Scorpion dressed in tiger skins and toting steel tridents headed deep into the mountains. When the day began to darken they were already far in and whichever way they looked there was no sign of human habitation, nothing but jumbled peaks receding into the distance. They passed several more ridges. The moon shone mistily and far off on the mountainside a lantern gleamed. "If there's a lantern someone must live there," they told themselves. "We'd better go and see if they'll give us something to eat." So they directed their steps toward the light. In less than half a mile they reached three thatched huts nestling at the foot of a wooded slope. The light was shining through a crack in the wall of one of them. Pushing open the door, they beheld an old woman of some sixty years. They put down their tridents and prostrated themselves. "I thought it were my sons returning," she said. "I weren't expecting visitors. Get up, please. Where be you from? You're hunters, that I can see, but what brings you to these parts?"
"We are originally from Shandong," said Snake. "And we used to be hunters. But we came here to trade and then we got caught up in some fighting. It went on for days so we lost all our money and didn't have any means of livelihood. We're brothers, you see. All we could do was come here to the mountains to look for some game to keep us from starving. Unfortunately we don't know the paths and we lost our way. We've come here to ask if you could give us lodging for a night. We do hope you'll let us stay!"
"Well, no one can carry his house on his back, as they say. My two sons are hunters too. I be expecting them back any minute. Sit you down now and I'll get you some supper."
Snake and Scorpion thanked her. "We're truly grateful to you," they said. She went inside and they seated themselves in front of the door. In a little while two men appeared with the carcase of a deer on a carrying pole. "Where are you, Ma?" they shouted.
The old woman reappeared and said: "So you're back are you? Put that thing down and come and meet two visitors." Snake and Scorpion hurriedly kowtowed. The others returned the courtesy and said: "Where you from? And what brings you to these parts?"
Snake and Scorpion told their story again. The other two said: "This here is our ancestral home. We're the Liu brothers — I'm Liu the second and this is Liu the third. Our father was Liu the first, but he passed away, we've only got our mother now. Hunting is what we do for a living, nigh on thirty year we been at it. The paths round about here's tricky, there's places we don't even know ourselves. You're from Shandong, so how could you expect to make a living here? Come off it, you're not really hunters, are you!"
Snake and Scorpion said: "Okay, what's the point in trying to hide anything? We'll tell you the truth." There is a verse about what happens now:

Cliffs and peaks are all about,
The army's trapped, it can't get out
To learn what paths the forest hides,
The brothers pick some local guides.

Snake and Scorpion knelt down and said: "We were originally hunters in Shandong, that much is true. We're brothers and we're known as Snake and Scorpion. We became followers of Song Jiang of Mount Liang a while back. There has been an amnesty and we came here with him to destroy the might of Liao. There was a big battle with their Marshal Ho a few days ago. Our troops were scattered and part of our force has disappeared completely. We've been sent out to see if we can find out what happened to them."
The response was very friendly: "That's all right then, if you be brethren of the rivers and lakes, we'll be glad to act as your guides. But sit down now while we cook up some of this venison and share a few cups of our best wine with you."

It was not long before the meat was ready and the Liu brothers served it to them. Whilst they were all drinking the Lius asked: "Is it true what they say about your Song Jiang, that he does heaven's will and never harms the innocent? Everyone knows about him here in Liao."
Snake and Scorpion said: "Loyalty is the most important thing for him; he has vowed never to lay hands on the innocent and only has it in for corrupt officials and bullying officers who persecute the weak."
"Exactly what we heard. So it be true then!" the others said.
Everyone was happy and feelings of mutual friendship were expressed without reservation. Snake and Scorpion said: "There were ten leaders and four or five thousand men in the part of our army that's disappeared. It must be some huge area of land to swallow them all up."
"You don't know the country up here in the north. Right here in our district there be a place called Black Rock Gorge that's got only one road in and perpendicular cliffs and rugged peaks all about. Block the access road and you won't never get out again. Wouldn't mind betting that's where they've wound up. There be no proper road leading to it. The place where your leader General Song Jiang's camped is called Lone Deer Mountain. This plain in front of it be a fine place for fighting. On top of the mountain there you can see troops coming from any direction. But that there Black Rock Gorge, to rescue your companions you'll need to open it up and let them out. Only there's bound to be a lot of troops blocking the mouth. There's lots of cypress trees round there, but there's two particular big'uns, tallest of the lot and shaped like umbrellas, right by the entrance to the gorge. You can see 'em from everywhere, so you'll recognize the entrance. Watch out for one thing, though: that Marshal Ho can do magic. You want to tell General Song Jiang how important it be to break them spells of his."
Snake and Scorpion thanked their two informants and hurried back to the camp. "Did you get any reliable information?" Song Jiang asked them. They related all that the Liu brothers had told them. Song Jiang was disturbed by what he heard. He summoned the Professor for consultations. While they were talking a messenger came in and reported: "Yellow Dog and the Guv have come in with the Daytime Rat."
"The Daytime Rat is one of the leaders who were lost with the Unicorn," Song Jiang said. "If he's got back that's really interesting news." He summoned them to his tent for questioning. Yellow Dog spoke first: "The Guv and I were exploring a deep rift in the mountains when a kind of bundle came bounding down from above. We saw it come to rest at the bottom and found it to be a thick bundle of cloth tightly secured with cords. It fetched up at the foot of a tree. Inside it was the Daytime Rat."
The Daytime Rat said: "Whilst I was fighting along with the Unicorn and the other lot, a great darkness came over the earth and the sun disappeared. You couldn't see a thing in any direction. We could just hear voices and horses neighing. The Unicorn was determined to go forward. What we didn't know was that we were walking into a trap. We found ourselves lost with high mountains all around and no way out. There are no food supplies there and it's really tough for the horses and men. The Unicorn ordered me to roll down from the mountain top, to try and get a message out. I was lucky enough to meet Yellow Dog and the Guv, so now I'm here to beg you to send troops to rescue them, otherwise they're all dead men."
That same night Song Jiang detailed a body of troops, with Snake and Scorpion as guides, to head for the tall cypress trees that marked the mouth of the valley. He impressed on everyone that they must attack with the utmost vigour, because it was essential to open up the route.
They marched till daybreak, when they were able to make out the two big cypress trees in the distance, shaped like umbrellas. Snake and Scorpion led them all forward.
Marshal Ho, guarding the pass, ordered his men to spread out and sent his two brothers out first to engage the enemy.
Song Jiang's troops charged forward, determined to capture the pass. Leopard's Head led the way. He encountered Ho Chai, the Tartar Marshal's elder brother, and after just two bouts knocked him from his horse with a spear thrust to the belly. After the success of the first wave of cavalry, the footsoldiers advanced. Iron Ox swinging his two axes wreaked havoc in the Tartar ranks. Behind him came Demon King and Pluto, followed by Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost, with their shield bearers. Iron Ox came face to face with Ho Yun, the Marshal's second brother. He rushed at Ho's horse and chopped at its legs, causing it to fall and the rider with it. The axes whistled through the air, meting out the same fate to horse and man. The Tartar troops surged forward but were met by Demon King and the Eight-Armed Ogre's shield bearers.
Having lost both his brothers, Marshal Ho now uttered a spell and by some kind of magic caused a violent storm, so that clouds arose from the earth, cloaking the mountains in darkness and plunging the valley mouth into gloomy murk. Just at this moment Taoist Gongsun came forward and, grasping his trusty sword, muttered a few words and cried "Chrrr!". Immediately a fierce wind swept away the clouds on all sides, revealing the sun's golden disc, clear as clear. As the Song infantry and cavalry launched a furious attack on the Tartars, Marshal Ho saw that his magic was impotent. He responded to the enemy attack by flourishing his sword, slapping his horse and charging. When the two armies clashed, the Song forces scattered the Tartars who fled in all directions.
While the cavalry pursued the Tartar army, the infantry set about clearing the pass. The Tartars had heaped huge black rocks on top of each other to seal it off. Once they had cleared these, the infantry rushed through into Black Rock Gorge. When the Unicorn saw Song Jiang's men he was truly mortified. Song Jiang called a halt to the pursuit of the Tartars, ordering his commanders to regroup on Lone Deer Mountain so that the weary troops could get some rest. On meeting Song Jiang the Unicorn burst into loud weeping. "If you had not providentially come to the rescue I would have been dead," he said.
The four leaders now rode back to the camp to allow their troops to rest. They took off their armour and for a while all was quiet.
Next day the Professor said: "We should take advantage of this opportunity to capture Youzhou. Once Youzhou is in our hands, the Tartars are finished. And it's ours for the taking!"
So Song Jiang told the Unicorn and the others who had been with him to return to Qizhou and take a break. He himself with the other commanders and troops set out from Lone Deer Mountain to attack Youzhou.
Marshal Ho had retired to the city. His heart was heavy for the loss of his two brothers. His mood was worsened when lookouts announced that Song Jiang was advancing on them. The whole army was nervous. Troops on the battlements looked out and saw a host of red banners in the northeast and a host of blue banners in the northwest. Two armies were advancing on Youzhou. Marshal Ho was informed and was very disturbed. But when he went to see for himself, he recognized the banners, to his immense relief, as belonging to Liao. The silver characters on the red banners proclaimed them to be troops of Taizhen Xuqing, the king's son-in-law; he had five thousand men. The blue banners had gold characters and a pheasant feather, indicating that the troops belonged to General Li. This officer was a police chief and deputy head of security at the palace, an office which he had inherited from a famous ancestor. Everyone referred to him as Chief Li. He had ten thousand men under his command, and had been responsible for the original attacks on Song territory. Hearing that the King of Liao had been losing cities, he had brought his troops up in support.
Marshal Ho immediately sent messengers to both armies warning them not to enter the city but to set up an ambush beyond the mountains and rest until he had led his own army out. When Song Jiang appeared they were to attack him from either flank. After giving out these orders, Marshal Ho marched his men out of Youzhou.
As Song Jiang and his forces were approaching Youzhou, the Professor said: "If he shuts the gates and declines to come out and fight, it will mean he is not ready. If he marches his men out to face us, it will mean there is some ambush. We should divide the army into three sections for the attack. One section can head straight for Youzhou and engage the enemy. The other two can defend the right and left flanks. When the concealed troops come out they will oppose them." Song Jiang accordingly detailed Scimitar, the Son-in-Law and Hound to lead the troops on the left flank and Twin Rods with the Fire General and the Water General to command the right flank. Each with over ten thousand troops was to advance slowly by mountain paths. Song Jiang went ahead with the rest to initiate the attack on Youzhou.
When Marshal Ho led his troops out he was confronted by Song Jiang. As the two armies faced each other, Leopard's Head rode forward and challenged Marshal Ho. After less than five bouts, the Marshal turned his horse and galloped off. When Song Jiang and his men gave chase, Marshal Ho's army divided in two. Instead of entering the city they rode round it on either side. "Don't follow them!" the Professor shouted. Immediately the royal son-in-law's force appeared on the left flank and was engaged by Scimitar. From the right came Chief Li, and Twin Rods met him. Furious fighting ensued between the various armies until corpses littered the ground and blood flowed in rivers.
When it became evident that the Liao forces were not going to win, Marshal Ho wanted to return to the city. But he met two government commanders who drew near and then attacked. They were Colonel Hua and Thunderclap, hell bent on fighting him. He tried to turn away towards the west gate of the city, but here he met Twin Spears who also attacked. Heading for the south gate he met Whiskers, who engaged him at once. Abandoning any attempt to reach the city, Marshal Ho took to the highway and galloped off northwards. Too hasty to take precautions he ran into the Tamer, who appeared in front of him with his great sword raised on high.
Marshal Ho was taken completely by surprise. Before he had time to act the Tamer's sword fell plumb on his horse's head. Abandoning the horse the Marshal tried to flee on foot, but unexpectedly Madcap and Morbid, the two infantry commanders, came at him from either side striking at his abdomen. Door-God also attacked with his spear. The Marshal's troops were too demoralized to put up a fight and their commander died in a flurry of spear thrusts.
The Tartar troops scattered and ran for their lives, every man for himself. The royal son-in-law seeing the commander-in-chief's standard fall and his troops take to their heels, realized that the situation was hopeless. So he led the troops of the scarlet banner away round the mountain. Chief Li as he fought on saw that the scarlet banners had disappeared and understanding that the day was lost also retreated round the mountain with the troops of the blue banner.
When Song Jiang saw that all three armies had fled he marched his whole force into Youzhou to take control of it. Calm and composed, they marched in to the beat of a single drum. They made camp and Song Jiang issued a proclamation to reassure the people. He then sent a messenger to Tanzhou to ask Commissioner Zhao to send troops to reinforce Qizhou and ordered the boat commanders with their vessels to report to Youzhou. His second-in-command the Unicorn was ordered to defend Bazhou.
They had now seized a total of four important cities. When Commissioner Zhao received the news he was delighted. He reported to the court and also sent orders to Bazhou and Qizhou to tell the boat captains to make ready for an attack by land and water.
The Liao king held an audience which all his officials, civil and military, attended. The chief minister Youxi Bojin, together with his deputy and all the high-ranking officers were present at the discussions. The King said: "Since Song Jiang has invaded our territory and occupied four of our most important cities, sooner or later he is bound to attack our capital. Will we ever be able to defend Yanjing? Marshal Ho and his two brothers are all dead, our government officials and army commanders are faced with many serious problems. How can we manage matters?"
The commander-in-chief, Marshal Wuyan, stepped forward and said: "Have no fear, Your Majesty! I have repeatedly offered to take charge, but I was always prevented. Now in this adversity I beg you to issue a decree appointing me to command an army. I shall select troops from all regions and mobilise without delay. Song Jiang and all his gang must be captured without fail and the stolen cities restored to your rule."
The King not only granted this request but heaped him with honours; as well as the royal commission, special insignia were conferred on him. "You may ask for any commanders you wish," the King told him. "Were they princes of the blood I should command them to serve under you. Muster your army as quickly as you can, then go forth and conquer!"
Armed with the King's commission and requisition orders Marshal Wuyan went down to the drill field and recruited a large force. He ordered troops from every corner of the land to be brought in to swell the numbers. When this was being done his eldest son, Yanshou, entered the review stand and said: "Father, while you are preparing the army let me go ahead with a number of commanders to join up with the King's son-in-law and Chief Li. We will go to Youzhou and destroy most of the rebel force. Then when you arrive you can clear out the rest, easy as catching a turtle in a jar! Does this meet with your approval?"
"What you say is good, my son. You can take five thousand swift cavalry, twenty thousand hardened troops, and form the vanguard. Then as soon as you've linked up with the King's son-in-law and the Chief of Security you can attack. If you've a victory to report, send word at once." With these orders, the young commander set off most contentedly to organise a complete army and head for Youzhou. It was truly a case of 10000 galloping horses affright heaven and earth, 1000 dashing commanders trouble gods and ghosts.

Song Jiang Wages a Big Battle at Youzhou; Twin Rods Huyan Zhuo Forcibly Captures a Tartar General

Yanshou, leading twenty thousand men, after joining forces with Taizhen the Royal Son-in-Law and Security General Li, had thirty-five thousand soldiers under his command. He made sure their arms and equipment were all in order, and then set forth. A scout soon reported this to Song Jiang in Youzhou. Song conferred with Wu Yong, his military advisor.
"We've defeated the Liao forces several times in a row. They must be sending their crack troops and best generals against us. What should our tactics be?"
"Station our army outside the city and wait. Challenge them when they arrive. If we show them up as incompetent, they'll of course withdraw."
"Clever and clear, Military Advisor." Song Jiang ordered his contingents to leave the city.
Ten //from Youzhou is a flat plain called Fangshan. It is fringed by mountains and streams. Here, the army deployed into a Nine-Unit Octagon battle position.
Before long, the Tartars came into sight, in three columns. The one under young commander Yanshou, Wuyan's son, carried black banners. The Royal Son-in-Law's column bore red banners. Green were the banners of the Security General's column. All three spread out in battle positions when they saw Song Jiang's army.
Yanshou had learned military tactics under his father's personal tutelage. His knowledge was profound, his skill tricky. He viewed Song Jiang's battle formation, then directed his red and green banner contingents to deploy to left and right and build fortifications. He himself mounted a "sky ladder" amid his central column and observed Song Jiang's position. He came down with a superior smile on his face.
"Why are you smiling, General?" his lieutenants asked.
"That Nine-Unit Octagon of Song Jiang—who doesn't know that! It can't fool anybody. I'll just give him a scare."
He ordered three flourishes on the decorated battle drums, and had a command platform erected. Mounting the platform, with two flags he signalled deployment instructions to his left and right columns. Then he came down, got on his horse, directed his top officers to spread out the army, and rode to the front to confront Song Jiang.
He shouted: "You Nine-Unit Octagon can't deceive anyone! Do you recognize my formation?"
So the Tartar commander wanted to vie in deployment positions, did he? Song Jiang directed that "sky ladders" be erected, and he, Wu Yong and Zhu Wu climbed up to have a look at the Liao contingents. The three columns were linked, with left and right near enough to provide mutual support.
Zhu Wu recognized it immediately. "That's called the Great Monad and Three Powers—Heaven, Earth and Man," he told Song Jiang.
Leaving the other two on the command platform, Song Jiang came down and rode to the front. He pointed with his whip at Yanshou.
"You've set out a Great Monad and Three Powers position," he called. "There's nothing special about that."
"So you recognize it," said the young Tartar. "Watch us change, and see if you still know it." He turned and rode back to his command platform, mounted it and signalled a change with his flags.
Wu Yong and Zhu Wu, from their platform, saw that the foe had assumed a Four Elephants formation. They sent word to Song Jiang. Meanwhile, Yanshou had again emerged and sat his steed, weapon athwart.
"Do you recognize our position?" he demanded.
"You've converted into a Four Elephants formation."
The young Tartar shook his head in surprise and laughed coldly. Again he climbed his platform and signalled with his flags, while Wu Yong and Zhu Wu watched from their own platform. "That's the Revolving Octagon," said Zhu Wu. Again he notified Song Jiang.
Thoughtfully, Yanshou said to himself: "I learned these deployments from teachers in secret, yet he identified them all. He must have some talented people on his staff."
Again he returned to his central column, got down from his horse, climbed the platform, and signalled with his flags. His army broke into eight eights, or sixty-four units, with no opening on any side. Zhu Wu, on the "sky ladder," recognized it.
"That's the Eight-Sector Diagram of Zhuge Liang," he told Wu Yong. "Head and tail are both concealed. No one knows where they are." They dispatched a man to request Song Jiang to come up and see for himself!
"Don't underestimate that Liao general," they advised him when he had joined them on the platform. "Those four are all traditional battle positions. They've been passed down without change. The first was the Great Monad and Three Powers. From that came the Four Elephants, which then produced the Revolving Octagon, which converted to the Eight-Sector Diagram. An incomparable progression, a matchless deployment!"
Song Jiang came down from the platform, mounted, and rode to the front. The Tartar general stabbed his halberd into the ground and reined in.
"Can you recognize our position?" he shouted.
"You are only a young commander with narrow vision, like a frog at the bottom of a well! All you know is these few deployments. Moves like your Eight-Sector Diagram, with its concealed head, couldn't deceive even a child of the Song empire!"
"Since you know all of my battle positions, why not lay out a marvellous one of your own? See if you can fool me!"
"I only know the Nine-Unit Octagon. It may not be very profound, but dare you attack?"
The young Tartar laughed. "A small operation, nothing to it! Don't pull anything sneaky. Just watch us knock you over!"
He ordered the Royal Son-in-Law and the Security General to be ready with a thousand men each. "After I drive into their position," he told them, "you reinforce me." His battle drums began to pound.
Song Jiang also ordered three flourishes on his battle drums, and directed that the gate of pennants be opened and the young general be allowed to enter.
Yanshou assembled a task force of around twenty junior officers and a thousand armored cavalrymen. He calculated on his fingers that this was a "fire" day, and therefore decided not to attack from due south. He led his contingent around to the left to a point southwest of his objective, unfurled his white banners, and charged. Only half his unit was able to penetrate the Song lines. A shower of arrows halted the rear half and sent it back to its own position.
The young Tartar drove directly into Song Jiang's central column. Suddenly, a silvery metal barricade seemed to rise all around him. He blanched and thought: "Where did that wall come from?" He ordered his men to push out the way they came in.
But when they turned they saw behind them a misty silvery sea. Everywhere was gurgling water, but no path. Increasingly agitated, Yanshou led his troops due south, but a ball of fire, spewing long rays like sunset beams, rolled before them. Not a single enemy soldier was in sight. The young Tartar dared not advance in that direction.
They swerved to the east, only to be confronted by leafy trees and tangled undergrowth and, at either end, stakes of branches sharpened like deer antlers. They'd never get through there! But when they turned north a black mist covered the sky and somber clouds hid the sun. They couldn't see their hands in front of their faces. It was as dark as the chambers of Hell.
Yanshou was completely stymied. "Song Jiang must be working some magic," he said to himself. "It's hopeless. All we can do is smash our way out, or die trying!" He gave the command and his men charged, yelling.
"Where do you think you're going, infant general!" boomed the voice of a big commander who suddenly broke through from the side. A rod flew down towards Yanshou's forehead. Sharp-eyed and nimble, he parried the blow with his crescent-bladed halberd. But immediately a pair of rods struck, snapping his weapon in two. Before he could resist, the foe closed in swiftly, locked him effortlessly in ape-like arms and, with a single twist of his wolf-like waist, lifted him from his saddle and captured him.
Blocked, his cavalry troop obeyed when they were shouted at to dismount. They could see nothing in the stygian darkness. They had no choice but to get down from their horses and surrender. The man who had taken Yanshou prisoner was none other than Tiger Chieftain Two Rods Huyan Zhuo. Gongsun Sheng, who had worked the magic, on learning that the young Tartar general had been caught, put an end to the spell. The sun once more shone on the battlefield from a clear blue sky.
Meanwhile, Taizhen the Royal Son-in-Law and Security General Li, each with a thousand soldiers, waited for news so that they could bring up their reinforcements. But since, to their surprise, they heard nothing, they didn't venture to move. Song Jiang now appeared at the front and called to them.
"Surrender, you two units. What are you waiting for? We've already captured Yanshou." At his order, his swordsmen pushed the young Tartar general forward.
Security General Li spurred his horse and galloped to rescue Yanshou with levelled lance. Qin Ming the Thunderbolt, brandishing his wolf-toothed cudgel, rode out to meet him. They clashed, weapons flailing, as the two armies set up a mighty yell.
Li lost his nerve, and his hands faltered. One blow from the wolf-toothed cudgel shattered his helmet and his skull together. He fell in a heap to the ground.

The sight was too much for the Royal Son-in-Law. He retreated rapidly with his unit. Song Jiang ordered his men to pursue. The great Liao forces fled in utter defeat. More than three thousand cavalry mounts were captured that day. Fallen banners and weapons filled the valley. Song Jiang led his troops on to Yanjing, determined to roll up the rest of the foe and win back all imperial territory under Liao domination.

Remnants of the defeated Tartar contingent reached Commander-in-Chief Wuyan and told him that his son Yanshou had been captured in battle and all his officers had surrendered. Security General Li had been killed by a blow of Qin Ming's club and his troops had fled, no one knew where. Taizhen the Royal Son-in-Law had also run for his life. There was no news of him, either.

Wuyan was shocked. "My son studied military art since childhood. He was very adept," he said. "How could that rogue Song Jiang have captured him?"

"And all he had was a Nine-Unit Octagon defense. Nothing remarkable," Wuyan's lieutenants added. "Yet when our young general formed four different deployments, that barbarian knew every one of them. He said to him: 'You recognized my Nine-Unit Octagon, but dare you attack?' And when we charged from the west with over a thousand cavalry, he deluged us with arrows so that only half our men got through, and somehow he captured our young general."

"That Nine-Unit Octagon is easy enough to hit," mused Wuyan. "He probably converted it into something else."

"We could see from our command platform—he didn't move his troops and his flags didn't change," the commanders assured him. "But a black cloud covered the battlefield."

"He must have used magic. If we don't muster our army, the scoundrel is sure to come here. I'll win victory or kill myself! Who dares to lead soldiers as my vanguard general?"

Two high-ranking officers promptly stepped forward and volunteered. One was Qiong Yaonayan, a national army general. The other was Kou Zhenyuan, a general of the Yanjing city contingent.

Wuyan was pleased. He said: "Proceed cautiously. Take a vanguard of ten thousand and open a road through the mountains. Where necessary, build bridges. Our main force will follow."

The two departed. Wuyan then appointed eleven senior generals and twenty-eight lieutenant-generals as commanders of the expeditionary force. It would consist of over two hundred thousand crack troops—all the country's available soldiers. He would petition the king himself to lead it.

Meanwhile, Qiong and Kou advanced through the mountains with their ten thousand men. A scout reported to Song Jiang in Youzhou the approach of this formidable foe. Startled, Song Jiang notified Lu the Magnate to bring as many men as possible. He also ordered the transfer of troops from Tanzhou and Qizhou, and invited Commissioner Zhao to come and observe the operations. He directed his naval chieftains to call their sailors ashore, and assemble in Bazhou before continuing their march.

Commissioner Zhao, under the protection of the naval chieftains, arrived last. All required forces were now congregated in Youzhou. After greetings had been exchanged, Commissioner Zhao complimented Song Jiang.

"You're so tireless, General, a pillar of our country! Your fame, your irradicable virtue, shall be known for countless generations. When I return to the capital, I shall recommend you highly to the emperor."

"A useless small official like me is not worth mentioning. Basking in the reflected glory of our great emperor and benefiting from Your Excellency's splendid prestige, I have made some small accomplishments. Anyone could have done the same. I have recently been informed that Tartar Commander-in-Chief Wuyan, by draining his nation's military manpower, has raised an army of over two hundred thousand, and is heading this way. Victory or defeat depends on the coming battle. I propose that you build a fort fifteen //from here, Commissioner, and observe how my brothers and I exercise our utmost fidelity and strength in this decisive engagement! Sustained by the emperor's overflowing virtue, we sure shall win victory to show our gratitude for His Majesty's benevolence!"

"Use your opportunities well, General. Sun Zi said: 'More calculation or less calculation determines victory or defeat.' Plan your strategy carefully. Consider every detail."

Song Jiang bid farewell to the commissioner and set off with Lu the Magnate at the head of a large army. They skirted Yongqing County, which is part of Youzhou Prefecture, set up camp and built fortifications. All the chieftains assembled in the headquarters tent for a conference.

"Wuyan is leading the entire Liao army against us," said Song Jiang. "This is no small matter. The battle will decide our life or death. You brothers must push forward and never retreat. The smallest merit will be reported to the court, and the emperor's rewards will be mutually shared. No one person will reap the benefits."

The chieftains rose and said: "We would never dare disobey your orders. We shall do our best in gratitude for your great kindness."

Song Jiang directed that he be brought to the tent to present the document. Opening it, Song Jiang read that Generals Qiong and Kou, who were under Commander-in-Chief Wuyan of the Kingdom of Liao, as leaders of a vanguard force challenged the Song army to a decisive battle on the morrow. Song Jiang noted his acceptance on the bottom of the document. He ordered that the emissary be given food and wine and allowed to return to his own encampment. At daybreak the following day victory or defeat would be determined.

It was late autumn and early winter then. The men wore heavy armor, hide coverings protected the horses. The Song troops finished breakfast before dawn. When the sun topped the horizon, they broke camp and marched. Before they had gone five //they saw the Liao army in the distance. Amid the foe's embroidered black flags, two vanguard banners glistened. Battle drums thundered, the gate of pennants opened, and General Qiong rode forth. Lance athwart his prancing horse, he halted at the edge of the field of combat.

Song Jiang, beneath his own gate of pennants, was impressed by Qiong's heroic appearance. "Who will vie with this general?" he asked.

Nine Dragons Shi Jin, sword in hand, galloped forward on bounding steed. The two chargers met and their riders battled, sword against lance in a dazzling pattern of motion. Four arms thrust and flailed, eight hoofs churned the turf. Twenty or thirty rounds the men fought. Shi Jin felt his strength ebbing. He turned his horse and headed back towards his own position, with Qiong in hot pursuit.

Hua Rong, who had been directly behind Song Jiang, notched an arrow to his bowstring and rode to the front. When the Tartar was close enough, Hua Rong let fly. The arrow struck Qiong in the face and knocked him from his saddle. Shi Jin, hearing him fall, wheeled his mount around and raced back. With one sweep of the sword, he dispatched Qiong Yaonayan. Though an able warrior, the poor Tartar official nevertheless lost his life.

Sun Li the Sickly General galloped out to engage Kou. Pounding battle drums shook the heavens, the air rang with ear-splitting yells. Sun Li's lance darted like a thing possessed. Kou was eight-tenths afraid. After only twenty or so rounds, he turned his horse and fled. Rather than disturb his army's front, he circled to the northeast.

Sun Li, eager to distinguish himself, didn't slacken his chase. Kou was well in the lead. The Sickly General set his lance in its socket, took his bow in his left hand, notched an arrow with his right, and drew the bow to its full. Aiming at Kou's back, he let fly.

The Tartar heard the twang and threw himself prone. As the arrow whizzed by, he snatched it. Sun Li silently applauded his foe. Kou laughed scornfully.

"The rogue thinks he's an archer!"

He clamped the arrow between his teeth and set his lance in the saddle rings. Quickly, he grasped a stiff bow in his left hand, fitted the arrow with his right, twisted around in the saddle and shot at Sun Li's chest.

The Sickly General had seen what the Tartar was up to, and had been riding a zig-zag course. He flung himself back as the arrow neared him, and it flew harmlessly past. His steed couldn't be checked. It careened onward at an all-out run.

"That arrow must have got him," he thought.

But Sun Li was only pretending. His powerful legs gripped his animal's middle in a tight clasp which prevented him from falling off. Kou slowed his mount and turned to capture his pursuer. When the two horses were only a few meters apart, Sun Li suddenly sat up.

"If I don't take you now," he yelled, "you'll surely run away!"

Kou was stunned. But he shouted back: "You dodged my arrow; let's see you avoid my lance!" He thrust at Sun Li with all his force. Sun Li swelled his chest, let the point clang against his armour, slides off to the side, and then he moved in swiftly and grappled with his opponent. He raised the steel rod hanging from his wrist and brought it down in a crushing blow which tore away half of Kou's pate. The Tartar commander who for most of his life had been an official in Zhenyuan, died at Sun Li's hand, and his corpse lay at his horse's feet. With upraised lance, Sun Li returned to the front. Song Jiang and his army charged the foe. Leaderless, the Tartars fled in all directions. Song Jiang was still pursuing them when he heard ahead a volley of cannon fire. He ordered his naval chieftains to take a contingent and block the water approaches. Just as he was directing Hua Rong, Qin Ming, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng to ride to the top of the mountain and keep watch, he saw the Tartars rumbling towards them in swarms which covered the earth. Song Jiang was terrified. His three souls shook and his 7 spirits trembled. Truly, no matter how clever a man may be, it is difficult to escape danger.

The young Tartar commander, Marshal Wuyan's son, with his twenty thousand or more Tartar troops, met up with the royal son-in-law and Chief Li, to constitute an army of over thirty-five thousand. Fully equipped as to weapons and all other necessary items, they formed up and marched off. Before long a scout was reporting this to Song Jiang in Youzhou.

"The enemy have suffered several defeats in a row," Song Jiang said to the Professor. "This time they must have picked experienced troops and top commanders for their attack on us. What's our best plan?"

The Professor said: "Form our men up outside the city. When the Tartars get here we must engage them cautiously, to test them out. If they are no good they will retreat."

Accordingly Song Jiang ordered his troops to take up a position some three or four miles from the city — at a place called Square Mountain, where the ground was level. They were to occupy an area bordering the river at the foot of the mountain in the formation known as the "Eight Trigrams". After a while they saw the Tartar army approaching in three divisions.

The young commander's troops marched under a black banner, the royal son-in-law's under a red banner and Chief Li's under a green banner. The attack was well coordinated. When he saw Song Jiang's formation — under his father's tuition he had become expert in strategy and also in the magic arts — he ordered the red and green divisions to take up positions on either flank and secure themselves. In his own position among the central force he had an observation tower set up and climbed it. Having observed that Song Jiang's formation was indeed the Eight Trigrams one he came down again with a superior smile on his face. "Why do you smile, sir?" his second-in-command asked.

"Because everyone knows that Eight Trigrams formation of theirs," he said. "Who do they think they can fool with that? I'm going to give them a nasty surprise, you'll see!"

He ordered three beats of the drum to be sounded. Then he had a command platform set up. In obedience to signals from two flags on the platform his army wheeled right and left to take up a certain formation, after which he descended again and mounted his horse, ordered the soldiers in his front ranks to make way and rode out in front to parley with Song Jiang.

"Who do you think to impress with your Eight Trigrams formation?" the young commander shouted. "Do you understand what formation I've got?"

Realizing that the Tartar general wanted to compete in battle strategy, Song Jiang ordered an observation platform to be raised and with the Professor and the Strategist mounted it to observe the enemy formation. He saw their three armies drawn up so that the right and left flanks were facing each other. The Strategist recognized this at once. "It's what they call the Trinity," he told Song Jiang. Leaving the other two on the platform, Song Jiang came down and mounted and rode out in front. Pointing with his whip he said: "Do you really suppose there's something special about your Trinity?"

The young commander said: "All right, so you recognize our formation. But just watch our manoeuvres. You'll see something you don't know." He rode back and climbed the platform again. At a signal from the flags the formation changed. The Professor and the Strategist, who were still on their platform, saw the new formation take shape as the Magic Square and sent someone down to inform Song Jiang.

The young commander rode out in front again, resting his halberd and said: "Now can you tell what our formation is?"

"The Magic Square," said Song Jiang.

The young commander gave a curt nod. He returned to his ranks and mounted the platform and again came the signals introduce another change.

The Strategist said: "This is the Revolving Octagon." The messenger informed Song Jiang again. The young commander rode out and shouted in a very loud voice: "Now can you name our formation?"

Song Jiang laughed pityingly and said: "I should say it's just the Revolving Octagon!"

This gave the young commander food for thought. "All these formations were handed down to me confidentially. I didn't expect this fellow would be able to recognize them. The Song army must have some outstanding people." He rode back and mounted the platform again. More signals and the troops wheeled round to form an impenetrable square made up of eight times eight units, sixty-four that is. The Strategist took a good look and said to the Professor: "This is Zhuge Liang's Eight Times Eight. It conceals the front and the rear, so you can't tell where they are." They sent someone to ask Song Jiang to come up and see the formation. "Don't underestimate him," they said. "These formations of theirs are straight from the textbook. First the Trinity, then the Magic Square, then the Revolving Octagon and then the Eight Times Eight: it's a sequence which permits a seamless transforma-tion and is considered the acme of military tactics."

Song Jiang descended from the platform, mounted his charger and rode out in front. The young commander grasped his halberd, pulled his horse up in front of the other army and shouted: "Do you recognize my formation now?"

Song Jiang shouted back: "You're just too green! You're as limited in your views as the frog in the bottom of a well. All you know is these manoeuvres which you think so great. You don't really think you can fool anyone, do you, with your Eight times Eight and hiding the front rank? Our great Song army certainly isn't going to be put off by a mere boy!"

"All right, so you know my formations, let's see if you can produce something to surprise me then!"

"We'll stick with this old formation of ours. You don't think much of it, but do you dare attack it?"

The young commander sneered: "With such feeble strategy, how can it be a problem? You don't realize what a chance you're taking! We shall smash you to pieces!"

He gave out his orders. The royal son-in-law and Chief Li were to command a thousand men each and wait till he had made a breach in the opposing ranks, then come in to back him up. The drum was sounded in the main army.

On the Song side the drum was also sounded three times and the troops were instructed to fall back on two sides before the young commander's attack and let him through.

The young commander mustered a score of his officers and a thousand armoured cavalry. After doing some calculations on his fingers he worked out that it was a fire day and decided not to attack directly from the south, the direction of fire. He led his troops round to the left flank, on the west. A white flag was unfurled and they charged. The troops of his rear were halted by a hail of crossbow bolts, so only half his force got through. The rest returned to their ranks.

Once inside the enemy position, the young commander charged Song Jiang's main army. But suddenly they seemed to be surrounded by an expanse of shining white, like the sides of a steel box. It was a sight that made the young commander turn pale as a sheet. "How can they have defences like this in the middle of their army?" he asked himself in amazement. He ordered everyone to try to break through and fight their way back the way they had come. But when they looked back they saw nothing but a vast white surface like a sea of silver, and heard nothing but the sound of water. They could see no way through. Still more alarmed, the young commander led his men towards the south opening. But here they were confronted by a hundred balls of fire and thousands of fiery threads snaking out over the ground. Of enemy troops there was no sign. He dared not approach this south opening so he headed diagonally towards the east gate, only to find the way again blocked by the leafy branches of trees and mountains of timber strewn on the ground, defended on all sides by deer's' antlers. Again, no way through. Turning back to the north opening, they found a thick black mist veiling the sky, a dark cloud obscuring the sun: if you held out your hand you couldn't see the fingers, it was dark as hell. So there he was, stuck in the middle of the enemy force, stymied at every turn. "Song Jiang must be employing magic," he thought to himself. "No point in asking how, we've just got to get out or die in the attempt." He gave his troops the order and with a mighty yell they charged.

At this moment a tall warrior sprang up on one side and shouted: "Where do you think you're going to, youngster?"

The young commander was prepared to put up a fight, but before he could strike a blow, a rod flashed towards his head. His reflexes were quick and he parried with his square halberd. There was a loud crack as two rods broke the halberd in half. As he tried to resist, his opponent thrust at his chest and with a supple movement seized him and dragged him from the saddle. So dark was it that the rest of his troops could not make out what was going on. They had no alternative but to dismount and surrender. The young commander's captor was none other than that fearsome warrior Twin Rods Huyan Zhuo.

All this time Taoist Gongsun with the main army had been weaving his spells. Now the young commander had been captured, Taoist Gongsun put away his magic and normal daylight returned.

Meanwhile the royal son-in-law and Chief Li, each with a thousand men, were waiting in the wings for the signal to attack in support of their commander. To their surprise they saw no sign of battle, so they dared not attack. Song Jiang now rode out in front of his men and shouted across the divide: "You'd better surrender; what're you waiting for? We've your young commander!"

He told a group of swordsmen to push the captive out in front. When Chief Li saw his commander a captive, he galloped forward with his spear to rescue him. But Thunderclap, who was in the front ranks, charged out with his wolf's-tooth mace and flew at him. The horses clashed, the weapons were raised, and a continuous roar rose from the 2 armies. Chief Li was the first to waver. His reactions began to slow and Thunderclap caught him with a blow on the head that pierced and shattered his helmet. He crashed to the ground. The royal son-in-law seeing Chief Li defeated withdrew his forces. Song Jiang ordered his whole army into action and the Tartar troops were routed. Over three thousand horses were taken, and the whole valley was littered with abandoned banners, spears and halberds. Song Jiang now led his army to attack Yanjing, determined to push back the enemy and recapture all the stolen territory for his Emperor.

When the defeated Tartars fled to their capital and saw Marshal Wuyan, they told him how his son had attacked the Song army and been captured alive and how all his officers had surrendered. They told too how Chief Li had died there and the royal son-in-law had run for his life and no one knew where he was. The Marshal was thoroughly perplexed: "My son has studied military tactics since he was small," he said. "He knows all there is to know about it. What kind of formation did that devil Song Jiang use to capture him?"

"Just the ordinary Eight Trigrams formation, nothing special at all," they told him. "Our young commander tried out four different formations and that madman knew them all. In the end he said to our general: 'You know all about this formation of ours, but do you dare to attack it?' Our general ordered an attack by over a thousand cavalry from the west. We were fired on by their archers and crossbowmen and only half the riders got through. How they managed to take him alive we can't tell you."

The Marshal said: "He wouldn't have had any trouble attacking a familiar formation like that. They must have switched to another one."

"We were on the command platform," the generals said. "We could observe their formation. The ranks did not move, the signal flags did not change. All we saw was a black cloud hovering overhead which hid their army."

"Then it must be magic," the Marshal said. "Now, if I don't attack first, they'll be coming here. If I can't defeat them I shall cut my own throat! Who will volunteer to be in my vanguard? Who will lead the attack? I must stay with the main force."

Two commanders stepped up together: "We two want to be first," they said. One was General Qiong from the main army, the other General Kou from the Yanjing garrison.

The Marshal was pleased. "Take great care, then, both of you," he said. "I shall give you ten thousand troops to form the vanguard. Remember it's up to you to open the way and do your very best. I shall be right behind you with the main army."

While Qiong and Kou prepared and then set off, leading the vanguard, Marshal Wuyan mustered a huge army under eleven illustrious generals and twenty-eight commanders.

Song Jiang's spies informed him that Qiong and Kou were attacking and that the enemy force was not negligible. Not a little concerned, he called for the Unicorn's troops, as well as the garrisons previously established at Tanzhou and Qizhou. He invited Commissioner Zhao to come and direct the campaign. He also told the boat captains to disembark all hands and to muster in Bazhou to join the battle on land.

The boat captains brought Commissioner Zhao up to Youzhou. Song Jiang and the others received him and after greetings had been exchanged the Commissioner said to Song Jiang: "You are most diligent, General, a true pillar of the state, your name will live ten thousand years. When I return to the court I will most certainly commend you to the Emperor."

Song Jiang replied: "My merit is slight, I have done nothing of significance. Any achievement I have is due to the Emperor's graciousness and your reputation, sir, not to my own ability. Today I received a report on the military situation. I heard that Marshal Wuyan of Liao has enlisted two hundred thousand troops to dispute the government of this country with us. This time it is prosper or perish, sink or swim, this battle is going to be decisive. I would ask Your Excellency to set up camp about five miles away where you can observe the contest. I shall do everything in my power, you will see, and I trust that my comrades and I can go forward to victory."

The Commissioner said: "I trust your judgement."

Song Jiang bade Commissioner Zhao farewell and with the Unicorn marched the main army to the village of Everbright where they halted and made camp. He summoned all the leaders to his tent to discuss the military situation. "This time Marshal Wuyan is going to lead the Tartar forces himself," he told them. "Their arrival is imminent and it has to be taken very seriously! Our very lives and the success of our mission will depend on this battle. Each and every one of you must go forward valiantly, there can be no thought of retreating. Any success you achieve will reach the ears of the Emperor who is sure to reward you, to the benefit of us all."

As one man, they rose to their feet and said: "No one would dream of disregarding our Leader's orders!"

Whilst these discussions were going on a sentry came to report the arrival of a Tartar emissary with a declaration of war. Song Jiang had him brought in to his tent and the missive was presented. Song Jiang broke the seal. He read that the two aides to the Tartar commander-in-chief Marshal Wuyan, leaders of his vanguard, were proposing a decisive battle in the coming days. Song Jiang signified his acceptance at the bottom of the letter. He ordered the envoy to be given wine and food and then sent back to his camp.

Autumn was over and winter just beginning. Everyone was wearing heavy armour and the horses had their protective leather trappings, so the season was propitious. The following day they breakfasted at dawn and set out. They had not gone much more than a mile when they came face to face with the Tartars.

General Qiong rode out in front on a prancing steed. Song Jiang was impressed by the sight. "Who wants to do battle with that commander?" he asked.

Then Shi Jin the Tattooed Dragon galloped out on a mettlesome charger, sword in hand and rode to join battle with Qiong. The horses clashed, weapons were swung. After 32 bouts, the Tattooed Dragon aimed a blow that missed its target. Disconcerted by this, he turned his horse and galloped back towards his own ranks. Colonel Hua who was behind Song Jiang saw the Tattooed Dragon bested and grasped his bow. He fitted an arrow to it and guided his horse forward. The arrow whizzed to its target, striking Qiong square in the forehead, knocking him from his horse. The Tattooed Dragon hearing him fall turned immediately and with another sword blow finished him off. When Kou saw the fate of his comrade, the iron entered his soul. Lance at the ready, he charged forward and shouted: "You rebel dogs, how dare you conspire against my brother!" Immediately Colonel Sun galloped towards him. Drums sounded to the heavens the shouting was endless. Colonel Sun's work with the steel spear was awe-inspiring. Kou barely lasted twenty bouts, before reining in his horse and fleeing. He dared not return to his own side for fear of becoming entangled with the front ranks, so he rode round them on the northeast. Colonel Sun was after glory and didn't want to let him get away. He gave his horse its head and galloped in pursuit. Kou had already put a fair distance between them. Colonel Sun rested his lance, took his bow in his left hand and an arrow in his right, bent the bow to the full and, aiming carefully at his opponent's back, let fly. Kou, hearing the snap of the bowstring, bent over and just before the arrow hit stretched out his hand and grasped it. Even Colonel Sun, when he saw this, could not help applauding in his heart. Kou smiled grimly to himself. "The blighter thinks he's a dab hand with the bow." He put the arrow between his teeth, placed his lance in the rest, took his own bow in his left hand and the arrow in his right, fitted the arrow to the string, twisted round in the saddle, and fired at Colonel Sun's chest. Colonel Sun saw what was going on out of the corner of his eye. He swayed this way and that, and as the arrow was about to strike leant over backwards so that it passed harmlessly overhead. His horse bolted. Kou hung the bow on his shoulder and straightened up. Seeing Sun go over backwards, he thought he must have hit him. But Colonel Sun had a firm seat and his legs pressed the stirrups while he lay along the horse's back, keeping him in the saddle. Kou turned and headed back to take him. As the 2 horses' heads seemed about to meet, with no more than a yard or two between them, Colonel Sun jerked himself upright and let out a piercing yell. For a moment, Kou was taken aback. Then he recovered and said, "You managed to avoid my arrow but you'll be unable to dodge my spear," and aimed a mighty thrust at Colonel Sun's chest. The other raised his arm to ward off the blow and the spear point merely glanced off his armour and grazed his ribs. Kou tried to get in close. Sun raised the jointed steel whip that hung from his wrist and flicked it at the other's head. It sliced off half his skull. Thus did General Kou, who had served the Tartars for half a lifetime, meet his death at the hands of Colonel Sun. His lifeless body crashed to the ground at his horse's feet, while Colonel Sun placed his lance in the ring and returned to his own side. Song Jiang gave his troops free rein to Harry the enemy. The Tartars, now leaderless, scurried away in all directions, every man for himself. As Song Jiang gave chase, he heard ahead of him a series of loud reports. He ordered the waterborne leaders to take a body of men to block the river inlet. He told Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, the Little Duke, and the Halberdier to ride to the hilltop to see what was going on. They observed a scene of great confusion, as a horde of Tartar troops poured forward. It was a chilling sight.

Commander-in-Chief Marshal Wu Yan Sets Up & employs the Zodiac Deployment; The Mystic Queen Counsels & Instructs Song Jiang in a Dream

From a bluff Song Jiang viewed the powerful Liao army, then rode quickly back to his own position. He ordered a withdrawal to a mountain pass in Yongqing County. There, in his tent, he conferred with Lu the Magnate, Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng.

"Although we defeated them in battle and killed two of their vanguard generals," he said, "the army I saw from the bluff is huge and strong. They're coming in endless lines. Only a tremendous force can deal with them. But we're comparatively few. What can we do?"

"Skilled generals among the ancients were able to defeat larger foes and do it beautifully," said Wu Yong. "In the old days, Xie Xuan of the state of Jin, with fifty thousand troops, beat back Fu Jian with twice that number. There have been many such cases. What are you worried about! Order out soldiers to go into battle with pennants tightly ranked, arrows notched to the bows, swords out of their scabbards. Set deer antler stakes in depth, alertly defend our camps. Construct good trenches and fortifications, have our weapons all laid out, our ladders and cannons in working order, and everything in proper readiness. We'll deploy simply in the Nine-Unit Octagon. This will be our defense. Though they come with a million soldiers, they won't dare to attack!"

"Well put, Military Advisor," said Song Jiang. He transmitted his instructions and directed his chieftains to await his orders.

Breakfast was before dawn the next day, and they broke camp when the sun cleared the horizon. They marched to the border of Changping County, spread out in battle formation, and set up new encampments. Foremost were the cavalry. Then came the infantry under Tiger General Qin Ming, with Huyan Zhuo to the rear, Guan Sheng on the left, Lin Chong on the right. Suo Chao was southeast, Xu Ning northeast, Dong Ping southwest, and Yang Zhi northwest. Song Jiang commanded the central contingent. The other chieftains maintained their original posts. The rear infantry established another position, under the command of Lu Junyi the Magnate, Lu Zhishen and Wu Song.

Amid their thousands of troops, the chieftains, talented militarists every one, rubbed their hands and prepared for the slaughter. The positions were laid out. They were ready for the Tartars.

Before long, they saw the Liao contingents moving forward in the distance. First came six units, serving both as an opening wedge and a defensive shield, three to the left and three to the right, five hundred men in each, the relative positions of the units shifting constantly.

Behind these the main force followed, their numbers covering the earth. The lead contingent was a sea of black flags and it stretched out in a row of seven cavalry troops, with a thousand riders in each, and each led by a senior commander. How were the commanders attired? Black helmets, armor and robes, astride ebony steeds and bearing ordinary arms. Each troop was designated by one of the Seven Northern Constellations.

The commanding general of all seven had on his standard the Mystic Militant Water Planet of the North. How was he dressed? A brown bandanna which covered his forehead bound his long silky black hair. Over a sleeveless black robe was silver armor chilling to behold. A lion's head belt clasped the darkly gleaming metal. He sat his spirited stallion firmly in a saddle of tooled leather. Hanging from his shoulder, the quiver bearing his arrows and hard bow of scoured poplar was decorated with animals rampant and flying fish. He held a three-pointed, two-edged, four-sided, eight-ringed sword. His name was Quli Chuqing and his personal troop consisted of three thousand horsemen with black shoulder-length hair, and their standard was the Five Vapors Constellation of the North. Supporting the black bannered contingent were infantry without number.

Green dragons writhed on the banners of the left contingent, which advanced in a row of seven cavalry troops, with a thousand riders in each, and each led by a senior commander. How were these commanders dressed? In four-seamed helmets, scaled armor in the shape of poplar leaves covering robes of kingfisher green. They rode horses with manes dyed green, and carried regular weapons. The Seven Eastern Constellations were the standards for the seven troops, and over them all was a commanding general whose standard was the Green Dragon Wood Planet of the East.

How was he attired? A lion's head helmet, armor from the hide of a fleet horse over a fine green robe, bound by a girdle of gold and green jade. He sat a saddle of tooled leather, a quiver of bow and arrows hung from his waist, and his hawk's beak boots were planted in stirrups of precious metal. In his hand was a crescent-bladed battle-ax with a filigreed gold handle, and his dragon horse was of the Clear Jade breed. His name was Zhi'er Folang and his personal troop contained three thousand cavalrymen bearing green banners. Their standard was the Nine Vapors Constellation of the East. Supporting the green bannered contingent were countless foot soldiers.

The right contingent, bearing white tiger banners, contained seven cavalry troops in a row, with a thousand riders in each, and each led by a senior commander. How were these commanders attired? In water-burnished helmets, and shining silver armor over plain silk robes. They rode snowy white horses and carried hand-gripped weapons, and their seven troops were designated by the Seven Western Constellations.

Over all seven was a commanding general whose standard was the Gold Planet of the Deep Pool of the West. How was he dressed? In a conical helmet with phoenix feathers, and double hooked armor of patterned silver plus a coldly gleaming jade belt over a fitted plain silk robe of flying snowflakes design. He rode a fleet steed of the Jade That Shines in the Night breed, and wielded a silver halberd of pure steel. His name was Wuli Kean, and his personal troop contained three thousand horsemen bearing white-tasseled silk pennants. Their standard was the Seven Vapors Constellation of the West. Before and behind the white bannered contingent were supporting infantry without number.

Pink banners marked the rear contingent—seven cavalry troops in a row, each with a thousand horsemen, each led by a senior commander. How were these commanders attired? In conical hats of ochre red and robes dyed the color of orangoutan blood, over which was chain and fish-scale armor of peach pink. They rode roan chargers called Red Rabbits and carried grip-handled weapons. The troops were named after the Seven Southern Constellations. Over all was a commanding general whose standard was the Ochre Peacock Fire Planet.

How was he dressed? In a stitched cap with shiny red tassels, and a purple-sheened pink robe covered by armor with a sunset design, and boots basted with red thread. A red leather belt encrusted with precious stones bound his waist, a quiver containing a hard bow and arrows hung from his shoulder. He carried an eight-foot-long dragon sword in his hand and rode a rough-red steed. He was General Dongxian Wenrong, and he led a personal troop of three thousand horsemen bearing red silk pennants. Their standard was the Three Vapors Constellation of the South. Supporting the pink-bannered contingent were foot soldiers without number in red-tasseled, red-stitched clothes.

In front of the Liao fixed position to the left were five thousand fierce horsemen, wearing caps stitched with gold thread and gold-plated armor over pink robes with crimson tassels. They bore fiery-red banners and rode roan steeds. The commander wore a stitched gold cap of hibiscus and sceptre pattern, and golden chain mail of linked animal faces over a fiery red embroidered robe, bound by a girdle encrusted with gold and precious stones. He carried a matched set of Sun and Moon swords and rode a Five Luminances red horse. He was Prince Yelu Dezhong, Royal Brother of the King of Liao. His standard was the Sun.

To the right in front of the Liao fixed position were five thousand women cavalry. They were dressed in patterned silver caps, silver hooked armor over plain robes of tasseled silk, and bore white pennants, rode white horses, and wielded silver-handled blade-lances. Their commander had in her hair, on opposite sides of her head, two pins of phoenix design trailing green silk. Around her forehead was a red silk band with precious stone sequins. The cloud pattern on her shoulders was tastefully set off by the brocade of her skirt. Over her silver armor she wore a tunic embroidered with dragons. Her small flowered boots rested firmly in her stirrups. In her diaphanous sleeve she carried a light jade-handled whip. She bore a Seven Star precious sword and rode a spirited silver-white horse. She was Dalibo, Royal Princess of the Kingdom of Liao. Her standard was the Moon.

Between the left and right cavalry units, amid a mass of yellow banners, were generals in golden armor, riding gold-hued horses. Their robes and armor formed a swath of yellow clouds, their embroidered yellow turbans were a mist covering half the sky. Four of these generals held the highest rank. Each commanded three thousand soldiers, and each defended one of the four corners of a square.

In the southeast corner was Royal Nephew Yelu Derong. He wore golden armor and an animal-face belt over a robe of black. Three pins held his golden cap in place. He carried a bow and arrows and a black-tasseled lance, and rode a pale dark steed. His standard was the Mouth of the Net Constellation.

Royal Nephew Yelu Dehua was in the southwest corner. He wore silver armor and a simple belt over a purple robe, and precious ornaments decorated his cap. He carried a stiff bow and arrows, wielded a precious sword and rode a black-maned, black-tailed roan. His standard was the Commemorative Constellation.

In the northeast corner was Royal Nephew Yelu Dechong. He was dressed in a green robe, silver armor, and wore a purple cap and precious belt. Hanging from his waist were a dragon bow and phoenix arrows. He grasped a crescent-bladed halberd and rode a Five Luminances yellow steed. His standard was the Purple Vapor Constellation.

The northwest corner was defended by Royal Nephew Yelu Dexin. He wore bronze armor over a white robe. A red band shot with black thread bound his forehead, and he was adorned with a gold-inlaid, gem-encrusted belt. A carved bow and arrows hung from his waist. In his hand he held a Seven Star precious sword, and he rode a jet-black steed with snowy white fetlocks. His standard was the Lunar Comet.

From among the yellow banners a general emerged whose standard was the Central Control Star. To his left were green flags, to his right were white banners. Before him were red panoplies, behind were black umbrellas. Encircling him were flags representing the twenty-four solar terms, and the sixty-four sections of the Octagon, plus the Southern Aurora, the Northern Dipper, the Flying Dragon, the Flying Tiger, the Flying Bear, and the Flying Panther—all blending in a confusing array which obscured the Jade Firmament.

How was this general attired? In a purple and gold cap encrusted with precious gems, in tortoise-back armor of gleaming gold over an embroidered silk gown from Sichuan, in a girdle of charming jade from Lantian. His bow, hanging on his left side, had a steel center and was etched in gold. His arrows, in a quiver on his left, had phoenix feathers and barbed heads. He was shod in hawk-beak-patterned, cloud-soled boots, and he rode an iron-backed, silver-footed horse. He sat a decorated saddle, the purple silk reins wrapped around the pommel, his feet firmly in the stirrups. At his waist hung his sword of command, in his hand he held his general's baton.

As he rode to the fore, he grasped the ochre-decorated shaft of his crescent-bladed halberd. Amid that gold and glittering array he was clearly the leader, for he was Wuyan, Commander-in-Chief of the Combined Forces of the Kingdom of Great Liao.

Behind the yellow banners was a royal phoenix and dragon carriage, surrounded by seven concentric rings of fully armed soldiers. In the center were thirty-six pairs of yellow-turbaned warriors who pushed the carriage. Preceding it, on the trace horses, were nine postillion riders in saddles of gold. Eight pairs of warriors in embroidered garments brought up the rear.

Seated on a throne in the middle of the carriage was the King of Great Liao, on his head a tall conical turban, his body encased in a nine-dragon robe of royal yellow, a Lantian jade girdle around his waist, red court boots upon his feet. Flanking him were his ministers. Youxi Bojin, the premier was on his left. Marshal Chu Jian, the vice-premier was on his right. Both wore ornate caps, fiery-skirted ochre gowns with purple fringes and gold slabs, and girdles of ivory and jade. On either side of the throne stood richly dressed boys and girls, holding jade and ivory implements. Royal Guards closely surrounded the carriage. For his standard the king had personally selected the North Star Which Reigns Imperially over All. The ministers to his left and right flew banners showing accompanying constellations.

The Liao army was now in position, spread out in an egg-shaped celestial deployment, anchored firmly like an overturned basin. Flags in four corners, weapons on eight sides, locked in shifting rings, the Tartars were able to advance or withdraw at will.

Song Jiang first pinned down the enemy's forward pickets with arrows from his archers. Then he and Wu Yong and Zhu Wu climbed a sky-ladder for a look. What he saw astonished him. Wu Yong didn't recognize the Tartar layout, but Zhu Wu said it was a Zodiac Deployment.

"It's called the Great Monad," he explained.

"How should it be assaulted?" Song Jiang asked.

"It keeps changing all the time. It's very difficult to come to grips with it," said Zhu Wu. "I don't know how to assault it."

"If we can't crack it open, how are we going to drive them back?"

"The trouble is we don't really understand their set-up," said Wu Yong. "How can we attack?"

While they were conferring, Wuyan the Tartar commander-in-chief was issuing his orders. "Today is a 'gold' day," he said. "We'll therefore have four officers—Gold Dragon Zhang Qi, Gold Ox Xue Xiong, Gold Dog Aliyi and Gold Ram Wang Jing—go with the Great White Gold Star General Wuli Kean and attack Song Jiang."

At the battle front, Song Jiang and his chieftains observed the seven Tartar troops to the left. Their pennant gates now opened, now closed, while drums thundered. Within their position, they seemed to be moving about a lot. The commander's banner travelled from east to north, to west, to south.

"The Celestial Platter is turning to the left," said Zhu Wu, "and today is a 'gold' day. That means they're going to attack."

Before the words were out of his mouth, five cannons boomed in unison, and soldiers surged out of the enemy position. In their center was the Gold Star General and his four satellites. With the force of an avalanche they led five troops in a murderous charge. Nothing could stop them. Taken by surprise, Song Jiang's forces hastily retreated, while trying to stem the foe's advance. But the Tartars caught them in a pincers, and they suffered heavy losses. They scrambled back to their fortified camp. The Liao army did not pursue.

A check revealed that Kong Liang had received a sword wound, Li Yun had been hit by an arrow, Zhu Fu had been injured by shrapnel, and Shi Yong had been stabbed by a lance. Among the troops there were wounds without number. The casualties were loaded onto carts and sent to a rear camp for medical treatment by Dr. An Daoquan. Song Jiang instructed his forward echelons to lay iron brambles and plant deer antler stakes and defend the camp's approaches.

"We took a beating today," Song Jiang said to Lu Junyi moodily. "What are we going to do? If we don't go out and challenge them, they're sure to launch an offensive."

"Use two columns to hit the units defending their flanks, while another two assault the seven troops due north," Lu proposed. "Then have our infantry pour in through the middle. We'll see what the knaves have got in there."

"All right."

The next day, in accordance with Lu's suggestion, they put their fortified camp in order, opened the gates wide, and moved forward with their assault contingent. As they neared the Liao position, the six units in charge of defense spotted them. Song Jiang ordered Guan Sheng to move up from the left, Huyan Zhuo from the right. He himself advanced in a frontal drive. Soon, they were in contact with the foe. Song Jiang then dispatched two more contingents to strike at the black-bannered seven troops in the center from the left and right. Sure enough, they broke them, and inflicted heavy casualties.

The black-bannered troops were in disarray. Song Jiang now ordered the five hundred shield warriors under Li Kui the Black Whirlwind to strike, to be followed by an infantry charge led by Lu Zhishen and Wu Song. It was a chaotic battle. Cannon thundered on all sides. Two columns from east and west, and the king's own yellow-bannered troops directly ahead, smashed into Song Jiang's forces. The pressure was too great. They turned and fled. The rear guard couldn't hold. It was badly mauled by the time it reached the fortified camp.

A check showed that more than half of Song Jiang's effectives had been destroyed. Du Qian and Song Wan were severely wounded. Li Kui was missing—as he hacked his way into the enemy position Black Whirlwind had been pinned down by hooked poles and captured. The news distressed Song Jiang. He ordered Du Qian and Song Wan to the rear camp for medical treatment. Injured horses were led off to be tended by Huangfu Duan.

"Today we lost both Li Kui and the battle," Song Jiang said to Wu Yong. "What can we do?"

"We captured Wuyan's son, the young general, a few days ago. We can make an exchange."

"If we do that now, how will we be able to save other chieftains we may lose in the future?"

A junior officer entered and announced: "A Liao emissary is here with something to say."

Song Jiang directed that he be brought in. As soon as he was presented, the emissary delivered his message.

"Our commander-in-chief has ordered me to inform you that today we captured one of your chieftains. Instead of killing him, our commander wined and dined him. He offers to exchange him for his son, the young general. If you are willing, we will return your chieftain."

"We'll bring the young general to the front tomorrow and make the exchange," Song Jiang promised.

"We have no plan for breaking the enemy position," said Song Jiang. "It would be good if we could use the exchange to get a respite in the hostilities."

Wu Yong agreed. "Our army needs a rest. If we can work out some new strategy in the meanwhile, we can always hit them later."

That evening, men were sent to fetch the young general to headquarters, and an emissary was dispatched to Commander-in-Chief Wuyan.

The Tartar general was seated in his tent when a junior officer announced: "A messenger is here from Song Jiang." Wuyan ordered that he be allowed in. The emissary, on entering, spoke his piece.

"Our Vanguard General Song Jiang conveys his respects to Your Excellency. He is ready to exchange the young general for our chieftain. Since the weather is bitterly cold and the soldiers are weary, to prevent frostbite and suffering he proposes an armistice and a renewal of discussions in the spring. We request the Commander-in-Chief's approval."

"So you've captured that stupid, worthless son of mine," Wuyan shouted. "Even if he lives, he'd never have the effrontery to face me! We don't need any exchange. Take him out and kill him for me. If Song Jiang wants an end to hostilities, let him surrender, bound hand and foot, and save you all from death! Otherwise, I'll come with my mighty army and not a single blade of grass will be left standing! Now get out!"

The emissary flew back on his horse to the fortified camp and reported the conversation to Song Jiang.

Alarmed, and afraid that he would lose the chance to rescue Li Kui, Song Jiang left camp with the young Tartar general and hurried to the front.
"You can release our chieftain," he called. "I'm returning your young general. If you don't want an armistice, that's all right with us. We'll fight it out with you to the death!"
From the Liao position Li Kui was quietly placed on a horse and led to the fore. On this side, the same was done with the young general. Without another word from either adversary, the exchange was made. Li Kui returned to camp. The young general rode away. Neither side took hostile action that day. Song Jiang withdrew to camp with his soldiers and celebrated with Li Kui.
Later, he conferred with his chieftains in his tent. "The Liao force is powerful and we have no plan for cracking it," he said. "I'm anxious and worried. Each day seems like a year. What shall we do?"
Huyan Zhuo had a proposal. "Divide into ten columns. Leave two to hold our position, and hit them with the other eight, together, in a decisive battle."
"I rely entirely on your united hearts and strength, brothers," said Song Jiang. "That is the method we'll employ."
"We couldn't budge them in the last two engagements," said Wu Yong. "It would be better to wait till they attack us."
"That doesn't sound like a good idea to me. As long as the brothers are determined to combine against the foe, there's no reason why we should be defeated."
Orders were issued the same day. The following morning they broke camp, separated into ten columns, and marched out at a rapid pace. Two columns first established a back-up position. The remaining eight, disdaining any preliminary palaver with the foe, plunged into the Zodiac Deployment, shouting and yelling, banners waving.
At once cannon rumbled, forty-eight pennant gates opened, and Tartar soldiers charged in a wide snaking line. Song Jiang's men were taken by surprise. They retreated in disorder, trailing banners and lances, their trumpets and drums askew. They lost many troops before reaching their fortified camp.
Song Jiang ordered his chieftains to defend the mountain pass with pallisaded fortifications, dig a deep moat around the camp, and plant deer-antler stakes. The gates were to be kept closed. No one was to go out. The army would spend the winter in camp.
In response to repeated petitions to the throne by Commissioner Zhao Anfu, the emperor granted winter clothing to the expeditionary force. These were to be delivered by Wang Wenbin, formerly a drill instructor in the Imperial Guards and now the garrison commandant at Zhengzhou. Wang, an intelligent and courageous man, was highly qualified in both civil and military affairs. He left the capital with over ten thousand armored troops and a convoy of civilian drivers and nearly two hundred carts laden with five hundred thousand items of clothing, heading first for Chen Bridge Station. He was instructed to urge Song Jiang to resume hostilities and push for an early victory; delay would be a punishable offense. A yellow banner at the head of the convoy was emblazoned with the words Imperial Gift Clothing. Officials along the route supplied food and fodder.
The journey took many a day. At the Border Hall, Wang met Commissioner Zhao, to whom he handed a document from the Council of Administration. Zhao read it. He was very pleased.
"You've come just at the right time, General! Song Jiang has failed repeatedly in his assaults on the Zodiac Deployment laid out by Wuyan, the Liao commander-in-chief. Many of his chieftains were wounded. They are here right now, being treated by Dr. An. Song Jiang has built a fortified camp in Yongqing County and doesn't dare sally forth. He's very depressed."
"That's why the emperor has sent me. He wants him to resume the offensive in a combined operation with my men. Although Song Jiang has suffered several defeats, I can't go back to the Council of Military Affairs and simply report this to the emperor. I'm not very clever, but I've read a few books on military lore and know a bit about strategy. I'd like to go to the front and try a few tactics. Perhaps I could take some of the burden off Song Jiang in a decisive battle. Would that meet with Your Excellency's approval?"
Commissioner Zhao was delighted. He gave a feast for the commandant and rewarded the carters. He told Wang to deliver the clothing to the troops, but first dispatched an emissary to inform Song Jiang.
When the man arrived, Song Jiang was brooding in his tent. He was advised that Wang Wenbin, the garrison commandant at Zhengzhou, had arrived from the capital with fifty thousand items of winter clothing, and that Wang was authorized to join in a combined offensive. Song Jiang immediately sent a man to lead Wang to his tent, where he welcomed him with wine. After they had downed several cups, Wang asked what seemed to be the difficulty.
"When I was ordered to this border area by the court, thanks to the emperor's beneficent emanations I conquered four big cities," said Song Jiang. But then, in Youzhou Prefecture, Wuyan, commander-in-chief of the Great Liao Kingdom, laid out a Zodiac Deployment. Two hundred thousand troops, in neat array, like stars in the sky, with the king himself taking personal command! I've lost several engagements in a row. I can hold defensively, but I've no plan for attack. I dare not move. Fortunately, you've come, General. I hope you will teach me."
"There's nothing wonderful about that Zodiac Deployment! I have no talent, but I'd like to go to the front with you and take a look at it. Then we can decide."
Song Jiang gladly agreed. He directed Pei Xuan to turn the clothing over to the chieftains for distribution. When all were warmly dressed, they faced south and gratefully shouted long live the emperor. That day a feast was laid for General Wang and his soldiers were rewarded.
The next morning the reinforced army set out. Wang Wenbin mounted and proceeded to the front in full armor. Tartar soldiers opposite, watching their approach, reported it to headquarters. Trumpets and drams promptly sounded in unison, and loud shouts arose. Six cavalry units moved out from the Liao position. Song Jiang dispatched units which drove them back. Wang climbed the command tower for a look.
"It's just an ordinary deployment," he said, after coming down the ladder. "I don't see anything startling."
Actually, he didn't recognize the enemy deployment, and was only putting on a show of knowledge. He directed that the drums of the forward echelon pound out a challenge. The drums and trumpets of the adversaries responded in kind. Song Jiang reined in his steed.
"We don't want dogs and wretches," he shouted. "Have you got any real men who will fight?"
Even before he had finished speaking, the fourth gate of the black-bannered troop opened and an officer flew out. His hair, which hung loose, was bound at the forehead by a strip of yellow silk. He wore darkly gleaming armor of metal hoops over a sleeveless black robe. On a raven-black horse, a three-pointed sword in hand, he rode briskly to the front. Behind him came innumerable junior officers. At the head of their procession, a black banner bore the inscription in letters of silver: General Quli Chuqing.
"What better place than here for me to display my skill," Wang said to himself. With levelled lance he cantered into the field and, without any preliminaries, charged the Tartar general.
Wang lunged with his weapon, the Tartar parried with his blade. They had contended for about twenty rounds when the Tartar turned and fled. Wang raced after him. The Tartar had not really been vanquished. It was only a trick to lure Wang into pursuit. Brandishing his big sword, the Tartar waited till Wang was close, then turned swiftly and hacked. He cleaved Wang clean through from shoulder to chest, tumbling him dead at his horse's feet.
Hurriedly, Song Jiang called back his troops, while the Liao soldiers advanced. They fought a sharp engagement until the Song forces retreated to their camp in disorder. The death of Wang Wenbin had shocked both officers and men, and they stole glances at one another.
Song Jiang wrote a report to Commissioner Zhao: "Wang Wenbin went voluntarily into combat and was killed. Half the soldiers he brought with him have returned to the capital." Zhao was depressed by the news, go and extremely worried. He could only relay the information to the emperor and to the Council of Military Affairs.
Brooding in his camp, Song Jiang wracked his brain for a means to break the Liao army. He ate and slept badly, he was restless and disturbed. It was a bitterly cold winter night, and he sighed as he sat huddled over a single candle. Around the second watch, he wearily stretched out with his clothes on. Outside, the wind howled. The chill ate into his bones. He sat up.
"Where did you come from?" he queried.
"I'm here on orders from our queen. She extends her invitation. Can I trouble you to come a short distance with me, General?"
"Where is your queen?"
"Not far."
Song Jiang went with the acolyte out of the tent. A glow—an interplay of gold and jade—suffused the upper and lower sky. There was a fragrant breeze and a soft mist. The weather was like spring.
They walked only two or three //and Song Jiang saw ahead, in a large grove of pine and cypress and purple osmanthus, a stone-balustraded winding path overhung by lush bamboos and swaying willows. Crossing a stone bridge, they passed through a gate with a cinnabar-red lintel. Inside the courtyard were buildings with beautifully painted walls, decorated rafters and beams, red gold-studded doors, jade-tiled roofs and heavy eaves, curtains like delicate prawn tendrils and tortoise-backed window sills.
The acolyte led Song Jiang east along a corridor to a room on the left. She pushed open the vermilion door and asked him to be seated for a few minutes. On all sides of the room were quiet cloud windows and sunset-hued daises. It was filled with the scent of heavenly flowers and rare incense.
The girl went away, but returned very quickly. "Our queen invites the star lord to join her," she said.
The seat of Song Jiang's chair was scarcely warm. He rose immediately. Two fairy maids came in, wearing garlands of hibiscus and jade. Their garments were of red silk and gold thread, their faces were like the full moon, their hands like tender bamboo shoots. They glided towards Song Jiang and greeted him. He dared not look at them directly.
"You needn't be so modest, General," they said. "Our queen is just changing her clothes. She wants to discuss some affairs of state. Please come with us."
Assenting, Song Jiang followed them.
A bell sounded and chimes rang as a green-clad girl welcomed Song Jiang outside a large hall. The two fairy maids preceded him up the stairs on the east side. They approached a pearl curtain. Song Jiang could hear the tinkling of little jade chimes stirring in the breeze. The green-clad girl invited him in. He knelt before an incense table.
Then he raised his eyes and looked around. Amid fresh clouds and purple mist, directly opposite on a couch carved with nine dragons, there sat the Mystic Queen of Ninth Heaven. On her head was a crown of nine dragons and flying phoenixes. She wore a gossamer blouse of pale brown decorated with precious gems in dragon and phoenix design and a sun and moon skirt. Her feet were shod in pearl-studded cloud pattern slippers. She held a rod of flawless white jade. In attendance were twenty or thirty fairy maids.
"It's been several years since I gave you the Three Heavenly Books," said the Mystic Queen. "You have kept them well and observed them faithfully. Now the Song emperor has sent you against the Tartars. Are you succeeding?"
Song Jiang prostrated himself before her and replied: "I have respected the Books and kept their secret ever since Your Majesty presented them to me. On orders of the emperor I have been campaigning against the Tartars, but I have failed several times in attacks on the Zodiac Deployment laid out by Wuyan, the enemy's commander-in-chief. I've no idea how to crack it. We're in a precarious situation."
"Don't you know the magic formula?"
Song Jiang again kowtowed. "I do not. I'm just a crude ignorant fellow. Pray, instruct me, Your Majesty."
"The Zodiac Deployment is arranged like the solar system. Simply bludgeoning will never break it. You have to follow the Laws of Harmony and Antagonism. The black-bannered contingent, for example, centers around the Water Planet, and has the Five Vapors Constellation of the North as its standard. You should select seven of your chieftains and equip them with flags, armor, clothing and steeds the color of yellow earth, and have them drive against the contingent's seven cavalry troops. Then order one of your fiercest generals, also dressed in earth-yellow, to go in and capture the foe's Water Planet General. Don't we say that earth conquers water?
"Send white-robed soldiers under eight chieftains against the green-bannered troops on the left, since metal conquers wood. Send red-robed soldiers under eight chieftains against the white bannered troops on the right, since fire conquers metal. Send eight chieftains with black-bannered soldiers against the red-bannered rear contingent of the Liaos, since water conquers fire.
"Then send nine chieftains at the head of a green-bannered unit to cut into the foe's very center and take their yellow-bannered commander-in-chief. Wood conquers earth. Dispatch a unit carrying embroidered banners and dressed in flowery robes to crack the foe's sun contingent, and another unit bearing purple banners and dressed in silver armor to smash their moon contingent. On twenty-four carts, corresponding to the twenty-four solar terms, set cannon and shot, and bombard the center of the Tartar forces. Have Gongsun Sheng raise an astral storm and under its cover push directly up to the king of Great Liao.
"In this manner you will win total victory. But you must not operate during daylight. Wait until the darkness of night. Lead your troops yourself. Take personal command of your central army. Exhort your men. One concerted effort will do it.
"My words must be kept secret. Defend the country and bring peace to the populace and never slacken.
"There is a limit to dealings between celestials and mortals. At this point we part on earth forever. When you come to abide in the Heavenly Palaces we shall meet again. Return quickly now to your camp. Do not linger."
The Mystic Queen ordered the green-clad girl to serve tea. Song Jiang drank. She directed the girl to escort Star Lord Song Jiang back to camp. He kowtowed and expressed his deep gratitude, and left the hall. The girl led him down the stairs on the west side, then through the gate with the cinnabar-red lintel to the path. They crossed the stone bridge to the grove of pines. The green-clad girl pointed.
"The Liao soldiers are there. That is where you can break through."
Song Jiang looked. The girl gave him a sudden push, and he awakened. He had been dreaming in his tent. In the stillness he heard the watchman's drum strike the hour. It was already the fourth watch.
He summoned his military advisor to interpret his dream. When Wu Yong entered the tent, Song Jiang asked: "Have you a plan for breaking the Zodiac Deployment?"
"I'm afraid not."
"I saw the Mystic Queen in a dream and she gave me a secret method. I've decided upon it and would like your advice. We can call our chieftains and give them their assignments. For this battle we must use our best."
"I'd like to hear it." Song Jiang described the method briefly. And as a result, the king of Great Liao surrendered, hands extended together, and Commander-in-Chief Wuyan lost his life. Truly, celestial strategy was employed and clever tactics adopted; in an astral battle, the Song armies broke through the magic pass.

After looking down from the hilltop on this huge force of Tartar troops, Song Jiang hurriedly turned his horse and rode back to his army. He ordered them to retreat to Everbright Pass and fortify their position. He called the Unicorn, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun to his tent to discuss what to do: "Although we've beaten them twice, and killed two of their top generals, the force I saw from the top of the hill is immense; it stretches as far as the eye can see. It's got to be the entire Tartar army against us. If we fight them we'll have to give it everything we've got. But I'm still afraid we shall be overwhelmed by sheer numbers. What are we going to do?"
The Professor said: "It's always been the case that good tactics enable a smaller force to defeat a larger one. Once, in the days of Jin, fifty thousand troops put one hundred thousand to flight. You've nothing to fear. Just impress on all the commanders that they must be sure to have everything ready: banners all neat and tidy, bows strung, swords checked, deer's antlers set out to protect the camp, moats dug, a full supply of arms laid on, siege ladders and ballista stones and suchlike prepared — then they must wait. Deploy the army again in the old Eight Trigrams formation. They can't all attack it at once, so even if there's a million of them, they'll think twice about it."
Song Jiang said: "Your words are golden." He gave out the orders and the commanders put them into effect. Breakfast was prepared in the fifth watch and they struck camp at dawn and proceeded to Changping, where the troops were deployed and organized their defences. The cavalry were in front, valiant commanders and brave men all, led by Thunderclap and Twin Rods behind him. Scimitar was on the left, Leopard's Head on the right, Hasty on the northeast, Twin Spears on the southwest, the Blue-Faced Beast on the northwest. Song Jiang commanded the main army. The other leaders kept their old duties. The infantry brought up the rear, headed by the Unicorn, Monk and Pilgrim. The leaders of the ten thousand or so troops were all battle-hardened veterans. They were all itching to get started. All the preparations made, there was nothing to do but await the Tartars.
These soon became visible, far off in the distance. First came six companies of cavalry, five hundred in each, three on the left and three on the right, which kept rotating and were not fixed in one place. These roving companies are called "scouts" or "shock troops".
After them came the main army, darkening the face of the earth. The leading troops all had black banners. In the centre there were seven troops of cavalry, a thousand horsemen to each and its own commander. How were these commanders got up? Well, they had black spiked helmets, black armour and black robes, and they rode black horses. They carried ordinary arms. They represented each of the seven northern constellations. The commander-in-chief represented the black war star of the north, sign of the element water. And what did he look like? He had black hair, long and silky, and his forehead was tightly bound with a dark bandanna; he wore a sleeveless black tunic and oiled black armour with a fine silver mesh. He rode a lively black thoroughbred and carried a sharp three-sided blade with a black hilt. This was the Tartar chief Quli Chuqing, who had his personal guard of three thousand cavalry in black armour with unbound hair, their standard the five powers constellation of the north. The footsoldiers marching under the black banner were innumerable. It was truly a case of "freezing clouds block out the eastern sun, a black hole swallows the wind over the northern sea"!
The left hand army had the green dragon banner. There were seven troops of cavalry, each with a thousand horse and its own commander. How were they dressed? They had four-cornered helmets, willow-leaf armour, and jade green tunics. They rode blue-roan chargers and were fully armed. They represented the seven eastern constellations. The standard of the commander-in-chief represented the eastern green dragon, the sign of wood. How was he dressed? He wore a lion helmet, armour decorated with mythical beasts and a jade green tunic with a gold belt. He carried a crescent-shaped axe with a gold hilt and his mount was a blue roan. This was the Tartar chief Zhijian Fulang, with a personal guard of three thousand green banner cavalry, representing the nine powers constellation of the east. The number of footsoldiers marching under the green banner was beyond reckoning. It was like seeing blue spots erupting on the yellow highway, green sundering the purple cloud-begetting rock!
The right hand army had the white tiger banner, with seven companies of cavalry, each with a thousand horse and its own commander. How were the commanders dressed? They had silver embroidered caps, white armour and white silk robes. They rode horses white as snow. They all carried hand arms and had standards representing the seven western constellations. Their commander-in-chief had the metal planet of the west on his standard. How was he dressed? He had a peacock feather in his helmet and linked armour of wrought silver with a jade belt that gave off a cold sheen. He wore a plain white robe with cloud pattern embroidery and was mounted on a thoroughbred of the same type as Song Jiang's Moonlight. He carried a shining steel halberd. This was the Tartar chief Wuli Ke'an, leader of three thousand white banner warriors representing the seven powers constellation of the west. The white banner troops had an escort of countless footsoldiers. It was like the traveller's camel drinking the mountain snow, the barbarian chief breaking the ice of the well!
The rearguard had a crimson banner and seven troops of cavalry each with a thousand horsemen and its own commander. How were they dressed? They had red lacquered caps and tunics the colour of orangutan's blood, with peach-coloured fish-scale armour. They rode swift horses of the type known as red hares and were all fully armed. Their standards represented the seven southern constellations. The standard of their commander-in-chief was the red fire planet of the south. How was he dressed? He had a red helmet with a bright tassel and a deep red robe the hue of madder. He had red armour and boots with red stitching, a gem-studded red leather belt and a strong bow and quiver of arrows slung over his shoulder. He had a sword with a fine blade and rode a fiery chestnut. This was the Tartar chief Dongxian Wenrong, leader of three thousand red banner troops whose standard represented the three powers constellation of the south. Under the red flag also marched innumerable footsoldiers dressed in red. You could have imagined Lord Six setting forth from his mansion, thunder and lightning giving birth to the three fireballs!
In front on the left there was a contingent of a thousand brave troops with gold embroidered caps, bronze armour and deep red robes and a flame-red standard. Their horses had purple trappings and they were clustered around a leader in a cap with a gold lotus and sceptre pattern and gold armour fashioned from linked animal heads. He had a fiery red embroidered tunic and a jewelled gold belt. He had two swords like sun and moon and rode a five-star horse. This was Prince Yelü Dechong, the King's brother and his standard was the sun. It was as the golden crow declining to the west, the arch of fire rising over the eastern sea!
In front on the right were five thousand women warriors. They wore embroidered silver caps, silver armour and plain white robes with white tassels and had white banners and white horses and weapons with silver shafts. They were gathered around their chief who wore two gold phoenix pins on a green ribbon, a red headband with precious stone sewn to it, a cloud pattern on her shoulders tastefully complemented by her embroidered skirt, and a dragon patterned robe over her silver armour. Tiny embroidered boots were firmly set in the gold stirrups and in her fluttering sleeves she flourished a jade handled whip. A fine seven-star sword was her weapon and she rode a silvery-grey horse. This was the royal princess Dalibo and her standard was the moon. One seemed to see the jade hare rising over the headland, the ice disk painting the terraces a glittering white!
Between the two divisions was a crowd of troops with yellow banners surrounding their leaders, all on dun horses and wearing yellow armour. The yellow robes and armour were like a great yellow cloud, the yellow turbans seemed to fill the sky with yellow mist. There were four chiefs each with three thousand cavalry formed in a square. At each corner was one of the chiefs, closely surrounded by his own guard. On the southeast was a chieftain in green robe and golden armour with a magnificent spear and mounted on a blue roan horse, his standard the lohou constellation. This was Yelü Derong, one of the King's nephews. On the southwest was a chieftain in purple robe and white armour wielding a fine blade and mounted on a bay horse with black mane, his standard the jidou constellation. This was Yelü Dehua, another of the King's nephews. In the northeast corner was a warrior in a green robe and white armour bearing a square halberd and mounted on a dun thoroughbred, his standard the purple power constellation. This was the King's nephew Yelü Dechong. At the northwest corner was a warrior with a white robe and bronze armour carrying a seven star fine sword and riding a piebald with a black mane, his standard the lunar comet. This was the King's nephew Yelü Dexin.

Among the yellow troops was a commander hemmed in on the left by troops with green flags, on the right by men with white axes, in front by men with red banners and behind by black sunshades. The banners represented the twenty-four powers, the sixty-four diagrams, the Southern Aurora and the Northern Dipper, the winged dragon, winged tiger, winged bear and winged panther, all jumbled together to create a scrambled version of the celestial chart, a confused image of the universe. The commander carried a square halberd with a decorated red shaft. How was he dressed? He wore a seven-jewel purple and gold cap, a gold breast-plate like a turtle's shell, a red robe of embroidered silk, a belt decorated with Lantian jade. On his left shoulder hung a gold, painted bow reinforced with steel, on his right a sheaf of peacock feather arrows. He rode an iron-grey horse with silver fetlocks, with an elaborately embossed saddle and gold stirrups and the purple silk reins were wrapped round the pommel. The sword at his belt was a symbol of his command and he was holding a whip with which he directed operations. This chieftain, who was surrounded by a glittering throng of guards and whose standard was the earth planet of the central mansion, was the Tartar general Wuyan, commander-in-chief of the Liao armies.

In the centre, behind the yellow banners, was the royal carriage, surrounded by seven companies of warriors bearing all the main weapons. There were also thirty-six pairs of yellow-turbaned strong men, in nine groups, to push the carriage. In front there were nine trace-horses with gold saddles and bridles, and walking behind eight pairs of footmen with embroidered tunics. In the carriage rode the King of Liao. He wore a tall Tang-style turban and a yellow nine-dragon robe. His belt was of Lantian jade and he had red ceremonial boots. His ministers were on either side of him. On the left was his chief minister Youxi Bojin, on his right deputy chief minister Chu Jian. They both wore sable hats and scarlet robes and carried purple-ribboned seals and gilt tablets. Their belts were adorned with ivory and jade. On either side of the royal sedan were youths and maidens holding jade and ivory symbols and implements. The sedan was closely surrounded by the royal guards. The King's personal standard was a representation of the Purple Emperor of the North, chief of all the heavenly stars. It was like all the stars of heaven leaving their celestial thrones, a hundred thousand heavenly bodies come down to visit earth.

On completion this secret zodiac formation of the Tartars had the form of an egg, or an upturned bowl. There were flags marking the four corners, and spears at all the eight points of the compass. It revolved continually, advancing and retreating by turns.

Song Jiang first responded by telling his bowmen to shoot at the front rank. He had an observation platform erected in his main army and ascended it with the Professor and the Strategist. What he saw gave cause for considerable alarm. The Strategist at once recognized the zodiac formation and said to the other two: "This is based on the principle of the primal cause and interlocking constellations!"

"How do we fight it?" Song Jiang asked.

"It changes continuously and its internal structure cannot be assessed. You need to think twice before attacking it."

Song Jiang said: "If we can't openly confront it, how do we ever drive them back?"

The Professor said: "If we don't know anything about what's going on inside the formation, how do we attack?"

Whilst this discussion was going on, Marshal Wuyan gave out his orders from the centre of the enemy army. Since the day belonged to metal, four of his commanders whose signs were the ones associated with metal — the dragon, the ox, the dog and the ram — were to advance under general Wuli Ke'an, the great white metal star, and attack Song Jiang.

What Song Jiang's army saw was that the seven pennant gates on the opposing army's right flank either opened or closed, while there was a thunderous roll of drums from the centre and the formation began to revolve. The lead banners began to change places: from east to north, from north to west, from west to south. The Strategist said: "They're following the anti-clockwise rotation of the heavens. Today is a metal day, they're rotating anti-clockwise, there's an attack coming."

He had hardly finished speaking when five loud reports sounded and a body of troops sprang out from the opposing ranks, five companies with the general representing the metal star in the centre. They rolled forward with the force of an avalanche, a relentless tide. Song Jiang's troops gave way without striking a blow. With the Tartar shock troops pressing hard on his front and attacking from both flanks. Song Jiang was overwhelmed and ordered a hasty retreat to the original camp. The Tartars did not pursue them. When a roll was called it was found that Red Star had been slashed by a sword, Green-Eyes had been hit by an arrow, Smiler by a ballista missile, and the Guv had a spear wound. Countless soldiers were wounded. The wounded were loaded onto carts and taken back to the base camp for Doctor An to treat. Song Jiang ordered the forward troops to lay out thorn bushes and a deep barrier of antlers and put a strong guard on all the gates.

It was a gloomy Song Jiang who sat with the Unicorn and the other leaders and discussed the situation: "We lost the battle today. What should we do? If we don't go out to fight them tomorrow they will come for us here."

The Unicorn said: "Next time let us set up two forces to take on those shock troops of theirs and another two units to attack the seven gates on their northern flank. And should we not also get the infantry to effect a breakthrough in the centre so that we can find out what is happening on the inside of their formation?"

"All right, let us do that," Song Jiang said.

Next day, they organized themselves inside the camp and made their preparations, following the Unicorn's proposal. The gates were opened wide and the troops marched out. The Tartars could be seen not far off, six companies of their shock troops coming on in force. Song Jiang sent out Scimitar on the left and Twin Rods on the right to drive them back. The main army marched straight ahead to engage the Tartar army. Song Jiang sent Colonel Hua, Thunderclap, Twin Spears and the Blue-faced Beast on the left and Leopard's Head, Spearsman, Hasty and Whiskers on the right to attack the seven black pennant gates. They did indeed break through the forces there and scatter them, leaving the formation with seven shattered units on the north.

Iron Ox, Demon King, Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost were now ordered to advance with five hundred shield bearers. Behind them came Monk, Pilgrim, Morbid, Madcap, Snake and Scorpion with their infantry in support. Once inside the zodiac formation all they could hear was gunfire on all sides. When the yellow banner troops attacked them from east and west, Song Jiang's men could not hold out and were forced to retreat. A stand by the rearguard also broke down and they fled in confusion back to the camp. When the roll was called, around half the troops were missing. Skyscraper and Door-God were seriously wounded, too. Iron Ox was not to be seen.

What had happened was that Iron Ox had charged forward furiously, determined to hack his way through the enemy ranks. He had been surrounded, subdued with hooks and taken prisoner. This was most distressing news for Song Jiang. He first ordered Skyscraper and Door-God to be taken to the base camp for Doctor An to treat, and all the wounded horses to be handed over to Redbeard for treatment.

Song Jiang discussed the situation again with the Professor and the others. "Today we lost Iron Ox and suffered another defeat. What are we going to do about it?"

The Professor said: "That youngster we took prisoner the other day is Marshal Wuyan's son. Perhaps we can make an exchange."

Song Jiang said: 'If we make the exchange now, what are we going to do if we lose another leader?"

The Professor said: "What's the point in always making difficulties? Let's stick to what's in front of us."

He had hardly finished speaking when a soldier came and reported that an emissary from the Tartars had come to parley. Song Jiang had him brought in.

"Our commander wishes me to say," the man began, "that we have captured one of your leaders who attacked our main army. We have not harmed him but instead entertained him with wine and food. The Marshal would like to return him to you, in exchange for his son. If you accept this, he will send your leader back."

Song Jiang said: "In that case I will bring your young commander out in front of the armies tomorrow and we will make the exchange."

Song Jiang discussed the matter further with the Professor. "We have no plan for defeating them. Would it not be better when we take out the young commander to arrange a truce?"

The Professor said: "If we give our troops a rest, while we work out a new plan, we can always resume the war later."

That evening they had the young commander brought under cover of darkness and sent someone to Marshal Wuyan to tell him what they intended. Marshal Wuyan was sitting in his tent when a soldier reported that an emissary from General Song Jiang wished to speak with him. The Marshal had him brought in and he said: "Our commander, General Song Jiang respectfully greets you and says that he will return your son to you today, in exchange for our leader, and proposes that because the weather at present is cold and conditions very hard for the troops both sides should temporarily cease hostilities and make no further attacks until the spring, to protect men and horses from frostbite. He hopes for your agreement."

Marshal Wuyan exclaimed: "My son is without shame. He allowed himself to be taken alive by you. Even if he has escaped with his life, how can he face me? We do not need this exchange. Take him away and execute him for me. If you want an armistice, send your Song Jiang here with his hands bound. Otherwise you will all die because I will launch a full attack. There will be nothing left of you!" Then he roared: "Get out!"

The emissary flew back to the camp and told Song Jiang this.

Song Jiang was chiefly worried that he might not be able to rescue Iron Ox. He ordered them to strike camp and took the young commander out in front of the ranks and shouted out: "If you release our leader, I will set your young commander free. It does not matter about the armistice. I'm quite prepared to go on fighting."

There was no discernible change among the Tartar ranks, but Iron Ox appeared on horseback. Likewise a horse was brought to carry the young commander back to his side. Thus it was done, with mutual understanding, in a simultaneous exchange, both men returning to their own. There was no further fighting that day. Song Jiang withdrew into his camp and celebrated the return of Iron Ox.

In consultation with all his leaders in his tent, Song Jiang said: "The Tartars are very strong. I am very worried about not having a plan for defeating them. This waiting is unbearable. What can we do?"

Twin Rods said: "Let us divide our forces into ten units tomorrow. Two columns to attack their shock troops, the other eight to strike together at the main army. Let us resolve this contest once and for all."

Song Jiang said: "We must have a unanimous decision about how to deploy our forces."

The Professor said: "We have twice failed to break through, would it not be better to adopt a defensive position and wait till they attack us?"

Song Jiang said: "That is not a very good policy either. Our only chance of victory is if we all unite to mount a concerted attack!"

The order was given that they should strike camp early in the morning and move forward at top speed, in ten divisions. The first two divisions intercepted the shock troops. The other eight, without a word spoken, charged straight into the zodiac formation. A sound like thunder arose in the centre and the four times seven or twenty-eight gates all opened together as the formation converted into a "single file snake", and struck! Song Jiang's men had no hope of defending themselves. They turned and fled, panic-stricken, scattering banners and spears behind them, littering the ground with gongs and drums. They dashed back to the refuge of their original base, losing men all along the way. Song Jiang ordered the pass to be blocked and deep moats dug, with strong barricades of antlers to deny the enemy access. He was preparing to winter there.

Meanwhile Commissioner Zhao had repeatedly written to the court requesting winter clothing and other items for them. In response to this the court sent a former instructor of the imperial guard, currently commander of the garrison at Zhengzhou, Wang Wenbin by name — a man who was both scholar and soldier and highly regarded at court. He was ordered to collect a force of ten thousand guards and enlist peasants as carters to transport fifty thousand suits of warm clothing for General Song's army, also transmitting the command that General Song pursue the campaign vigorously and achieve an early victory. Armed with the Emperor's commission, Wang collected the necessary weapons, packs of clothing, horses and so on, enlisted the carters and troops and the requisite number of carts, left the Eastern Capital and headed for Chenbridge. The carts all bore a flag saying "Imperial consignment of winter clothing".

Thus they pursued their journey. Along the route their food was supplied from official provisions. It took them many days. Arriving at a wayside pavilion, they met Commissioner Zhao and handed him the imperial missive. The Commissioner was well pleased. "You've come at the right time," he told Wen. "General Song has lost several battles recently to a Tartar force which is drawn up in the zodiac formation. Many of his commanders and men are wounded and are at present recuperating here under the care of Doctor An. General Song has fortified himself at a place called Everbright and dares not engage the enemy. It's a very depressing situation."

Wang said: "But it is precisely to urge him to attack that the court has sent me here. They want an early victory. It would be difficult for me to return to the capital and tell the Military Council that he has suffered such reverses. For what it is worth, I have studied the military manuals since I was a boy, and I think I know a thing or two about strategy. If I were to join the army, I reckon I could devise some sort of plan. I'd like to take them on, and relieve some of the pressure on General Song. Would Your Excellency authorize this?"

The Commissioner was only too pleased to do so, and entertained him with wine and food and rewarded the carters also. He instructed Wang to deliver the clothing to Song Jiang's army for distribution. But first he sent some one on ahead to inform Song Jiang.

Song Jiang was sitting in his tent in a gloomy mood when the Commissioner's messenger arrived and told him that the court had sent Wang with five hundred thousand suits of winter clothing and with instructions that he, Song Jiang, was to push ahead with his offensive. When the envoy reached Song Jiang's camp he dismounted and entered the tent, where wine was served to welcome him. After several cups he asked for an account of the situation. Song Jiang said: "Since I was honoured with this frontier post, through the Emperor's bounty, we have captured four major cities. But here in Youzhou we have been thrown off balance by the Tartar general's army in a zodiac formation. They've got two hundred thousand troops, drawn up in perfect order according to the rotation of the constellations. Please explain this to His Majesty. I have lost several battles running and I can think of no strategy to use against them. Now you are here I should be most grateful for your advice."

Wang said: "But I don't see that there's anything so special about this zodiac formation. I don't know much about it, but why don't you let me go the front and take a look? I could give you a fresh opinion."

Song Jiang assented eagerly. First he told Sterling to hand out the clothing to the army. Everyone put on the new clothes and kowtowed towards the south, shouting "Long live the Emperor!" in thanks. Wine was provided at headquarters that day in honour of the visitor and a bounty was distributed to his troops.

A few days later all the troops were mobilized. Wang put on the new helmet and armour he had brought with him, mounted and rode out fully accoutred in front of his troops. This was observed by the Tartars in the opposing lines who reported it to their commanders. Drums and gongs rang out, a tumult of shouting arose and six columns of Tartar troops advanced. Song Jiang detailed a similar number to drive them back. Wang went up onto the command platform to have a look. When he came down he said: "It's the usual thing, that formation of theirs. I don't see there's anything to fear." Now no one knew this, but in fact Wang didn't know the first thing about it and was just boasting. He ordered his vanguard to sound the drums and issue a challenge. Drums and bugles sounded also among the opposing Tartar ranks. Song Jiang shouted out to the Tartars: "Don't send out a bunch of rogues, we want to see if you've anyone capable of real fighting!"

He had scarcely finished when from the fourth gate among the black pennants a commander raced out. This Tartar leader wore his hair loose and flowing, and his forehead was bound with a yellow silk bandanna. He was clad in oiled bronze armour, and a sleeveless black tunic. He rode an ebony charger and wielded a three-sided blade. He halted in front of the countless Tartar horde. On the black standard were the words "Great Tartar Chief Quli Chuqing" in silver characters. Reining in his horse abruptly, he issued a challenge.

Wang thought to himself: "If I don't show off my talents now, when will I have a better opportunity?" He levelled his lance, kicked his horse and rode forward, preferring to waste no words and get to grips with the Tartar at once. As he thrust with his lance the Tartar countered with dancing sword. They hadn't fought twenty bouts when the Tartar turned and made off. Wang galloped after him, determined to catch him. But the Tartar was not defeated, it was just a trick to lure Wang on, and now he readied his blade, waited till Wang was close enough, turned and delivered a blow which cleft Wang's trunk in two. Wang died on the spot.

Immediately Song Jiang ordered his troops to withdraw. The Tartars harried them all the way and it was another total defeat. Song Jiang's panic-stricken forces retreated into the camp. All the leaders looked at each other in horror, having seen Wang killed on his horse. Song Jiang had to compose a report, informing Commissioner Zhao that Wang Wenbin volunteered for combat and had been killed. He ordered the party which had brought the supplies to return to the capital.

When the Commissioner heard what had happened he became very depressed. Vexatious though it was, he was obliged to write a report for the representatives of the Military Council to take back with them to the capital.

On learning from books you shouldn't rely;

Wang's was a foolish way to die.

Many in peace can win by boasting;

In real war they'll get a roasting.

A thousand thoughts assailed Song Jiang as he sat gloomily in his tent, but he could think of no plan to follow nor imagine any way the Tartars could be defeated. He could not rest or eat properly and his sleep was disturbed.

One winter's night when the weather was bitterly cold he closed his tent tightly and sat gloomily before a single candle. In the second watch exhaustion overcame him and he lay down without undressing. Suddenly a fierce wind began to howl through the camp and a chilly blast assailed him. He sat up and saw a servant girl who stepped forward and made him a deep bow.

"Why are you here?" he asked her.

"I have to deliver a message from Holy Mother," she answered. "She asks if you would kindly pay her a visit."

"Where exactly is she?" he asked.

"Not far away at all," the maid explained.

Song Jiang followed her out of the tent and found the sky full of brilliant light, a sweet breeze sighing, soft clouds sailing by, the weather like spring. In less than a mile they came to a wood, where luxuriant dark green pines mingled with thick pale green cypress, and there were purple cinnamon trees and a stone balustrade. All around was a flourishing forest of tall bamboo, weeping willows and fine peach trees. Crossing an arched bridge with a curved rail they came to a round door painted red. They went through and found themselves among frescoed walls and decorated windows, painted columns and carved beams, vermilion doors with brass studs and green-tiled roofs. The maid led Song Jiang along a corridor to the left and stopped in front of a pavilion on the east. She pushed open the red door and told him to sit down inside and wait for a moment. The room was full of decorative windows and raised platforms, sweet-scented flowers and fragrant incense.

The maid went inside and then returned to announce: "Holy Mother requests the pleasure of your company." He had not been sitting there long enough to warm the mat, but he stood up. Two fairies entered: they wore immortal's caps with jade adornments and red silk dresses trimmed with gold. They curtsied to him. He dared not raise his eyes. "Why so bashful, General?" they said. "Holy Mother is just changing her dress and will be out in a moment. She would like to discuss affairs of state with you and wants you to do something for her. Please come this way."

Song Jiang followed obediently. He heard the sound of bells and tinkling jade. The maid motioned him to enter the palace. The two fairies preceded them, leading the way up the eastern steps. They stopped in front of a pearl curtain. He could hear melodious sounds within. At the maid's bidding he passed through the curtain and knelt at the foot of the altar. When he raised his eyes he beheld auspicious clouds, a swirling pink mist. Right before him on her special dragon throne sat the Mystic Lady of the Ninth Heaven. She wore her dragon cap and her dragon robes, embroidered with the seven treasures, a skirt bearing symbols of river and mountain, sun and moon. On her feet were pearl slippers and she held the ceremonial tablet of pure white jade in her hand. On each side of her were the fairies, more than a score of them.

The Mystic Lady said to Song Jiang: "Much time has fled away since I gave the mystic books into your keeping. You have kept to the path of honour and righteousness since then and have not been neglectful of your duty. Now the Song emperor has sent you to destroy the Tartars. How is the campaign going?"

Song Jiang humbly prostrated himself and said: "I am always mindful of the honour you did me by bestowing the mystic books upon me and I have not revealed their secret to anyone. I have received the Emperor's command to defeat the Tartars, but unfortunately I have suffered a series of defeats at the hands of Marshal Wuyan's army, drawn up in this zodiac formation of theirs. I cannot think of a way to fight them and the situation at present is disastrous."

"Do you know how this zodiac formation works?" she asked.

"I am afraid I am very ignorant. I do not understand it. I beseech you to enlighten me," he said.

"It follows the principle of yang," she said." A direct attack on it will never succeed. To defeat it you must use the system of contraries. For example, their leading troops with the black banners follow the water sign and correspond to the northern star in heaven. What you must do is select seven commanders, with yellow banners, representing earth, with yellow armour and clothing and dun horses, and have them attack the Tartars' seven black pennant gates. And you must choose a bold commander, also in yellow, to seize the water standard. This works because earth conquers water. Similarly you need eight leaders in white, representing metal, to attack the green banner troops on their left wing. This is because metal conquers wood. You must have eight leaders in red to attack the white banner troops on their right wing because fire conquers metal, leaders in black to attack the red banners of their rearguard, because water conquers fire, and nine leaders in green to attack their main army and their leader, because wood conquers earth. You will also need two columns of troops with embroidered banners and patterned robes to break the power of their "sun" brigade, and troops with a plain flag and white armour to combat the effect of their moon brigade. You must build twenty-four thunder carts with guns to fire heavy missiles and explosives into their central army. Get Taoist Gongsun to raise wind and thunder with a spell so you can penetrate right to where their king is. If you carry out this plan it will assure you of total victory. You must not attack by day, though. It must be in the middle of the night. You must lead the attack yourself, directing the main army. Exhort your troops to go forward and finish it off in one go. Do not reveal my words to anyone. Your duty is to protect the country and ensure peace, you must have no thought of retreating. Well, nothing is forever and I must bid you farewell. We will meet again another day in the Purple Palace and the Golden Towers. You have to return now, I must not detain you longer." She had the maid serve him tea and then told her to take him back to the camp.

Song Jiang prostrated himself again to thank her and left. The maid led him away down the western steps. They passed through the red door and followed their former route over the stone bridge and through the pinewood. The girl pointed and said: "There are the Tartars you have to defeat!" He followed the direction of her pointing finger and awoke with a start to find he had been dreaming and was in his tent.

At that moment he heard the drumbeat announcing the fourth watch. He sent for the Professor to ask him about the dream. When the Professor presented himself in the tent, Song Jiang said: "Have you thought of any plan for defeating the zodiac formation?" The Professor said: "I can't think of anything good."

Song Jiang said: "Last night I dreamt that the Mystic Lady imparted a secret to me. I've been thinking about it and I'd like to discuss it with you. Let's summon a meeting of all the leaders so that we can explain the situation." It was indeed a case of //eaven prompts a plan to suit the hour; celestial strategy will break the magic power.

Song Jiang Cracks the Foe's Deployment & achieves final victory; Marshal Su proclaims the treaty & Bestows the Emperor's Pardon

Word for word, Song Jiang related to Wu Yong the method given to him by the Mystic Queen of Ninth Heaven in his dream. When they had agreed upon a course of action they informed Commissioner Zhao. They had twenty-four gun carriages built of planks and iron sheeting, with oil-soaked faggots stored below in each and a cannon mounted above. Artillery men worked through the night to finish the job. Song Jiang then assembled his commanders and issued his battle orders:

The central division cavalry in earth-yellow robes would, headed by General Two Spears Dong Ping, strike at the heart of the Water Planet contingent, while units under seven other chieftains would hit the seven black-bannered cavalry troops to the left and right.

From the north, cavalry in robes of water-black, commanded by Two Rods Huyan Zhuo, would raid the Fire Planet position. At the same time seven other chieftains would charge the red-bannered enemy units to the left and right.

A contingent carrying embroidered banners and dressed in flowery robes would, commanded by seven chieftains, go against the Sun division on the left, while another seven chieftains leading a unit in purple robes and silver armor would move against the Tartar's Moon division on the right.

A fierce, bold force headed by six chieftains would cut through directly to the foe's center and capture the king. Another five would provide cover for the cannon carriages moving up to the middle.

The naval chieftains and their forces would sail as close to the battlefield as possible and lend support.

Eight five-sided flags would be issued, and the Song forces would deploy in their usual Nine-Unit Octagon.

When Song Jiang had finished issuing his orders, the commanders returned to their respective contingents and made ready. The twenty-four gun carriages were laden with their equipment and pushed to the front. Truly, it was a strategy that would startle Heaven and Earth, and shake the very fiends and demons.

Meanwhile, Wuyan, commander-in-chief of the Liao army, mystified by Song Jiang's failure, day after day, to give battle, dispatched pickets who advanced as far as the perimeters of the expeditionaries' camp. Song Jiang continued with his preparations and set a date for the offensive.

Then, late in the day, determined, he marched with his men. As they drew near the Liao emplacements, they spread out in a straight line. Powerful bowmen to the fore kept the enemy at a distance while the Song forces waited for evening.

At dusk, wind massed thick clouds, bringing darkness before it was night. Song Jiang ordered his troops to gag themselves with reed sticks and wait for whistle signal. That night he sent forth four columns, retaining at the front only his earth-yellow horsemen. The columns dispersed the Liao pickets, then circled round towards the northern end of the enemy position.

A volley of cannon fire broke from the Song army about the first watch. Huyan Zhuo's contingent smashed in and took the Fire Planet. Guan Sheng then carved through the foe's central army and captured the Earth Planet. Lin Chong drove into the left army and seized the Wood Planet. Qin Ming grabbed the Metal Planet after cutting into the right army. Dong Ping, hitting the lead unit, took the Water Planet.

Gongsun Sheng waved his sword, casting an astral spell, and released five thunderbolts. The night wind blew with such force from the south that the tops of trees touched the ground. Stones rolled and sand flew, the God of Thunder streaked the sky with lightning. The twenty-four gun carriages, protected by five hundred shield warriors commanded by five chieftains, trundled into the Liao position. Ten Feet of Steel struck with her soldiers into the center of the Sun emplacement, while Zhishen the Tattooed Monk drove with his men into the position of the Moon. Following the gun carriages, Lu Junyi the Magnate and his troops hit the Tartars' central army in a direct drive. Each unit pursued and slaughtered its own quarry.

Cannon roared in the night, thunder exploded overhead. In that murderous atmosphere rocks rolled and gravel flew. So great was the killing that the stars moved in the sky, the sun and moon grew dim. Fiends wept, demons cried, as soldiers clashed in wild confusion.

Wuyan the Tartar commander-in-chief was busily shifting his generals when he heard yells and tumult on all sides and the sounds of combat. By the time he mounted, the gun carriages had already reached his central army. Flames spurted into the sky as the boom of cannon shook the ground. Guan Sheng and his cavalry smashed through to the commander-in-chief's tent. Grasping his crescent-bladed halberd, Wuyan rode at Guan Sheng and gave battle. Zhang Qin the Featherless Arrow, flinging his stones, knocked down aides left and right. Many were injured, and fled for their lives, pursued by four chieftains who inflicted further devastation with their swords. His aides gone, Wuyan turned his steed and raced north. Guan Sheng galloped after.

Hua Rong, who saw the Tartar commander-in-chief run, also gave chase. Fitting an arrow to his bow, he let fly at Wuyan and hit him squarely in the back. The arrow clanged against the metal back plate, showering sparks. Before Hua Rong could shoot again, Guan Sheng caught up and swung his Green Dragon Halberd. The commander-in-chief was wearing three layers of armor—steel mail nearest his body, then a suit of sea animal hide, and all covered by a suit of golden chain mail. Guan Sheng's blow cut through the two outer layers. As he raised his blade to strike again, Wuyan closed in beneath its shadow and attacked with his crescent-bladed halberd.

They had fought four or five rounds when Hua Rong reached them. He sped an arrow at Wuyan's face. The commander-in-chief hurriedly dodged, but the missile nicked off the tip of his ear and scraped through his phoenix-plumed metal helmet. Wuyan fled.

Zhang Qin, in hot pursuit, flung a stone at Wuyan's head. It knocked him prone on his horse's back, but he continued riding away, trailing his halberd. Guan Sheng again caught up and again swing his Green Dragon Halberd. He sliced upwards through the commander-in-chief's waist, bones and all, right to his head. Wuyan tumbled to the ground. Hua Rong caught his fine horse and exchanged it for his own. Zhang Qin pierced the fallen Tartar with his lance. Thus expired a commander-in-chief, a gallant warrior, after only one hack of a halberd and one thrust of a lance! Poor Tartar hero. All passed as in a dream.

Lu Zhishen, leading Wu Song and five other chieftains, charged yelling into the Sun position. Yelu Dezhong, turning to flee, was tumbled from his steed when Wu Song broke the animal's neck with one blow of his blade. Wu Song seized the Liao general by the hair and cut off his head. Dezhong's two sons fled for their lives. The Sun position was smashed, its men scattered.

"We'll push on to the center, take the Liao king, and that will be the end of it," said Lu Zhishen.

In the Moon position, the Royal Princess, hearing the murderous shouts on all sides, hurriedly mustered her female warriors to ride to the rescue. But they were beset at their tents by Ten Feet of Steel, brandishing her pair of swords and leading Gu Dasao and five other chieftains. After many rounds, Ten Feet of Steel put aside her swords and closed with the princess, wrapping her arms around her waist. The two wrestled on horseback, tightly locked. Wang the Stumpy Tiger rode up and captured the princess. Gu Dasao and Sun the Witch killed and scattered the female soldiers, while the three men chieftains aided from the side. Poor highborn pampered princess, to thus fall captive, bound and tied!

Lu Junyi and his troops also cut into the Liao central army, killing Tartar officials and generals while Xie Zhen and Xie Bao cut down the "headquarters" flag. The king, closely guarded by his ministers and captains, withdrew towards the north. But his nephews Yelu Derong and Yelu Dexin were hacked from their mounts and killed. Nephew Yelu Dehua was captured. Nephew Yelu Dechong disappeared, no one knew where. The Liao army was completely surrounded, and the slaughter continued till the fourth watch. Not a single man of the more than two hundred thousand Tartar forces was left alive.

At daybreak the chieftains returned. Song Jiang sounded the trumpets recalling his men to camp. He directed that those who had taken captives turn them over and receive their rewards. Ten Feet of Steel came forward with the royal princess; Lu Junyi with nephew Yelu Dehua; Zhu Tong with Quli Chuqing the Water Planet; and other chieftains with five more generals. Heads of innumerable slain foes were also presented.

Song Jiang placed the eight prisoner generals in the charge of Commissioner Zhao of the Song central army. Captured horses were distributed among the chieftains.

The king of Great Liao, retreating in a panic to Yanjing, hurriedly ordered that the four gates of the city be closed, the moat defended, and that no one go out to confront the enemy. On learning that the king had withdrawn to Yanjing, Song Jiang directed his army to break camp. They marched to the Liao capital and surrounded it. Song Jiang invited Commissioner Zhao to observe the coming battle from the rear camp. He instructed his troops to ring Yanjing with scaling ladders, cannon and shot, to build fortifications and prepare for the attack.

Very nervous, the king summoned his ministers to a conference. They all said: "The situation is dangerous. The best thing would be to submit to the Song empire." The king agreed. He had a flag of surrender flown from the ramparts and dispatched an emissary to the Song camp with the message: "We will pay cattle and horses, pearls and gems, every year. We will never invade the Middle Kingdom again."

Song Jiang led the emissary to Commissioner Zhao in the rear camp, where he repeated the Tartar proposal.

"This is a matter of prime national importance," said Zhao. "Only the emperor can decide. I haven't the authority. You'll have to send a high minister to the Eastern Capital and request an audience. Only if the emperor formally approves the surrender in writing and pardons your crimes will we be able to end the war and withdraw our troops."

The emissary returned to Yanjing and reported to the Liao king. The sovereign summoned his civil and military officials to confer. Chu Jian, the vice-premier, spoke.

"Our army is weak, our generals few, our soldiers are virtually gone. How can we resist the foe?" he said. "But in my humble opinion at this critical juncture we can still win men's hearts with bribes of gold and silks. I would be willing to go to Song Jiang's camp personally with lavish gifts. We'll have him halt the fighting and call off the attack on the city. At the same time we must give expensive presents to top ministers in the Eastern Capital and buy them over. Then they will speak for us before the emperor and obtain a milder disposition. Cai Jing, Tong Guan, Gao Qiu and Yang Jian have great power, and they're all rogues. The boy emperor listens to their advice. Bribe them with gold and silks and buy their support. We'll surrender and be pardoned. The Song forces will be pulled back and the war ended."

Chu Jian left the city the following day and proceeded to Song Jiang's camp. Song Jiang received him in his tent and asked what brought him. Chu Jian spoke of the surrender, and proffered a number of valuable gifts.

Song Jiang heard him out, then said: "If we hit your capital day after day, you can be sure we'll take it. And when we do, we won't spare even the roots of the grass lest resistance grow again! I've seen your surrender flag, and I've called a halt to the fighting. Since ancient times in wars between two countries there has always been the right to capitulate. You are allowed to surrender. I, therefore, have checked my troops. I permit you to go to the imperial court to request sentencing and offer tribute. Do you think Song Jiang is the sort who can be bribed? Don't ever try that again!"

"Go to the imperial court and obtain a decree. I will keep my troops out of action temporarily. Go at once and come back quickly. Don't delay."

Chu Jian thanked Song Jiang, left the camp, mounted his horse, returned to Yanjing and reported to the king. All the important ministers conferred and reached an agreement. The following day the king and his ministers contributed fine curios, gold and silver, precious gems and glittering pearls, and these were loaded on carts for delivering by the vice-premier and fifteen other officials to the Eastern Capital. Over thirty saddle horses were readied for the journey and a petition to the emperor written.

On leaving Yanjing the delegation first called on Song Jiang. He led Chu Jian to the presence of Commissioner Zhao and told him of the mission. Zhao entertained the emissary courteously. After consulting with Song Jiang, he also wrote out a report to the emperor regarding their military progress. He deputed Chai Jin and Xiao Rang to turn it in to the Council of Military Affairs for transmission to the throne, and directed them to accompany Chu Jian to the capital.

For many days they were on the road. At last, they arrived. Ten cartloads of valuable gifts, the carts and their drivers were put up in the official hostel. Chai Jin and Xiao Rang handed in to the Council of Military Affairs the report on the military situation.

"Our army has Yanjing surrounded," they said. "We can take it at any time. The Liao king has hung a surrender flag on his ramparts and dispatched his vice-premier Chu Jian to petition for permission to capitulate, and to implore a pardon and an end to the war. We dare not decide on our own. We request an imperial decree."

"Stay with Chu Jian in the official hostel for the time being," said the council officer. "We here have to consider the long-range implications."

Cai Jing, Tong Guan, Gao Qiu and Yang Jian, as well as the heads of the other departments, large and small, were all avid for gain. Chu Jian the emissary from Great Liao and his entourage, needing their assistance, called first on Cai Jing the premier and the three top ministers, then on the heads of various other departments. To all of these officials they paid bribes and presented gifts.

The following day the emperor conducted his morning audience in the palace. All the assembled high officials, civil and military, kowtowed. Tong Guan, head of the Council of Military Affairs, addressed the throne.

"Our vanguard leader Song Jiang has destroyed and driven back the Liao soldiers, and has advanced as far as Yanjing, their capital, which he now has surrounded. It is likely to fall to us at any time. The king of Liao has hung out a flag of surrender and seeks to capitulate. He has sent here his emissary Chu Jian with an offer to become our tributary. They will submit to our terms, but beg for a pardon and peace, and plead that we withdraw our troops and end the war. They promise to pay tribute every year without fail. None of the ministries dares to decide on its own. We request an imperial disposition."

"If we talk peace and halt the hostilities, they will still exist as a nation," said the sovereign. "What do you ministers think we should do?"

Cai Jing the premier stepped forward.

"We have reached a consensus," he said. "Since ancient times the barbarians beyond our borders have never ceased harassing us. In our humble opinion, Liao should retain its identity as a nation and serve as a buffer state in the north, the lips to our teeth, so to speak. Their annual tribute will be to our advantage. We should permit them to surrender on our terms, end the hostilities, and summon our troops back to defend the capital. But we ministers cannot presume to intervene. We beg Your Majesty to decide."

The emperor approved the premier's proposal. "Bring the Liao emissary before me," he directed.

The order was transmitted summoning Chu Jian and his entourage. They knelt in a line at the far end of the hall and fervently kowtowed. A minister brought forward their petition and unrolled it on the imperial table. The Royal Petition Speaker read it in a loud voice:

Yelu Hui, Ruling Lord of the Kingdom of Great Liao, kowtows one hundred times and states to Your Majesty: Born in the desert and raised in a barbarian land, I was unfamiliar with the great laws of Your Majesty and never studied the major social duties of civilized man. Deficient in culture and military talents, I was surrounded by vicious sycophants, men greedy and corrupt, short-sighted as rats but crafty as roebucks. I was ignorant, they rapacious. We invaded your borders, provoking your army's reprisal. Mere ants cannot stir Mount Taishan, rivers cannot be halted in their flow to the sea. Although we still possess a few desolate cities, we have not enough provisions for even half a year.

Today, I dispatch my emissary Chu Jian to venture into your awesome presence and surrender out lands and request punishment. If Your Majesty will pity us and spare our poor lives and not destroy our ancestral inheritance, your name shall be engraved on our bones. With the utmost exertion, we shall serve forever as a guard of your borders and a buffer for your imperial reign. You will give new life to our young and old, and all our descendants will be eternally grateful. Yearly, we will pay tribute. We vow never to fail.

Trembling, we wait expectantly! In sincerity and fear, we bow our heads and kowtow! Respectfully submitted.

Yelu Hui, Ruler of the Kingdom of Great Liao

The __ day of the Winter Month
in the fourth year of Xuan He

The ministers heard the petition with pleasure, and the emperor directed that imperial wine be served to the emissary. Chu Jian and his entourage presented tributes of gold and silks to the royal court. The emperor ordered that the Treasury receive them, and that it accept thereafter annual tribute of money and cattle. He, in turn, gave gifts of silk and feasted the emissaries in the Hall of Imperial Caterers. He instructed them to go back to Liao.

"I will dispatch an official who will accept your surrender," he said.

Chu Jian and his party thanked the emperor, took their leave and returned to the official hostel. When the imperial audience ended they called at the various ministries to complete the necessary formalities and dispense more bribes.

Cai Jing reassured Chu Jian. "You go back," he said. "The four of us will see to everything."

Chu Jian thanked the premier and returned to the kingdom of Liao.

At the imperial audience the following day, Cai Jing entered at the head of the corps of officials. He petitioned the throne to pardon the Tartars. The emperor consented, and directed the scholars of the Hanlin Academy to draw up a document of pardon. He ordered Marshal Su to deliver and read it, and Commissioner Zhao to instruct Song Jiang to cease hostilities and return to the Eastern Capital. He was to release all prisoners, give back the captured cities, and restore to the Liao authorities whatever had been taken from their treasuries.

Royal court ended and the attending officials withdrew. The next day they called on Marshal Su and set a date for seeing him off. Su did not wish to delay the imperial decree. He had sedan-chairs and horses and attendants readied for the journey, took his leave of the emperor, bid the ministry officials farewell, and departed for Liao with Chai Jin and Xiao Rang.

It was the depths of winter. Masses of clouds hung heavy in the sky. The envoys passed Chen Bridge Station and headed for the frontier. Snow blanketed the plains, powdering the trees and garbing the vast open spaces in silver. Through snow and wind, Marshal Su and his party wound their way forward.

The snow still had not melted when they reached the border area. Chai Jin and Xiao Rang sent a mounted courier on ahead to inform first Commissioner Zhao, and then Song Jiang, of their arrival. Carrying ceremonial wine, Song Jiang and an escort party travelled fifty //and knelt by the roadside in greeting. Marshal Su and the officials in his party were very pleased by this welcome. They were invited into the camp, where Song Jiang had a feast laid. He and the marshal discussed affairs in the imperial court.

"Cai Jian, Tong Guan, Gao Qiu, Yang Jian and other high ministry officials have all been bribed by the Tartars," said Su. "Because of their urgings, the emperor has agreed to a surrender and an end to the fighting. Your troops are being called back to guard the capital."

Song Jiang sighed. "I have no criticism of the court. It's just that our accomplishments here seem to have been in vain."

"Don't distress yourself, General," said the marshal. "When I return to the capital, I shall speak highly of you to the emperor."

"And when he hears my testimony," added Commissioner Zhao, "he surely will show his appreciation for your deeds."

"There are a hundred and eight of us, doing our utmost for our country," said Song Jiang. "We have no personal ambitions, or any desire to impose on His Majesty's benevolence. As long as we can remain together in our labors, that will be our greatest happiness. If you can propose that for us, Commissioner, we shall be deeply grateful."

That day all dined and made merry. Only at evening did the feasting end. A messenger was dispatched to the king of the Liaos, notifying him to prepare to receive the decree.

The next day Song Jiang selected ten generals to escort Marshal Su and the decree into the kingdom of Liao. They were dressed in silk robes and golden armor and were fully armed. Guarding the marshal with a complement of three thousand infantry and cavalry, front and rear, they marched into the city.
The residents of Yanjing burned fragrant incense and hung festive lanterns before the doorway of every home. The king himself led his civil and military officials, all mounted and formally dressed, outside the South Gate to welcome the decree. Then they proceeded to the Royal Hall, where the ten Song generals arraigned themselves on either side, and Marshal Su took a stand to the left of the Dragon Pavilion. The king and his officials knelt before the hall. At a call from the Chief of Ceremonies, they kowtowed. The Liao chamberlain requested the decree. He then read it aloud:
The Emperor of Great Song proclaims: Since the days of our earliest kings and emperors there never was a sovereign who did not govern his subjects, nor subjects who did not sustain their sovereign. The Middle Kingdom has its ruler. Surely you barbarians have one too!
In violation of celestial laws, you Liaos have repeatedly invaded our borders. For this, you deserve to be instantly extinguished. But your petition has moved me to pity. I have not the heart to destroy you, and shall permit you to remain as a nation.
Effective from the day you receive this edict, all captured commanders shall be returned to Liao, your cities shall be restored once again to Liao rule.
But annual tribute must be delivered without fail. Respect our great country, venerate Heaven and Earth. This is the duty of you barbarians. Never forget!
We issue this decree so that all may know.

The __ day of the Winter Month
of the fourth year of Xuan He

The king of the Tartars and his officials kowtowed and voiced their thanks. The imperial decree, on its dragon platform, was carried past, and the king and Marshal Su formally met. They exchanged courtesies, and the king invited the marshal to the rear of the hall, where a lavish feast of many delicacies was laid. While the Tartar officials poured wine and toasted their guests, beautiful girls played military airs on fifes and drums, or languorously turned in slow native dances.
When the banquet ended, Marshal Su and his party were provided quarters in the hostel for officials. Each member of the entourage received a gift.
The next day the king directed Chu Jian, his vice-premier, to go to the camp and invite Commissioner Zhao and Song Jiang into Yanjing to dine. On conferring with Military Advisor Wu Yong, Song Jiang decided it would be inappropriate for him to go. Commissioner Zhao, therefore, went without him to accompany Marshal Su. The king of the Tartars entertained the imperial emissaries at a grand banquet. Mulled grape wine was poured into silver goblets, delicious antelope meat was piled high on golden platters. Everywhere was tasty fruit and floral decorations of many hues.
And when it was nearly over, the king presented Marshal Su and Commissioner Zhao with curios on a golden platter. They feasted until far into the night.
To the accompaniment of martial music, the king and his officials the following day escorted Marshal Su and Commissioner Zhao out of the city and saw them off to camp. Again Vice-Premier Chu Jian was sent to call on Song Jiang. This time he brought gifts of cattle, sheep, horses, gold, silver and colorful silks. At a large meeting, he rewarded the troops and gave valuable presents to the commanders.
Song Jiang ordered that the Royal Princess and her company be released and permitted to go home. He also restored to Liao sovereignty the cities of Tanzhou, Qizhou, Bazhou and Youzhou. He saw off Marshal Su, who was returning to the capital. After reassembling his entire force, he dispatched his central army to serve as an escort for Commissioner Zhao. He then gave a banquet in the camp at which he rewarded his naval chieftains. He instructed them to sail back to the Eastern Capital and wait there for further orders.
He invited the premier of the Tartars and his deputy for a chat. The king directed premier Youxi Bojin and Vice-Premier Chu Jian to call on Song Jiang in his headquarters. Song Jiang received them in his tent, and host and guests took their respective places.
"Our soldiers have neared your capital's walls, our commanders are at your moat. Victory is at hand," he said. "Originally, we had no intention of letting you surrender. We were going to smash in and obliterate everything. It would have been quite reasonable for us to do so. But, granting your request, I permitted you to appeal to the imperial court. The emperor took pity on you and decided not to wipe you out. He is allowing you to surrender, unconditionally, and is giving you very generous terms.
"I am about to return to the Eastern Capital. Don't make the mistake of thinking we couldn't have defeated you. Don't provoke us again. Pay your annual tribute without fail. Behave yourselves. Commit no more crimes. If our army has to come again, we won't let you off so easily!" The premier kowtowed and apologized for their crimes. In a softer tone, Song Jiang further advised them. They thanked him for his kindness and departed.
He put another contingent on the march for home, this one under woman commander Ten Feet of Steel. He directed Xiao Rang to write, and Jin Dajian to inscribe, a stone tablet commemorating the Song victory. The tablet was erected at the foot of Maoshan Mountain, fifteen //east of Yongqing County. It is still there today.
His remaining troops he divided into five columns and set a date for the march. But then Lu Zhishen burst into his tent and, clasping both hands together in greeting, addressed him.
"After I killed the Lord of the West, I fled to Yanmen County in Daizhou Prefecture, and Squire Zhao brought me to Mount Wutai, where I took refuge with the abbot and became a monk. Because I twice got drunk, knocked open the gates and rioted in the monastery, the abbot sent me to the Great Xiangguo Monastery in the Eastern Capital, and the abbot there gave me a job looking after their vegetable garden. But Marshal Gao wanted to have me killed because I rescued Lin Chong, and I became an outlaw. I got to know you, brother, and I've been with you for many years.
"I've been thinking of my first teacher, the abbot at Wutai. I haven't been to see him in all this time. I often remember what he told me—Even though it's my nature to kill and burn, I'll eventually be purified and become a saint. Since everything is quiet and peaceful at present, I'd like to ask for a few days off and pay my respects to him. I want to contribute the rewards I've accumulated to the monastery and request him to predict the future. You and the army go on ahead, brother. I'll catch up."
Song Jiang was surprised. He thought a moment, then said: "I'd no idea you knew this holy man. Why didn't you say so? We'll go with you, also pay our respects, and ask him to foretell the future."
He discussed it with the other chieftains. They all wanted to go, except for Gongsun Sheng who was a Taoist. Song Jiang decided, after talking it over with Military Advisor Wu Yong, to leave Jin Dajian, Huangfu Duan, Xiao Rang, and Yue Ho to aid Deputy Vanguard General Lu Junyi in commanding the army, which was to continue returning by contingents to the capital. "We'll take only a thousand men, and our chieftains," said Song Jiang, "and go with Lu Zhishen to call on his abbot." Lu Zhishen expressed his willingness. The party prepared gifts of famous incense, fine silks, clothing, money, and set out for Mount Wutai. Truly, they left aside their armor and weapons to wander through lonely forests. By the Terrace of Rain and Flowers they called on a high-ranking monk of great virtue, at the Hall of Virtue they saw gleaming lamps and ancient Buddhas. And as a result, a single phrase scorned the search for name and fame, a few brief words kicked aside obsession with life and death.

Song Jiang had forgotten nothing of what the Mystic Lady of the Ninth Heaven told him in his dream. He called the Professor in to draw up the plan and informed Commissioner Zhao, in order to have his approval. The twenty-four gun carriages were constructed in the camp, using varnished planks and sheet iron. Underneath was storage for combustible materials, on top a platform for guns. The work went on day and night, in the effort to have them completed as soon as possible.
All the leaders were called together to hear the battle plan and Song Jiang assigned responsibilities. There was to be a leader dressed in yellow, representing the element "earth", to combat the Tartar company under the sign of the water star: Twin Spears was chosen for this, with seven others to counter the seven black pennant Tartar squadrons under this command. There was to be a leader in white representing metal, to combat the Tartar troops under the sign of wood: Leopard's Head was chosen for this, aided by seven others. There was a contingent in red representing fire to counter the Tartars under the sign of metal: Thunderclap was chosen to lead this, also with seven others. There was a contingent in black, representing the northern water star, to combat the Tartars under the fire sign, Twin Rods to lead it, with seven others. There was a contingent in green, representing the eastern wood sign, to combat the yellow banner troops of the main Tartar army: Scimitar would lead this with eight others. For the contingent with the embroidered banner to combat the Tartar's sun company on the left Monk, Pilgrim, Morbid, Madcap, Nameless, Spots and Strongarm were chosen. The contingent with coloured robes and white armour to combat the Tartars' moon company on the right consisted of Steelbright, Auntie Gu, Sister Sun, Short-Arse, Blackface, the Gardener and Blossom. A particularly bold group of leaders were needed to attack the Tartar's central com-mand and capture the King: there were six of these commanded by the Unicorn. There were five to protect the artillery, led by Iron Ox. The rest, including the boat captains, were to back up the troops in the front line of the attack. The troops were formed up as before in the Eight Trigrams formation, and provided with banners to mark out the octagon.
Everyone followed Song Jiang's instructions to the letter. They hurried to finish the gun carriages, load them up and deliver them to the front. It was a plan calculated to shock heaven and earth, to astound ghosts and gods.
When some time had passed without any sign of Song Jiang offering battle, Marshal Wuyan ordered his shock troops to reconnoitre outside Song Jiang's camp.
By now continuous work had ensured completion of the gun carriages, so Song Jiang had only to choose an auspicious time to begin. He launched his attack in the evening. At the outset the troops were deployed in a straight line and maintained a heavy fire of crossbow bolts towards the enemy position, to pin them down until it began to get dark.
At dusk an icy north wind began to blow in from the left bringing with it thick red clouds, which veiled heaven and earth so that darkness came much earlier than normal. Song Jiang gave orders for them to hold split reeds in their mouths as whistles and communicate by whistling. First of all four of the divisions peeled off leaving the troops in yellow drawn up in the front line. These four divisions attacked the enemy scouts, turning the enemy flank and charging off northwards.
In the first watch Song Jiang's troops set off a string of explosions on the left. Twin Rods broke through the pennants and headed directly for the rearguard to attack the fire commander. Next Scimitar charged the central army, taking on the earth star. Leopard's Head attacked the left flank, the wood star. Thunderclap took on the metal star and his troops on the right flank. Twin Spears led his troops forward to attack the water star in the front ranks. Taoist Gongsun with the main army held his sword aloft and worked his magic, treading out the pattern of the Dipper and summoning the five thunders. A gale blew up from the south, tearing the limbs off trees and scattering sand and gravel all around. The twenty-four gun carriages were called in, accompanied by their allotted leaders and five hundred shield bearers, hardened soldiers all, who were to get them through into the heart of the enemy position. Steelbright and Auntie Gu had led their troops into the centre of the Tartar moon brigade. Monk led his troops through to penetrate the Tartar sun brigade. The Unicorn led a detachment behind the gun carriages into the Tartar central army. Each leader sought out his allotted opponent. When the guns started firing that evening it was louder than thunder, it was a sound to make the stars tremble and put the planets in a spin, a noise to cause sun and moon to lose their shining, a racket to provoke despair in ghosts and gods. The Tartars were terror-stricken.
Marshal Wuyan, who was directing operations at the centre, heard a great tumult of shouting and sounds of battle on every side. Just as he leapt into the saddle, the gun carriages came within range. Flames started to light up the sky, accompanied by earth-shattering explosions. All of a sudden Scimitar and his men were in front of the Marshal's tent. Grasping his halberd the Marshal engaged Scimitar in a furious fight. Hotshot began firing off stones at random, knocking down enemy officers left and right. Many were hit. Those who could, ran for their lives. Skyhawk, Mr. Chai, the Son-in-Law and Hound gave free rein to their horses and charged about cutting down the enemy with their swords. Finding himself deprived of his aids, Marshal Wuyan turned his horse and galloped northward, with Scimitar in hot pursuit. Truly one might say, "All around the missiles fly, smoke and burning fill the sky"!
Colonel Hua, who was in the rear, saw that Marshal Wuyan was beaten and he joined in the chase. Grabbing his bow, he fitted an arrow to it, took aim and fired. The arrow hit the Marshal in the middle of his back. There was a clang and sparks flew: the arrow had struck the back plate of the Marshal's armour. Colonel Hua was about to fire again when Scimitar galloped up, waving his green dragon sword and slashing at the Marshal's head. The Marshal was wearing three kinds of armour. The first layer, which he wore inside, was chain mail of hardened bronze. In the middle he had armour made out of the skin of some kind of sea animal. On the outside he had a suit of shining mail. When Scimitar slashed he only pierced two of these layers. When he struck again, the Marshal dodged beneath the arc of the sword, then jerked his horse round and thrust with his square halberd. They had only fought a few bouts when Colonel Hua caught them up and aimed another arrow at the Marshal's forehead. The Marshal quickly ducked and the arrow passed right through his winged golden helmet grazing his ear. The Marshal fled again, and Hotshot raced after him. He took a stone and hurled it at the Marshal's head. The stone landed with a thump but the Marshal galloped on, trailing his spear. Scimitar galloped up beside him and delivered another fierce cut with the sword. Hotshot raced up too and gave a spear thrust. Thus did the unfortunate Marshal, once a hero of such renown, meet his end, from one sword cut and one spear thrust.
While this was going on, Monk, Pilgrim and the others of their group, all yelling at the tops of their voices, charged into the enemy's sun brigade. The commander, Prince Yelü Dechong, tried to make a run for it but a blow to his horse's head from Pilgrim's halberd brought him crashing to the ground. Pilgrim grasped him by the hair and cut his head off. Thus was the power of the "sun" vanquished! "If we can now get their king, that'll really finish it off!" Monk said.
Meanwhile the Tartar princess surrounded by her moon brigade heard the sounds of battle all around and, after hastily arming herself, was about to ride out with her women warriors and attendants. At that moment Steelbright with her two swords closely followed by Auntie Gu and the others, charged into the tent and engaged the princess in combat. They fought innumerable bouts until Steelbright abandoned her swords and closed with the princess. She grabbed her by the shoulders and the two of them wrestled together on horseback; they appeared as if sculpted from a single block. Then Short-Arse arrived on the scene and took the princess prisoner. Auntie Gu and the Ogress continued to harass the women warriors inside the tent. Outside Blackface, the Gardener and Blossom continued the good work. The hapless lady of the palace found herself bound and captive.
The Unicorn's contingent had broken through in the centre. Snake and Scorpion first tore down the command flag and fell to slaughtering the enemy troops and commanders. A group of officials and guards surrounding the royal carriage fled northwards. Two of the royal nephews died in action. One royal nephew was taken alive and the other disappeared. The main army was surrounded and the fighting went on till the fourth watch. When they broke off it was found that the Tartar force of twenty thousand or more had been decimated. At dawn all Song Jiang's leaders returned. He ordered the gong to be sounded for their withdrawal to camp and told everyone to report their captives and receive their reward. Steelbright reported the capture of the princess. The Unicorn had one of the royal nephews; Whiskers the Black Water Star, and so on. Countless heads were brought in by various leaders. Song Jiang ordered the eight captured commanders to be handed over to Commissioner Zhao for internment. As for the horses, they were shared out among Song Jiang's leaders for their own use.
The Tartar king had fled to Yanjing, where he ordered the four gates to be bolted and barred and the defences reinforced everywhere. There was no question of his coming out to fight. Song Jiang accordingly ordered his troops to strike camp and invest the city. He invited Commissioner Zhao to come up to the rear camp and direct the siege. He had siege ladders and ballistas set up outside the city and strengthened his own position in preparation for the final attack.
The Tartar king was overwhelmed with grief. He called all his ministers together to discuss the situation. Everyone said: "Our situation is desperate. Should we not surrender to the Song Emperor? Surely that is the best plan?"
The king accepted this view. So a flag of surrender was raised and someone was sent to the Song camp with this message: "We promise yearly to send oxen and horses, to contribute pearls and jewels every year and never again to violate the borders of the Middle Kingdom." Song Jiang took the messenger to see Commissioner Zhao in the rearward camp and speak to him about the offer of surrender.
Commissioner Zhao said: "This is an affair of national importance. It has to be decided at the top and I cannot give you an answer. If you Tartars wish to surrender you must appoint a responsible minister to go himself to the capital and seek an audience with the Emperor. If the Emperor accepts your submission and pardons your transgressions, all well and good. We will withdraw our troops and cease hostilities."
The messenger took this answer back to the King. When the latter summoned all his officials, civil and military, to discuss the matter, Chu Jian, the deputy chief minister stepped forward and said: "At present we have few troops and fewer commanders. With such a depleted army how can we possibly go on fighting? In my humble opinion, I should go myself to General Song's camp bearing handsome gifts. We must ask him to halt the attack and meanwhile collect tribute to take to the Eastern Capital to bribe all the officials of their Military Council, persuading them to put in a good word for us with the Emperor and not intrigue against us. At present four corrupt officials hold power — the Grand Preceptor and Marshals Tong, Gao and Yang. The Emperor is young and follows their advice. If we can bribe these four with gold and silk, to buy their good will, our surrender will be accepted and they will withdraw their army and cease hostilities." The King accepted this advice.
Next day Minister Chu Jian went to Song Jiang's camp. Song Jiang received him in his tent and asked the purpose of his visit. He first talked about the surrender and then promised Song Jiang gold and silk and suchlike toys.
Song Jiang said: "We have been besieging your city for many days now. Sooner or later the city will fall, never fear, and we will pluck out the problem by the roots to make sure the weeds never grow again. However, we saw that you had raised the flag of surrender so we called a halt, to allow you to present yourselves before the Emperor, to apologize and offer tribute. But why do you make these promises of wealth to me? What do you take me for? Let me hear no more of this!"
The Minister, Chu Jian was terrified by the response he got, but Song Jiang said: "We will allow you to go to the court, to the highest authority. We will not attack while you are gone, but you must go and return as soon as possible. Do not delay!"
The Minister thanked General Song and departed. He rode back to Yanjing and reported to the King. A meeting of all the King's ministers accepted the idea, and the King and his nobles contributed gold, silver, precious stones and pearls and all manner of costly baubles, which were loaded onto carts. Minister Chu Jian was to take them to the Eastern Capital, accompanied by a dozen or so officials. Thirty or more horses were found for them to take also and a formal written apology was composed, after which they set off.
The delegation went first to see Song Jiang in his camp. Song Jiang took the Tartar minister to see Commissioner Zhao to let him know what was happening, namely that the Tartars were sending their deputy chief minister personally to deliver a formal notice of apology and surrender. Commissioner Zhao entertained the Minister most courteously. After deliberating with Song Jiang, he consented that the request be passed on to the Emperor, in a communication that would be carried by Mr. Chai and Magic Hand, together with a report on the military situation for the Military Council. Mr. Chai and Magic Hand were to accompany the Tartar minister to the capital.
They travelled without stopping and on arrival in the capital they took the carts loaded with valuables and their drivers to stay in the government rest house. Mr. Chai and Magic Hand first delivered their military report to the Military Council and said: "The army at present has invested Yanjing, which is on the point of falling. The King of Liao has raised the flag of surrender and sent his minister offering to apologize and capitulate. They want an armistice. We have no authority in the matter so we request the Council's decision."
The Council replied: "Keep him in the government rest house for the moment while we give the matter more thought."
Now the Grand Preceptor and Marshals Tong, Gao and Yang were all greedy men. The Tartar minister and his party to gain their ear had made sure that these four key players, and also all the members of the Military Council, had received sweeteners. They went around presenting gifts to every official in order to curry favour. At the next morning court, after all the courtiers had made obeisance, President of the Military Council Marshal Tong stepped forward and said: "Our army commander General Song Jiang has pushed the Tartars back into Yanjing and now has them under siege there. The city is on the verge of falling. The Tartar king has raised a flag of surrender and wants us to accept his capitulation. He has sent his minister to tender allegiance and offer both tribute and an apology. He wants to discuss peace and the withdrawal of our troops, the total cessation of hostilities. They say they will never again violate our frontiers. They beg you to look favourably on their request."
The Emperor said: "What are the views of all of you on this proposal to make peace and withdraw our troops?"
The Grand Preceptor now came forward: "We are all agreed on the matter. Historically it has never been our policy to annihilate the barbarian peoples on our frontiers. In my humble opinion, to maintain the Tartars as a buffer state on our northern border, paying annual tribute, is in the nation's best interest. We should accept their surrender and apology, order a complete cessation of hostilities, and bring our army back to defend the capital. It is not of course for us to decide the matter, but we beg your Majesty to do so."
The Emperor accepted the advice and issued a proclamation granting the Tartar delegation an audience. Accordingly a palace official directed the Tartar minister and all his delegation to present themselves at the palace to pay homage. An official handed in the Tartar King's petition, which was unrolled on the Emperor's desk. The herald read out in a loud voice:
Born in the wilds and bred among barbarians, I was totally ignorant of the laws of ethics, the obligations of morality. I was deceived by treacherous officials and lying generals, a pack of scoundrels who have the hearts of wolves allied to the habits of a dog and are greedy and corrupt, with the vision of a rat and the brains of a deer. In my benighted state, I allowed in an act of madness the violation of your borders, thus provoking stern reprisals by Your Majesty's army. When our rash commanders troubled your peace it was like ants trying to move Mount Tai or one who would stop a river flowing to the sea!
I am now sending my ambassador, Minister Chu Jian, to offer Your Majesty our lands and to request your judgement upon us. If you will pity our insignificance and spare this land inherited from our forefathers, and forgive us for what has happened, it will usher in a new era: we will employ our troops only in the defence of your frontier; all our people, young and old, will receive new life, our children and our children's children will bless you; we will pay tribute regularly and without fail.
Yel Hui, King of Liao
When the Emperor had studied the petition, everyone made obeisance and imperial wine was served in honour of the Tartar delegates. The latter brought in their tribute of gold and silk and the like and presented it to the Emperor. His Majesty ordered it all to be taken to the Treasury, and ordained that this procedure, with the tribute of cows, horses and other items — should be repeated each year. The Emperor also reciprocated with gifts of gold, silk and clothing and an official banquet was held. Afterwards Minister Chu Jian and his companions were told they should return home and await the arrival of the Emperor's envoy to supervise the surrender. They thanked the Emperor, took their leave of him and returned to the rest house.
After the court adjourned that day the delegates again sent someone to all the officials to hand out bribes. The Grand Preceptor gave every assurance that he and the other three would look after the Tartars' interests. Minister Chu Jian thanked him and returned to his country.
Next day the Grand Preceptor led all the courtiers into the court to request the preparation of a treaty to take to Liao. The Emperor consented and a member of the Hanlin Academy was immediately ordered to draft it. Marshal Su was to deliver the treaty and see it proclaimed in Liao. Orders were also given for Commissioner Zhao to instruct General Song to withdraw his troops and cease hostilities, bringing his army back to the capital. All prisoners were to be released, the captured cities restored to Tartar rule and all sequestered goods and property restored. The Emperor dismissed the court and the courtiers dispersed.
Next day all the members of the Military Council went to Marshal Su's palace to fix the date of his departure.

With the royal edict in his hands Marshal Su dared not delay. He organized his sedan, horses and retinue, took his leave of the Emperor and bade farewell to the members of the Military Council. Then with Mr. Chai and Magic Hand and the Tartar delegation, he set off for Chenbridge and the border. They were travelling in the depths of winter. There were thick red clouds and the ground was mantelled in snow, forests and plains all clad in white. Battling against the elements, Marshal Su and his party pressed on. The snow relented as they approached the frontier, but there was no thaw. Mr. Chai and Magic Hand sent messengers on ahead to inform Commissioner Zhao and forewarn General Song.

When Song Jiang got the message he arranged wine for their reception and with the other leaders rode forward fifteen miles to meet them. After the greetings the wine was served and there was general rejoicing. Song Jiang invited them all to his camp and arranged a welcoming banquet at which court affairs were discussed. Marshal Su described how the members of the Military Council, in particular the notorious four, had all taken the Tartars' bribes and vigorously promoted their cause with the Emperor, and how the peace proposal had been accepted, including recall of all troops and cessation of hostilities, the army returning to garrison the capital.

Song Jiang said somewhat sadly: "I don't wish to complain, but up till now our efforts seem to have brought us little reward."

Marshal Su said: "Do not worry, commander. When I get back I shall certainly commend your assiduity to the Emperor."

Commissioner Zhao added: "And I shall bear witness to your diligence and your achievements."

Song Jiang said: "There are one hundred and eight of us, and we have all striven loyally to defend the country, with no thought of personal gain. Our greatest wish is that we be allowed to continue together. But if you can find a way to advance our interests, we shall be most grateful."

There was great feasting and revelry that day and they did not break up till late. Later, messengers were sent to warn the Tartars to prepare for receiving the treaty.

Next day Song Jiang detailed ten leaders to escort Marshal Su into the Liao capital to proclaim the treaty. They were all in their best uniforms and gleaming armour and fully accoutred. This escort consisted of Scimitar, Leopard's Head, Thunderclap, Twin Rods, Colonel Hua, Twin Spears, Skyhawk, Mr. Chai, the Little Duke and the Halberdier. There were also three thousand troops, providing a close guard for the Marshal as he rode in. The people of Yanjing had not seen a Chinese military force for hundreds of years and when they heard about the Marshal's arrival there was great excitement. They placed incense and lanterns in their doorways. The King graciously rode out at the head of his officials, civil and military, to receive the imperial edict at the south gate and escorted them back to his palace. The ten leaders of the escort placed themselves around him and Marshal Su found a place to the left of the dragon pavilion. The King and his officials knelt outside the palace. The officials inside prostrated themselves, the king and his ministers prostrated themselves. The Tartar chief minister asked for the treaty and read it out, there in front of the palace:

The great emperor of Song proclaims:

Since the founding of the kingdom by the Three Emperors and Five Sovereigns, China has always had a ruler. It is to be supposed then that you barbarians will have your ruler too. The recent violation of our borders by the kingdom of Liao in contravention of heaven's law would justify your total annihilation. We have however considered your petition and been moved to compassion. We shall show mercy to you and not impose the ultimate penalty, but permit your state to go on existing. From the date of this edict all captured commanders shall go free and return home and all occupied lands will be handed back. But you must not neglect to pay the annual tribute. Respect our great nation and obey the laws of heaven and earth, for that is the duty of barbarians. You are warned!

When the chief minister finished his reading, the King and his ministers gave thanks. These ceremonies completed, an altar was set up for the edict to repose on and the King talked with Marshal Su. After some polite conversation he invited the emissary to an inner room where a royal banquet with choicest dishes was laid on. Wine was served and many a bumper drunk. There was song and dance throughout, the air full all the time of the sound of native flutes. Beautiful Tartar girls gave a spirited performance of their dance, spinning and gliding to the beat of their traditional instruments. At the end of it all, Marshal Su and his entourage were escorted to the guest quarters, where they slept. All the Marshal's suite received financial rewards that day.

Next day the King sent Minister Chu Jian to the camp to invite Commissioner Zhao and Song Jiang to join the revels in Yanjing. After discussing it with the Professor, Song Jiang decided it would not be appropriate for him to go, so the Commissioner went by himself and kept Marshal Su company that day at a grand banquet organized for the Song emissary by the Tartar king. Copious drafts of grape wine were poured from silver sconces and the meat of kids was served up on gold platters. There were exotic fruits and rare flowers everywhere. When it all drew to a close the king had costly objects brought on gold trays to offer the guests. They went on drinking till the small hours. On the third day the king summoned all his officials, civil and military, and to the sound of martial music they escorted Marshal Su and Commissioner Zhao back to the camp. Later the king instructed Minister Chu Jian to take gifts to the camp of oxen, sheep, horses, gold and silver and silk, to reward Song Jiang's army with a banquet and provide more gifts for all the leaders.

Song Jiang ordered the Tartar princess and her thousand followers to be set free and sent home. The captured cities of Tanzhou, Qizhou, Bazhou and Youzhou were restored to Tartar rule. He saw Marshal Su off on his return to the capital. He ordered all leaders to muster their troops, carts and drivers and named those who were to set off first, the main army being assigned to escort Commissioner Zhao. Song Jiang organized a banquet of his own in the camp to reward the waterborne leaders and despatched the boats and their crews to the capital with orders to await further orders when they got there.

Song Jiang again sent someone into the city to tell the chief minister and deputy chief minister that he wanted to talk to them. When the King sent them to him, Song Jiang invited them into his tent and made them sit in the place of honour. He began as follows: "Our army was at the gates of your city, it had reached your last line of defence and you were hard pressed. Originally we did not intend to let you off. We were going to take the city by storm and wipe you out. This would have been perfectly justified. But we agreed to let you petition the Emperor and he took pity on you, out of the kindness of his heart and decided not to persecute you but to accept your surrender and your offer to pay tribute and apologize. Now it is all settled and we are returning to the court. But you must not think we would not have defeated you, and make it an excuse for causing further trouble. Make sure you pay your taxes in full every year. We shall return home now, but you must have great care not to transgress again! If we have to come back we will not let you off lightly!"

The two ministers humbly knocked their heads on the ground to acknowledge their fault and in gratitude for the mercy shown them. After Song Jiang had repeated his warning in a gentler tone they gratefully withdrew.

Song Jiang appointed a body of troops with Steelbright in command to go on ahead. Then he ordered the regimental stonemasons to select a stone and had Magic Hand write out an inscription as a memorial of these events. After the Craftsman had inscribed the stone it was set up on Grassy Hill, about five miles east of Everbright, where it stands to this day.

Song Jiang now divided his army into five columns and set the day for their departure. At this point Monk Lu Zhishen unexpectedly came to his tent, bowed and said: "It is many years since the time when I killed the butcher and fled to Daizhou in Yanmen, where Mr. Zhao took me and introduced me to Abbot True Knowledge at the monastery on Mount Wutai and I shaved my head and became a monk. After I had twice got drunk and caused trouble in the meditation hall he sent me to Abbot Pure Knowledge at the Xiangguo Temple in the Eastern Capital to ask for a job. I was told I could look after the vegetable garden but when I rescued Leopard's Head from the wicked schemes of Marshal Gao I had to become an outlaw. I have been serving under you for a long time, many years now, and I keep thinking of my old teacher. I have never been back to see him. I can't help remembering how he said that although killing and burning was part of my nature, eventually I would find enlightenment. Now we are at peace, our problems all past, I would really like you to grant me a few days leave so that I may go to Mount Wutai and pay my respects. I intend also to make a donation to the temple of all the wealth I have received as booty and ask my teacher to tell me what my future holds. You go on ahead, please, with the army, and I will catch you up later!"

A great heaviness came over Song Jiang as he listened to this request. He said: "Why did you not tell us before that this living Buddha is so close at hand? We might all go to pay our respects and ask him about the future."

When he discussed it with the others, they all wanted to go. Only Taoist Gongsun declined. Song Jiang made plans with the Professor: "Let us leave the Craftsman, Redbeard, Magic Hand and Lungs with my deputy the Unicorn to command the army and continue the march. The rest of us, with just a thousand troops, will go with Monk Lu Zhishen to pay our respects to Abbot True Knowledge.

So Song Jiang and the others parted from the army. They collected incense, silk, garments, gold and silver and set off for Mount Wutai. Indeed they were set to Exchange the trappings of war and battle

For the unworldly halls of meditation;
On the terraces of rain and flowers
Visit the man of supreme virtue to pay him homage;
In the Hall of of Virtuous Conduct
Encounter the Buddha of the Burning Lamp, and Hear the sentence that governs the road to fame and wealth,
The word that transcends the problem of life and death.

On Mount Wutai, Song Jiang visits the Master & Consults the Seer; At Double Woods Crossing, the Prodigy Yan Qing meets an old friend

Song Jiang and the chieftains, taking only a thousand men, arrived with Lu Zhishen at the foot of Mount Wutai, and there made camp. A messenger was sent up the mountain to announce their presence. Divesting themselves of their armor, Song Jiang and his brothers started climbing the slope, on foot, wearing their military robes of embroidered silk. As they neared the monastery archway, they heard the pealing of bells and the beating of drums. Monks in large number came out to welcome them. They courteously greeted Song Jiang, Lu Zhishen and the others. Many of them remembered Zhishen. The sight of the hundred or more chieftains, arrayed neatly in ranks behind Song Jiang, filled them with awe and admiration.

"The abbot is meditating and cannot be disturbed," the elder told Song Jiang. "Please don't be offended, General." He invited the visitors to sit a while in the reception room.

Tea was served. An attendant entered and said: "The abbot has just completed his meditations. He invites the general to join him in the Meditation Hall."

*

Song Jiang and his entourage of over a hundred walked to the hall. The abbot came quickly down the steps and led them inside, where they exchanged courtesies. Song Jiang looked at the prelate. He was a man in his sixties. His hair and eyebrows were completely white. He had fine bones and the air of one who has lived long in remote mountains.

When all the chieftains had entered, Song Jiang requested the abbot to be seated. Then he and the chieftains lit incense and bowed. Lu Zhishen did the same.

The Tattooed Monk remained silent. Song Jiang stepped forward and said: "I have long known of your virtue, Abbot, but I never was fortunate enough to have the chance to see your noble visage. A campaign against the Liao has brought me to this region, and so I am able to offer homage to a great prelate. It gives me the utmost happiness. Lu Zhishen has been my brother. Although he has killed and set fires, he has never harmed good people, and his heart has been pure. It was he who led us here to pay our respects."

"High-ranking prelates who have called here have spoken at times of mundane affairs," said the abbot. "I have long known of your acting in Heaven's behalf, General, and your loyal heart. I know too how much emphasis your commanders place on chivalrous conduct. Following you, my disciple Lu Zhishen of course could do no wrong."

Song Jiang fulsomely expressed his thanks.

"Where did you get these things, my pupil? Immoral riches I can never accept."

"These are rewards I've accumulated. They're of no use to me. I've brought them especially for you, Teacher, to use for the benefit of all."

"They would mean little to our monks. I'll use the money to buy a set of sutras. Expiate your sins and you'll reach a state of purity."

Lu Zhishen thanked the abbot. Song Jiang, too, presented money and silks. The prelate adamantly refused to take them.

"If you won't accept our gifts, Teacher," said Song Jiang, "at least you can use them to provide vegetarian meals for the monks."

The callers rested at the monastery on Mount Wutai all that day, and the abbot entertained them at a meatless meal. Of that no more need be said.

After another vegetarian repast the next day, bells pealed and drums pounded in the temple on Mount Wutai. The abbot summoned his monks to hear him discourse and make predictions. Cassocks draped over their shoulders and carrying their cushions, they filed into the temple and sat down. Song Jiang, Lu Zhishen, and the other chieftains stood on either side.

A stone chime sounded, and two red gauze lanterns lighted the abbot to his chair on the dais. Holding a stick of smoldering incense, he offered a prayer.

"With this incense, I humbly wish ten thousand years to the emperor, with the empress at his side, and a thousand autumns to the prince. May the imperial children flourish, and the officials rise constantly in rank. Let there be peace throughout the land, and may the people be happy at their labors."

The prelate took another stick of incense. "May our patrons be at ease in body and mind, live for a thousand circuits of the sun, and their fame last forever."

Taking a third stick, the abbot intoned: "May the country be peaceful and the people serene for years to come, the five grains abundant, the three religions glorious, with calm on all four sides, and everything exactly as wished."

The prelate then seated himself, while the monks rose and stood, palms of their hands together. Song Jiang advanced with a stick, bowed and, palms together, addressed the abbot.

"I have a question. I wonder if I dare ask?"

"What is your proper query?"

"One's life on earth is limited, though suffering is without end. Man's body is weak. His greatest concern is life and death. I've come here to ask my fate."

The abbot's reply was cryptic: "By the six senses bound, by the four elements restricted, several times you've tumbled in the flames of battle. Alas, all living things afloat in this world futilely howl in mire and sand."

Song Jiang bowed and stood in attendance. The chieftains also advanced with incense and bowed.

"We pray only that we may live and die together," they said, "and meet always in future incarnations."

The monks then withdrew and the abbot invited his guests to dine on vegetarian fare in the Hall of Clouds. After the meal, Song Jiang and Lu Zhishen accompanied the abbot to Meditation Hall. They chatted until nightfall.

"Zhishen and I had hoped to spend many days with you, Teacher, dispelling our ignorance," said Song Jiang. "But as leader of a large army, I cannot stay too long. I do not understand your pronouncement. Since we're about to return to the capital, I pray you, Abbot, tell me what the future holds in store."

On a sheet of paper, the prelate wrote four phrases: When the shadows of the wild geese pass, in the east there is no unity. Cocking an eye he scores his mark, at Double Woods full prosperity.

The abbot handed the paper to Song Jiang. "Your whole life is here, General. Preserve this prediction well. In time it will come true."

Song Jiang looked at the paper. He couldn't make head or tail of it.

"I'm a stupid person. I don't understand. Please explain. Shall I expect good or ill?"

"These are mystic Buddhist words. Think them over. I cannot tell you clearly, lest I reveal Heaven's secrets."

The prelate then called Lu Zhishen before him and said: "I shall soon be leaving you forever, my pupil, to go to my just reward. You, too, I give a four phrase prediction. Keep it and use it all your life."

And the abbot wrote: Take Xia when you encounter him. Seize La when you meet. When you hear the tide, round out the circle. When you see the tide, in silence rest.

Bowing, Zhishen accepted the paper. He read it several times and concealed it on his person. Again he bowed and thanked his teacher.

"Remember these words, my pupil," said the abbot. "Don't forget your original form."

All retired to rest for the night. The following day, Song Jiang and Lu Zhishen, plus Wu Yong and the chieftains, bid the abbot farewell. The abbot and all the monks saw them off as far as the mountain arch of the monastery.

*

Song Jiang and his entourage hurried through the night and returned to the main army, where they were met by Lu Junyi and Gongsun Sheng. Song Jiang told them what had transpired on Mount Wutai and showed them abbot's prediction. They couldn't decipher it either.

"How could the likes of us hope to understand such secret religious Words," exclaimed Xiao Rang. Everyone sighed regretfully.

Song Jiang ordered the army to march. All three divisions headed for the Eastern Capital. After several days on the road, they reached a place called Double Woods Crossing.

Now Abbot True Knowledge of Mount Wutai, the community where Lu Zhishen had first been made a monk, was a living Buddha of the Song era and knew things that were past and things that were to come. Many years before he had recognized that Lu Zhishen was an exceptional person, both physically and mentally. But he knew also that Zhishen's human destiny was not yet fulfilled and he had to pay his debt for taking a life. He therefore sent him back to take his turn in the world of illusion. Nevertheless, the spiritual urge was alive in Lu Zhishen and he was now possessed by this idea of returning to pay his respects to his old master. Song Jiang also was endowed with a virtuous nature and had therefore decided to accompany him on the visit to Abbot True Knowledge.

When Song Jiang, together with the other leaders and their troops, reached the foot of Mount Wutai, he ordered them to make camp, and sent someone up first to the temple to announce their coming. They removed their armour and uniforms and dressed in civilian clothing set off up the mountain on foot. When they arrived at the temple gate they heard bells and drums inside and the monks came out to meet them and pay their respects. There were many among them who remembered Lu Zhishen, and were amazed to see him in the midst of this gallant company led by Song Jiang. "The Abbot has just started meditating," the Prior respectfully told Song Jiang. "I am afraid he cannot receive Your Excellency at the moment. Please do not be offended." He invited them to go and wait meanwhile in the reception hall. When they had been served tea a monk came in and said: "The Abbot has finished meditating and is ready to receive you in his quarters. Please come with me."

So Song Jiang with his company, who numbered over a hundred, followed their guide to the abbot's quarters. The Abbot courteously came out to greet them and invite them in. After the exchange of courtesies Song Jiang took stock of the old man. He had seen more than sixty summers and his eyebrows and beard were white, but his physique was still robust and his bearing dignified: he had the look of a truly spiritual man.

The leaders trooped inside. Song Jiang begged the Abbot to be seated while he lit incense and did homage, and the others also prostrated themselves. Next Lu Zhishen the Monk came forward with incense and did reverence. The Abbot said: "It is a good many years since you left here, my disciple. Haven't you had enough of killing and burning?" Lu Zhishen was at a loss for words. Song Jiang intervened. "I have heard so much of your virtue, Father," he said, "although my destiny has not permitted me hitherto to meet you and pay my respects. A command from the Emperor to fight the Tartars brings me here and allows me this opportunity to make your acquaintance. It is something I shall treasure all my life. Although my brother Zhishen is somewhat inclined to killing and burning, his heart is true and he does not harm the innocent. Besides, it is he who has brought us to you."

The Abbot said: "I receive many religious dignitaries here and I am not uninformed about worldly affairs. I have heard about you, General, how you do heaven's will and love honour and righteousness. If my disciple Zhishen is with you how can I possibly object?"
Song Jiang thanked him profusely.
Monk Lu Zhishen now took out a bundle containing gold, silver and brocades and offered it to his teacher. The Abbot said: "My son, where does all this stuff come from? I cannot receive goods that have been obtained unjustly."
"These are all things which I have received as reward for my own efforts," he replied. "They are no use to me and I came here expressly to give them to you, for the use of all."
The Abbot said: "The brothers would have no use for them. I will spend the money on our library of sacred texts. Curb your sinfulness my son and you will soon achieve virtue."
When Monk Lu Zhishen had thanked him, Song Jiang also tried to present some money and silk to the Abbot. The latter refused it. Song Jiang said: "If you will not accept this offer-ing, Father Abbot, let the father provisioner spend it on vege-tarian banquets for the whole community." They stayed the night, and the Abbot ordered vegetarian food for them. Of this no more.
Next day, the provisioner having made his preparations for a vegetarian banquet, bells and drums were sounded and the Abbot summoned all the monks to the Hall of the Law for prayer and instruction. A little later the whole community, wearing their robes and carrying their cushions to sit on processed into the hall. Song Jiang, Lu Zhishen and the others lined up on either side. A stone chime was struck and two red silk lanterns lit, as the Abbot was escorted to his throne. He began to offer up holy incense praying: "With this first stick of incense I pray in all humility for long life for the Emperor and prosperity for all his people. With this second stick of incense I pray for our benefactors, that they may have peace of body and mind and live for many years. With this third stick of incense I pray for the people of our land, that there may be peace and prosperity, that all may live in security and harmony, that the three faiths may flourish and good order prevail." After these prayers he seated himself on his throne and the monks lined upon either side each with joined palms in an attitude of reverent attendance.
Song Jiang now came forward and having offered incense did homage with joined palms. Then he said: "There is something I would like to ask you about, Master, if I may make so bold. In scripture it is said that our stay here on earth is limited, the sea of bitterness has no bourn, man's strength is puny and death conquers all."
"The six senses are tied many years, the four elements long remain embroiled," the Abbot replied. "Suffering must be endured in stone and flames, numerous vicissitudes experienced. Alas! All living things in this floating world incessantly cry out, plunged in mud and mire."
When the Abbot finished speaking, Song Jiang bowed and waited reverently to one side. The others now came forward to offer incense and swear an oath: "Our only wish is to live and die together, and always meet again in other lives." After this the monks processed out and everyone was invited to the refectory for the vegetarian banquet.
After this repast Song Jiang and Lu Zhishen went with the Abbot to his quarters, where conversation continued well into the night. Song Jiang had a request to make: "Lu Zhishen and I would have liked to submit ourselves to your guidance for several days, so you could point out our failings. But because I have to lead an army I cannot afford so much time. I am afraid the meaning of your pronouncement just now was not clear to me. Since I must now take my leave and return to the capital, I beg you to enlighten us as to what the future holds."

Wild geese breast the wind, their shadows falter;
Reunion in the east is out of reach.
Take careful aim and all will be achieved;
What the heart desires is finally attained.

He handed this to Song Jiang, saying: "This is your life, General. Keep it safely and it will serve you well."
Song Jiang was none the wiser and again asked: "Master, I am very stupid and I do not understand religious language. Would you please set my mind at rest by explaining it to me?"
The Abbot said: "It is mystic language. The meaning is hidden. You must work it out for yourself. It cannot be explained." He called on Monk Lu Zhishen to come forward and said to him: "When you leave this time, my disciple, I have to say goodbye to you forever. The reward is nigh. I have a four-line verse for you, which if you keep it in mind will serve you well for the rest of your days." He spoke thus:

Meet Xia and take a prisoner;
Find La and make an arrest.
Hear the tide and awake from darkness
Recognize old faithful and learn stillness.

Monk Lu Zhishen bowed his head as he received the mantra. Having read it several times he put it away and prostrated himself to show his thanks. They stayed one more night at the monastery and in the morning bade the Abbot farewell and departed. The abbot and monks saw them off as far as the main gate.
We shall now leave the Abbot and his community to return to their monastery while we follow Song Jiang and company as they hasten back to camp. When they rejoined the army, Song Jiang told the Unicorn about the oath they had all sworn on Mount Wutai, and took out the mantra to show it to him and Taoist Gongsun. None of them could make out its meaning. Magic Hand said: "It's not for people like us to interpret these mystic sayings." They all remained baffled.
Song Jiang gave orders for the army to march as soon as possible. The leaders passed the order on to their troops and they set off towards the eastern capital. Wherever they passed the troops committed no crimes at all and the people including old and young flocked to see these great generals. They all revelled in the brave sight presented by Song Jiang and his companions.
After a few days' march they came to a place called Double Woods. The citizens and a number of farmers from neighbouring villages lined the roadside to watch them. Song Jiang's men were riding in vee formation in pairs bridle to bridle. Suddenly in the foremost ranks a rider leapt from his saddle, plunged into the crowd of spectators on the left and dragged one of them out, shouting: "What are you doing here, brother?"
The two of them exchanged courtesies and began talking. When Song Jiang came up with them he saw that it was the Prodigy who had dismounted and was now deep in conversation with another man. Clasping his hands together, the Prodigy said: "Xu, old man, this is our leader General Song Jiang." Song Jiang reined in his horse to have a look at the stranger:
A piercing gaze from under well-shaped eyebrows; tall stature, a three-pointed beard. He wears a black gauze cap fitting closely over the forehead and a scholar's robe of rough brown cloth with a black border. A coloured sash binds his waist and he has square-toed black cloth slippers. This is not your ordinary rough and ready countryman, but a veritable hermit of the woods.
Seeing this fellow had a most unusual look about him and an elegant bearing, Song Jiang quickly dismounted, bowed respectfully and asked: "May I inquire your name, sir?"
The other prostrated himself and said: "Your fame is universal. I came here to pay my respects."
Such courtesy was almost embarrassing and Song Jiang quickly raised him up saying: "I have done nothing to deserve this!"
The other said: "My name is Xu Guanzhong. I am from the Eastern Capital, but now I am living in the country. The Prodigy and I are friends from the old days but we were parted over ten years ago and I had no idea I would meet him here today. I was delighted when I heard that he had enlisted in your company. When I heard about your defeat of the Tartars I came here to watch you go past. It's a sight I shall remember all my life. I would like to invite my friend back to my place so we can have a talk. Would you give him leave?"
The Prodigy also said: "It's a long time since I last saw friend Xu. This is a quite unexpected meeting. I like Mr. Xu's idea and I'd only be gone a short while. If you and the others carry on, I can catch you up later."
Song Jiang suddenly recollected: "The Prodigy has spoken much of you and described you in glowing terms. I just haven't had the good fortune of meeting you before. What would you say if I asked you to join us and give us the benefit of your experience?"
The other thanked him but said: "Your offer is most generous, General, and I have long wanted to be able to serve, but my mother is old, over seventy, and I cannot leave home."
Song Jiang said: "In that case I shall not try to persuade you." Turning to the Prodigy, he said: "Make sure you return, otherwise I shall be worried. Once we get to the capital, sooner or later there will be an audience with the Emperor."
The Prodigy said: "Of course I shall obey your command." Then he went to inform the Unicorn and they bade each other goodbye.
Song Jiang mounted and the company set off. When they had gone a bowshot, they saw that Song Jiang was still talking to the Prodigy's friend so they waited till Song Jiang clapped heels to his horse and then all rode on together.
Our story now divides in two. We must first tell how the Prodigy summoned his orderly, prepared his bundle for the journey and had another horse saddled. His own horse he gave to his friend to ride. He went into an inn by the roadside to take off his armour and change into civilian clothes. Then they both mounted and followed by the orderly with the luggage left Double Woods and headed northwest. After passing several villages and hamlets and many forests and hills, they came to a winding mountain road. They talked about old times and shared their feelings. Beyond the mountain was a broad river. After travelling ten miles or so, his friend pointed and said: "My house is up there, among those mountains." A few miles more and they were in the midst of the mountains. The view of the peaks and the river gorge was spectacular, and the Prodigy was so absorbed in the scenery he did not notice it was getting late:

Dusk gives birth to purple mists;
Water mirrors the red-flecked sky.

Now the great peak here was called Mount Majestic and in the old days the great Emperor Yu, Tamer of the Waters, came here, as evidenced by the words in the Classic: "To Mount Majestic he came." It is now in Xun district in the same province as the capital. But enough of that.
The Prodigy's friend took him through several mountain passes and then they came to a valley which had a flat floor about a mile across. Among a thick clump of trees two or three thatched cottages could be glimpsed. There were also some reed cabins facing the south bank of the river. This half hidden retreat stood within a compound hedged with bamboo: "With bamboos waving all about, set in a grove of scarlet maples and jade-green cypress." His friend pointed and said: "There is my humble abode."
Inside the fence the Prodigy could see a brown-haired village youth in a shirt of rough cloth, picking up some dry pine sticks and piling them under the thatched eaves. When he heard the horses' hooves the youth straightened up to look and gave shout of disbelief: "Horses! What are horses doing here?" Looking again he recognized his master on the second horse. He rushed out of the gate and stood with respectfully crossed arms, staring open-mouthed. Of course, when they were leaving the Prodigy's friend had said he didn't want bells on the harness, that is why they got so close without being heard. The two riders dismounted and went through the gate. The orderly tethered the horses. They entered the hall and both sat down in the places of guest and host. After tea had been served, his friend told the orderly to remove the horses' saddles and bridles and take them to the back for the farmhand to feed and water them. He gave the orderly a side room at the front to sleep in. The Prodigy went to pay his respects to his friend's mother. They then went to a westward-facing cottage on the east. A window seat at the back gave onto a stream of clear water. The two of them seated themselves beside the window, leaning on the sill.
"I'm afraid you must find my house a mean little place. I hope you won't think it beneath you!"
The Prodigy said: "Beautiful mountains, a rushing stream, what more could one ask for?"
His friend asked some questions about the campaign against the Tartars. After a while the village lad came with a lighted lantern. He closed the window and set up a table on which he laid several plates of vegetables, as well as dishes of chicken and fish, home-grown fruit and a jug of warm wine. The Prodigy's friend poured a cup and presented it to him, saying: "I invited you here but I've only rough wine and country fare to offer you. I know it's not adequate."
The Prodigy was profuse in his thanks: "You're really far too kind," he said.
After they'd had a few cups, the scene outside was bathed in moonlight. The Prodigy opened the window to look out. It was perfect: a gentle breeze, fleeting clouds, pale moon, clear stream, the water in shadow, the mountain bright, the whole house bathed in light. The Prodigy marvelled at it all. "Those days in the capital we used to be inseparable. Then when you had to go away to fight we lost touch. Now you have found this wonderful spot, nothing could be finer! Whereas I ... well, just look at me, driven this way and that, never a moment to sit down and relax!"
His friend smiled and said: "Song Jiang is such a great man, he towers over all the rest. He is one of the stars. And now he has quelled those marauders. As for me, hiding in the wilds in my little snail's shell of a home, how can I be compared with you lot? There is that in my character which does not accord with the times. Everywhere I see power falling into the hands of unscrupulous men and corrupt courtiers. This is why I have no desire for public office. But I have travelled a good deal and seen a lot of beautiful scenery. I have given it all some thought," he ended with a laugh. He rinsed the cups and poured again. The Prodigy took out some twenty taels of silver and offered it to him, saying: "Just a small gift, I hope you won't despise it." His friend resolutely refused to take it. The Prodigy urged him to, saying: "You have such ability. Why don't we go to the capital together and look out for an opportunity, get ourselves positions?"
His friend sighed deeply and said: "Nowadays the wicked hold sway. They resent good men and those who are truly able. They're devils and monsters, all puffed up with pride. Men who are honest and true are thrown into prison and ruined. My ambition died long since. If you ever achieve fame and success, you should seek retirement immediately. Remember the old saying: 'When the birds are finished, the trusty bow is put away.'"
The Prodigy nodded and sighed. They sat up talking half the night before finally taking themselves to bed.
Next day, after washing and breakfasting early, his friend showed the Prodigy all round the district. The Prodigy climbed the hill to see the view. You could see peak after peak. To the west it was nothing but mountains, no sound but the cries of wild animals, and not the least trace of human activity. It was difficult to estimate the number of people living in these mountains, but there can't have been more than a score of households. The Prodigy said: "This is truly paradise."
All day the Prodigy feasted his eyes on the scenery and when evening came he slept there another night.
Next day the Prodigy announced his departure: "I don't want to keep General Song waiting. I really must go."
When his friend was seeing him off, he said: "Wait just a moment!" A minute later the village lad appeared with a hand scroll, which the friend presented to the Prodigy, saying: "Here are some rough sketches I made the other day — they're not very good I'm afraid. You can look at them properly when you get to the capital. Perhaps you will find some use for them."
The Prodigy thanked him and told the orderly to pack the scroll. The two friends were loath to part and they walked a little of the way together. Eventually the Prodigy said: "You can go a hundred miles when you see someone off, but in the end you've still got to say goodbye. Don't come any further. It'll be such a long way back for you!" It was with infinite sadness that they parted. The Prodigy stood for a long time watching his friend go, and then at last mounted. He told the orderly to do likewise and they rode off.
They wasted no time on the journey. As luck would have it, Song Jiang was camped outside at Chenbridge when they arrived, awaiting the Emperor's command. Of their reunion, when the Prodigy entered the camp, we need say nothing.
Now Marshal Su and Commissioner Zhao had entered the capital first with their troops and had told the Emperor about the valiant performance of Song Jiang and his men. They announced that Song Jiang had brought his troops back and was waiting outside the city. Zhao described what a hard time Song Jiang and his army had had of it on the frontier. The Emperor asked many questions and everyone was full of praise. It was decreed that the chamberlain should announce that Song Jiang and the others were to ride in full armour into the city for an audience with the Emperor. Accordingly they dressed themselves in full armour and battle uniform, with leather belts, helmets, and chain mail and embroidered silk robes with gold and silver insignia and rode in through the Gate of Eastern Splendour for their audience. Arriving at the Hall of Culture and Ethics they saluted and gave three rousing cheers for the Emperor. They made a brave spectacle, all in military uniform except the Professor, Taoist Gongsun, Monk and Pilgrim who followed their own style of dress. The Emperor expressed his pleasure: "I have heard of your trials and tribulations, of how hard the battle was on the frontier and how many of you were wounded, I was deeply affected by it."
Song Jiang prostrated himself again and said: "It is a consequence of the blessings that attend upon Your Majesty's reign that, despite some wounds, we have all come through safely. Today the rebels have surrendered and peace has returned to the border regions. Under Your Majesty's august rule how can we count anything a hardship?" He prostrated himself again. When the Emperor gave orders that the Military Council decide what rank to confer on them, the Grand Preceptor and Council President Marshal Tong said: "We beg Your Majesty to allow us more time to consider the matter of official rank." The Emperor conceded this. Meanwhile a banquet was arranged in their honour. Song Jiang was rewarded with a silk robe, a suit of gold armour and a fine horse, and the Unicorn and the others were likewise presented with gold and cloth, all from the palace coffers. The whole company expressed their thanks. Then they left the palace. Outside the Gate of Eastern Splendour they mounted and returned to camp, to await further orders. Time passed and the Grand Preceptor and the President of the Council did nothing about conferring military rank. They were determined to put it off.
One day Song Jiang was sitting idly in the camp chatting with the Professor about things past and present, things lost and gone, when the Magic Messenger and Madcap marched in wearing civilian dress. "I'm bored with sitting here in the camp with nothing to do," Magic Messenger said. "I want to go off on an excursion with my friend Madcap. Can we have your permission?"
"All right, but come back in good time and we'll have a few cups together," Song Jiang said.
The two of them left Chenbridge and wandered slowly northward. After passing through several small towns or villages, they suddenly came upon a large stone monument beside the road. There were words on the stone which read: "The inventor of writing". There was also some lines of smaller characters half obliterated by the wind and rain and hard to decipher. Magic Messenger looked and said: "This must be where the Father of Writing made his discovery."
Madcap laughed and said: "Fat lot of good that is to the likes of us! Illiterate bastards we are!"
Still laughing at this they proceeded on their way. They came next to a place where there was a wide open space covered in broken tiles. On the north side of this was a stone memorial arch with a horizontal stone inscription bearing the words "Bolang Town". Magic Messenger examined it for a moment and then said emotionally: "And this must be where Zhang Liang the Abnegator proposed the tactics that would defeat the old dynasty and secure the rise of the Han!"
Madcap said: "What a pity that mallet did not strike home!"
They contemplated all this for a while and then headed on north again till they were six or seven miles from the camp. Madcap said: "We've been fooling around long enough. We'd better find somewhere to have a bowl of wine and then go back."
"That looks like an inn ahead of us," Magic Messenger said. They went in and found themselves a cheerful place to sit beside the window. Magic Messenger struck the table and cried: "Bring us wine!"
The waiter laid five or six dishes of vegetables on the table and said, "How much wine, sirs?"
"Bring us two measures to start with."
The waiter was back in no time with the wine and also plates of beef, mutton, and tender chicken. As they sat there drinking and talking, a man came in. He was carrying an umbrella, a staff, a pack on his back, wore a black shirt, 8-eyelet sandals, and had a bag tied to his belt. Breathing hard, he put down the umbrella, pack, and sat himself down. "Bring me some wine, fast!" he shouted. The waiter brought a measure of wine and some plates of vegetables. "No need for ceremony," the man said. "If you've any meat just cut me a plate. I'll eat it as it comes. I'm on an urgent mission!"
He began to gulp the wine down. Magic Messenger stared at him. He was thinking to himself, "I bet this bugger's a policeman. I wonder what the hell he's up to!" Joining his hands in respectful greeting, he asked: "What business do you've, friend, that's so urgent?" The other never stopped eating and drinking and the words came out in dribs and drabs. What he said was to have consequences: Song Jiang was to gain yet more merit and a vast tract of land was to be restored to the rule of Song.

Song Jiang leads his army across the Yellow River; The Unicorn takes a city by trickery on a dark night

The campaign against the Liao Tartars is over and Magic Messenger and Madcap have been off on a private jaunt. On their way back to the camp they stop for a drink and their attention is drawn to a stranger who has just told the waiter he is on an urgent mission.
Since the man looked like a policeman and was obviously in a tearing hurry, Magic Messenger asked: "What business are you on exactly?"
The man put down his chopsticks and wiped his mouth before saying: "Have you heard about the insurrection of Tian Hu of Hebei?"

"We know a bit about it," Magic Messenger said.
"This bastard Tian Hu has seized a number of districts and provinces up there in the North and the government troops just can't stop him. Only recently he took Gaizhou and sooner or later he will attack Weizhou. The inhabitants go in fear night and day and in the country the peasants have all fled. The authorities have sent me with an urgent message for the Military Council."
He jumped up immediately, shouldered his pack, collected his umbrella and cudgel, paid the bill and made his exit. As he was going out of the door, he said disconsolately: "A policeman's lot is truly a hard one. I've had to leave all my family back there in the city. I only hope the court will send troops as fast as possible!" With that he hastened off in the direction of the capital.
After hearing this news, Magic Messenger and Madcap also paid up and left. When they got back to the camp, they told Song Jiang what they had heard. Song Jiang discussed it with the Professor. "We're all of us just wasting our time here. It's not good for morale. Wouldn't it be better to ask the Emperor to let us get involved in the action?" he said.
The Professor said: "The best way would be to speak to Marshal Su about it first."
A general meeting of all the leaders was held to discuss the plan and everyone approved. Next day Song Jiang dressed in his official uniform and rode into the city with a dozen horsemen. He went straight to Marshal Su's palace. The Marshal was in his office and he had Song Jiang shown in immediately. Song Jiang prostrated himself and then stood to attention. "What can I do for you, General?" the Marshal said.
Song Jiang said: "Your Excellency, I have heard that Tian Hu of Hebei is in revolt, that he has seized several provinces and declared himself emperor and has even got as far as taking Gaizhou and is expected to attack Weizhou any minute. I and my men have been idle a long while. We would like to take an army to fight the rebels and defend our country. We hope you will be kind enough to obtain authorization for this."
The Marshal was enthusiastic: "It is greatly to your credit that you want to serve your country, General," he said. "I will do all I can to obtain the Emperor's consent."
"We are most grateful. We can never repay you," Song Jiang said.
The Marshal ordered wine for Song Jiang. In the evening Song Jiang returned to the camp and told the others.
Marshal Su went to the palace next day for the dawn audience and saw the Emperor in the Hall of Incense. The Military Council had just reported on Tian Hu's rebellion, how he had occupied five provinces and fifty-six districts and proclaimed a new dynastic name with himself as emperor, how he had just captured another city and how aid was urgently requested. The Emperor was greatly disturbed. He said to his officials: "Which of you is willing to lead an army to suppress these rebels for me?" Marshal Su stepped forward. Clutching a tablet to his chest he bowed and respectfully submitted: "I have been told that Tian Hu has the strength to snap wood and bend poles. This is a forest fire that can only be put out by the efforts of a determined commander with bold troops. General Song Jiang has just returned victorious from his defeat of the Tartars and is camped outside the city. I beg Your Majesty to send him and his men to put down the rebellion. I am sure they will do well."
The Emperor was pleased with this proposal and ordered an official of the Military Council to fetch Song Jiang and the Unicorn to the Hall of Incense for an audience. When they had kowtowed, His Majesty spoke: "I know of your valiant exploits. I now have another commission for you . I wish you to go north to Hebei. You must shirk no hardship and quickly return victorious. I will reward you with promotion."
They kowtowed and said: "We thank you, Your Majesty, for having such faith in us. We shall do our utmost and serve you even unto death."
The Emperor openly showed his pleasure and he appointed Song Jiang Commander-in-Chief of the Northern Pacification Expedition, with the Unicorn as his second-in-command. They were rewarded with imperial wine, with gold and silver, gilt armour and rolls of silk and the other leaders all received silk and silver. Their orders were to put down the rebellion and they were promised rank and honours according to their results. The divisional commanders were all to be paid in silver from the Palace Treasury. A deadline was set for the start. Song Jiang and the Unicorn went once more to express their appreciation of the honour, receive their commission and take leave of the Emperor. After this they rode back to camp and held a meeting in their tent to which all the leaders were summoned. They were told to get their horses and armour ready for the campaign against Tian Hu.
Next day the Treasury paid out the silver and silk for the leaders to distribute among their subordinates. Song Jiang and the Unicorn ordered the water-borne leaders to sail first, proceeding to Yuanwu on the Yellow River, where they were to await the arrival of the main force and ferry them across. The cavalry leaders were ordered to prepare their horses for a joint attack by land and water.
Now this villain Tian Hu was originally a simple hunter. He was very strong, experienced in combat, and addicted to the company of evil youths. His base of operations was surrounded by mountains and well adapted to defence. The people of this area, it being susceptible to flood and drought, were poor and their resources scarce, so rebellion was never far from their thoughts. Tian Hu had profited from the situation to assemble a bunch of ruffians, trump up false rumours and inflame the minds of simple people. At first he simply engaged in plunder; later he seized control of whole districts and the authorities dared not stand in his way.
But why, you will ask, if Tian Hu was just a hunter was he so formidable? Let me explain: in those days government officials were greedy and military commanders cowardly. Although every district had its own garrison of government troops, they were made up of troops who were old and infirm, or just plain fictitious, and all they did was eat up the funds, one man accounting for the entitlement of two or three, or else those who had nothing better to do would simply fork out some silver and buy a stand-in, purchase a proxy, in order to get their hands on government supplies. There were those too who would hire someone to answer for them when the roll was called for training exercises. Since everyone covered up for everyone else it was impossible to unmask them. The government spent a fortune and had nothing at all to show for it. When it came to war, the troops had no idea how to fight. There was no discipline and when they saw the dust of battle or heard the shots they behaved as if they wished their parents had given them two sets of legs. There were one or two commanders who led out armies against Tian Hu, but they hadn't the guts to take him on; all you saw of them was their rears as they fled in all directions. They faked the reports and even killed good men in order to take credit for themselves. Because of harassment by the government troops the people became still more disaffected and flocked to the rebel cause. That is how the rebels had come to occupy five provinces and fifty six districts. Tian Hu had built himself a palace at Fenyang and set up a bogus government, styling himself Prince of Jin. He had keen troops and bold generals and his position was well defended. At present he was advancing with his army in two columns.
Song Jiang picked the day to start and bade farewell to the members of the Military Council. Marshal Su came to see him off in person, and Commissioner Zhao at the Emperor's behest came to the camp to reward the army. The leaders thanked him and then gave the army its marching orders. Three guns were fired and with a brave accompaniment of drums and gongs they set forth, heading northeast.
It goes without saying that Song Jiang gave the strictest orders to his troops to maintain good discipline and not cause the least harm in any of the places they passed through. When they reached Yuanwu district, local officials came out to meet them. Their scouts reported that the boat commanders were already at the river bank waiting to ferry them across. Song Jiang ordered the White-Water Dragon and the other boat chiefs to divide their six hundred sailors into two groups, left and right. They were to commandeer some local boats and load all the horses and carts. One by one Song Jiang and the other leaders were ferried across to the northern bank. The boat chiefs were then ordered to take the battle fleet on and assemble in the Wei River at Weizhou.
On reaching Weizhou Song Jiang's vanguard pitched camp. The local officials had organized a banquet to entertain Song Jiang. When he arrived, they told him: "Tian Hu's bandits are a huge force. It won't be easy to disperse them. Zezhou is defended by Tian Hu's second-in-command Niu Wenzhong. He has sent two of his lieutenants with ten thousand men to attack some of our villages and he is leading ten thousand troops himself against the neighbouring province. We urgently need your help!"
Song Jiang heard them out and then returned to the camp to consult with the Professor about sending a relief force. The Professor said: "Lingchuan is of great strategic importance to Gaizhou. Wouldn't it be better to take a force there to attack it, then we can break the siege in two places at once."
The Unicorn then said: "Inexperienced though I am, I would like to lead the attack on Lingchuan."
Song Jiang thought this a good idea and allotted the Unicorn ten thousand cavalry and five hundred infantry. With him were to go ten cavalry commanders and nine infantry commanders. He set off next day.
Song Jiang was in his tent, still planning the campaign with the Professor. "The bandits are over-confident," the latter said. "The Unicorn should be able to defeat them. The only problem is that this whole region has very rugged terrain, full of mountains and gorges; we should send two leaders to reconnoitre and spy out the land before we attack."
Hardly had he finished when the Prodigy came to the tent and said: "You needn't worry, Professor. I've got a map of the area right here." He took out a hand scroll and unrolled it on the table. Song Jiang and the Professor submitted it to a thorough scrutiny. It depicted every mountain, gorge, walled city and pass in the region. Every detail could be read on it — where you could camp, where an ambush could be laid, where a pitched battle could be fought.
"Where did you get this?" the Professor asked in amazement.
The Prodigy replied: "Remember how we were coming back from the campaign against the Tartars and I ran into my old friend Xu Guanzhong at Double Woods? He invited me to go and stay with him and when I was leaving he presented me with this scroll. He called it just a rough sketch, but when I got back to the camp and had some spare time, I happened to take it out to look at it and realized it was a perfect representation of this whole area."
Song Jiang said: "The day you came back I was just getting ready for my audience with the Emperor and I didn't really have time to ask you much. He looked like a good man, that friend of yours. You've told me a lot about his good qualities; what exactly is he doing nowadays?"
The Prodigy answered: "Guanzhong is a very talented person. He is skilled in martial arts, extremely brave, and has all the lesser accomplishments like music and painting. But he doesn't want to join the government service, so he has retired to the country." He went on in this vein at length, till the Professor said: "It's truly a miracle that such an honest man exists!" He and Song Jiang were hugely impressed.
Now the Unicorn first ordered the Tamer and Colonel Sun, with three thousand men to set up an ambush about two miles east of Lingchuan, and the Tattooed Dragon and the Blue-Faced Beast with three thousand men to take up a position the same distance to the west. "Tonight at the fifth drumbeat," he told them, "we will advance stealthily with the men gagged and no harness bells. Tomorrow we will attack. If the enemy are unprepared and we take the city, we will hoist a signal on the south gate and you will move cautiously into the city to join us. If their preparations are good, we will fire a gun and both supporting forces must join in the attack at once." The four leaders set off.
Before dawn next day the Unicorn rose and breakfasted and led his forces bravely to the walls of the city. There they divided into three units, deployed in a straight line and with waving banners and thundering drums issued their challenge to the enemy.
The guards on the walls raced to report to the commander Dong Cheng and his two lieutenants. This Dong Cheng was Niu Wenzhong's vanguard commander. He was tall and strong and wielded a long wind-splitter of a sword. When he heard that the Song court had sent troops from Mount Liang and that they were already positioned outside the city ready to attack, he hurriedly called a meeting at his headquarters to appoint those who were to counter-attack. One of his lieutenants, Geng Gong, warned: "I have heard that this company of Song Jiang's are not to be taken lightly. We ought to concentrate on defence and send someone to Gaizhou to request reinforcements. If we attack them from two sides we can defeat them."
His commander reacted indignantly: "It is intolerable that those blighters should have the nerve to come here and threaten our city. But they've had to march a long way and they must be tired. Just wait while I go and deal with them — there'll be no survivors!"
He was not moved by anything Geng Gong could say and only responded with: "You stay here then with a thousand men to guard the city. Go up into the gate tower and watch while I slaughter the bastards!" He hurriedly armed and took up his weapon and together with another of his lieutenants, sallied forth to do battle.
The gates were opened, the drawbridge lowered and several thousand troops poured across. They were met with solid fire from the Song army. Heralded by a roll of drums, Dong Cheng rode forward and shouted: "You bog-dwelling scum, prepare to meet your death!"
Whiskers galloped forward from the other side and shouted back: "We are the government forces. I'd advise you to dismount and let us tie you up, double-quick. It'll save us dirtying our weapons!"
To cheers from both sides, the two warriors met in the middle ground. The horses clashed, weapons were raised. They had not fought more than ten bouts when Whiskers whirled his horse about and galloped off eastward. Dong Cheng gave chase. Colonel Hua on the eastern flank levelled his spear and received his charge. They fought over thirty bouts and neither had the advantage. The other rebel commander who had remained close to the drawbridge saw that his chief was not having much success. He whirled his steel lance, slapped his horse and charged to the rescue. Hard pressed now by two opponents, Colonel Hua turned and galloped off to the east, his two opponents following close behind. Then he turned again and resumed the fight.
Within the city Geng Gong saw his two comrades pursuing the enemy and fearing something might go amiss was about to sound the gongs and drums to recall their forces when a bold company charged forward from the Song ranks — it was made up of ten commanders, Iron Ox, Monk, Pluto, the Eight-Armed Ogre and others. Together they raced towards the drawbridge. Before their ferocious onslaught the northerners' resistance crumbled. Geng Gong ordered the gates closed.
Well, it's slow in the telling but happens in a flash: Monk and Iron Ox were already inside the city. When the guards on the gate rushed forward in a body to repel them, Monk gave a triumphant shout and felled two of them with his staff, while Iron Ox whirling his axes knocked down five or six more. Pluto and the others rushed forward and seized the gate, scattering the remaining guards. Geng Gong saw things were going badly and rushed down from the tower. He tried to escape to the north but was caught by the foot soldiers and made prisoner.
Dong Cheng and his lieutenant, who were still engaged with Colonel Hua, heard the outcry from the drawbridge and turned their horses and galloped back. Instead of pursuing them Colonel Hua placed his lance in the rest and taking his bow and an arrow, aimed carefully at the middle of Dong Cheng's back and fired. Dong Cheng plunged from the saddle, legs waving in the air. The Unicorn and his commanders gave the signal and the whole army charged. The lieutenant was transfixed by a thrust from Twin Spears, the majority of the troops were killed and the remainder fled in all directions. All the Song commanders now entered the town. Iron Ox charged around killing everyone he met, devastating as a forest fire. Only when the Unicorn gave the order: "Don't harm the people, brother," did he consent to stop.
The Unicorn quickly ordered his officers to hoist the army's flag on the south gate to inform the troops waiting in ambush, and also ordered a guard to be set on all the gates. In no time the troops from the ambush arrived. The heads of the two dead northern commanders were handed in and Pluto brought in the captive Geng Gong and some others. The Unicorn had them released from their bonds. He raised Geng Gong up and made him sit as guest in the place of honour.
Geng Gong prostrated himself in gratitude and said: "I am a defeated general, yet you treat me so generously!"
The Unicorn raised him up again and said: "You did not come out of the city to fight. You are cleverer than the rest of Dong Cheng's lot. General Song welcomes good men. If you are willing to renew your allegiance to the Emperor, General Song will surely help to secure you a post."
Geng Gong bowed and thanked him again, saying: "Since you have graciously spared my life, you can count me your slave."
The Unicorn, in the best of moods, did all he could to reassure these enemy leaders and at the same time had notices posted to calm the populace. He rewarded his own troops, and laid on wine to entertain Geng Gong and his companions.
When the Unicorn questioned Geng Gong about the strength of the Gaizhou garrison, the latter replied: "Gaizhou is garrisoned by Marshal Niu's men. There's two towns to the west of it, but on the way from here there's only Gaoping, about twenty miles away at the foot of Mount Hanwang. It is defended by Zhang Li and Zhao Neng with twenty thousand troops under them."
On hearing this the Unicorn toasted Geng Gong, saying: "Drink this cup with me, General. This evening I would like you to do something for me. I hope you won't refuse."
Geng Gong said: "In view of your generosity, sir, I am ready to do anything for you."
The Unicorn said: "If you accept, I will give instructions to some of my comrades and their subordinates. If you don't mind I would like to start at once."
He summoned the five or six recently captured commanders, rewarded them with food, wine and silver, promising them more if they succeeded. When they finished the wine, he ordered Iron Ox and Pluto and seven other infantry commanders, with a hundred picked infantrymen, to dress in the Lingchuan soldiers' uniforms and insignia. He also ordered Tattooed Dragon and the Blue-Faced Beast to take five hundred cavalry with muffled harness bells and follow Geng Gong's party at a certain distance. He told Colonel Hua and the rest to defend the town. He himself took three thousand men and followed on in support.
When all the orders had been given, Geng Gong and his party set off according to plan. It was late in the day and by the time they arrived at the south gate of Gaoping dusk had fallen. By the light of the stars they could make out the banners thickly clustered on the walls and hear the sharp beat of the drum sounding the hours. Geng Gong shouted out: "I am Geng Gong, from the Lingchuan garrison. The city has fallen because two of our commanders wouldn't listen to me and opened the gates to attack the enemy. I quickly mustered these hundred men and escaped through the north gate. I got here by taking small paths. Just let me in, will you?"
The guards recognized him by the light of their torches and quickly went to tell generals Zhang and Zhao. These two went up onto the walls themselves whilst their men lit many torches and illuminated the scene all around. Zhang shouted back to Geng Gong: "You seem like one of ours all right, but I'd like to have a closer look." He went down and made a thorough examination to satisfy himself that it was indeed Geng Gong of Lingchuan and all the uniforms and insignia were a hundred percent correct. Among the troops of the garrison there were many who knew the commanders and they pointed them out: "That's so-and-so, that's so-and-so." Zhang confessed himself satisfied and said: "Let them in!"
So the gates opened, the drawbridge was lowered, and thirty or forty troops lined the drawbridge while Geng Gong entered the town. The troops in the rear jostled and pushed, shouting: "Get inside, get inside, they're after us!" They paid no heed to their commander. The guards on the gate shouted: "What's going on? Let's have some order here!"
As this dispute was raging, fires were seen at the foot of Mount Hanwang and a squadron of horsemen advancing, the two leaders in front shouting: "Rebel commanders stand and fight!" Already seven ferocious beasts had mingled with Geng Gong's soldiers — these were Iron Ox, Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre, Winged Ghost, the Red-Haired Devil, Morbid and Madcap. All now drew their weapons and stormed into the city, a hundred or so strong. Those in the city had no time to act; they couldn't even manage to get the gates shut. Inside and outside the walls the guards were slaughtered by the dozen. The invaders gained control of the gates and Zhang could only curse. When he rushed down from the walls looking for Geng Gong, he ran into Madcap. After three or four bouts Zhang lost heart and fled, trailing his spear. Iron Ox caught him from behind. An axe smashed down and Zhang was cut in two. By now the party of horsemen from the bottom of Mount Hanwang had reached the city and thrust their way in. It was led by the Tattooed Dragon and the Blue-Faced Beast. Each set about killing the northerners on his own account. The second commander was killed in the mêlée and most of the garrison of Gaoping died with him. Zhang's family were all put to the sword. For the people it was as if they had woken in the midst of a nightmare. Their screams rose to heaven. After a while the Unicorn led his army into the city. He ordered a guard to be put on every gate, and deputed a dozen of his men to go about shouting that the people were not to be harmed. At dawn notices were put up to reassure the people, rewards were distributed among the army and a messenger sent to inform Song Jiang.
How had the Unicorn been able to subdue two cities so easily and so fast? The reason was that Tian Hu's forces lacked discipline and recent battle experience. They underestimated the military threat and the valour of Song Jiang's forces. The Unicorn's success was beyond his expectations, but the Professor had calculated that this time he would succeed.
But enough of this. Song Jiang's forces, remember, were camped outside Weizhou. He was holding a meeting in his tent when he heard that the Unicorn had sent a messenger with news and was asking for further orders to attack.
"The Unicorn has captured two towns in succession. We've got them on the run!" he said to the Professor delightedly.
At this moment scouts from the two armies came in and reported: "Two more towns have surrendered, after hearing that Lingchuan has fallen."
Song Jiang said to the Professor: "For astute planning, the world has seldom seen your like!"
He wanted to strike camp at once and march westwards to link up with the Unicorn for a further push. But the Professor said: "There are enemy held cities both right and left of us here in Weizhou, the river is to the south and there is another city on the west. The topography makes it easy to defend, but if the enemy know we are going west, they can move south and cut our forces in two. Then what will we do?"
"You're absolutely right," Song Jiang said. He ordered Scimitar, Twin Rods and Taoist Gongsun to take five thousand cavalry and strengthen the defences of Weizhou. He also ordered the boat captains, White-Water Dragon, the Pilot, White Eel, the Ruan Brothers and the Tong Brothers, to anchor their boats on the Wei River outside the town to protect the flank. These orders were carried out.
In due course Song Jiang and the main army struck camp and set out. Nothing happened on the way. When they reached Gaoping the Unicorn came out to receive them.
"My dear friend," Song Jiang said. "You have subdued two cities, in short order. It's no mean achievement. Everything shall be recorded on the roll of honour."
The Unicorn brought the recently surrendered Geng Gong and introduced him. Song Jiang said: "You have repented the error of your ways and returned to the straight path, General. Join me now in fighting for the country's good. The Emperor will certainly reward you with high office."
Geng Gong prostrated himself in thanks and then stood to attention.
Song Jiang's army was too big so he did not march them into the city but camped outside. The same day he had a meeting with the Professor and the Unicorn to decide where to attack next. The Professor said: "The mountains round Gaizhou are high, the valleys deep, and access is difficult. We have just taken two places in the region and their forces are isolated. If we now take Gaizhou we split them in two. We can then divide our forces and attack on two fronts and Weisheng will fall." Song Jiang said: "That is exactly what I was thinking."

He ordered Mr. Chai and Skyhawk to guard Lingchuan and told Colonel Hua and six others to get ready. The Tattooed Dragon and the Unstoppable were to guard Gaoping. Mr. Chai and 3 others went off according to instructions. At this point Hotshot made a request: "I've been unwell the last two days. I'd like to stay in Gaoping for a while until I'm better. I'd be available for general duties in the camp." Song Jiang sent him into Gaoping with Doctor An for treatment. Next day when Colonel Hua and his party arrived, Song Jiang split the army into 5 divisions. These 5 divisions bore down on Gaizhou like a dragon rising from the ocean or a tiger emerging from the forest. It was a time when all were determined to gain glory, eager for their part in the spoils!

Song Jiang's army in five divisions was marching on Gaizhou. When scouts from that city heard about it, they rushed back to report. The garrison commander, Niu Wenzhong, had cut his teeth in the greenwood and prospered there, finding rich pickings among the rivers and lakes. He had put his wealth at the disposal of Tian Hu and aided and abetted him in his rebellion. For grabbing large tracts of Song territory he was rewarded with the rank of marshal. His weapon was a double-edged three-pointed affair and he was exceptionally skilled in its use. He had four valiant commanders to help him run Gaizhou, Lionface Fang, Tigercat An, Wildcat Chu and Bearcat Yu, and each of these four had four lieutenants, so there were sixteen of them in all. The garrison of Gaizhou under Niu and his commanders consisted of thirty thousand northern troops. When they heard that Lingchuan and Gaoping had fallen, they had made their own preparations, while also sending to Weisheng and Jinning for help. On receipt of the latest report Lionface Fang was ordered out with his four lieutenants to engage the enemy. Just before they started, Niu told them: "I want you to know, comrades, that I shall be right behind you, ready to give support."

Lionface said: "No need for you to bother yourself, Marshal. It was only bad luck that those other two towns fell. They got them by trickery. I vow not to return if I don't kill half a dozen of them today."

They put on their armour and rode out of the east gate. The Song vanguard met them. Everyone took up battle positions and the sound of war drums shook the heavens. From the pennants gate in the northern ranks Lionface Fang rode forth, followed by his four lieutenants, banners fluttering on either side. He wore a tall cap, dragon-scale armour and a green brocade robe, a belt with a lion clasp and green boots. Over his left shoulder was a bow, over his right a quiverful of arrows. He rode a dun thoroughbred and held a steel spear. "You bog-dwelling bandits," he bellowed, "how dare you come and steal our cities by trickery?"

From the ranks of the Song army Colonel Sun answered: "Hear this, you rebel scum: the imperial army is here. Are you sure you want to die?" With this he slapped his horse and charged at Lionface. Enveloped in a cloud of dust, the two of them fought more than thirty bouts, until gradually Lionface began to weaken. One of his lieutenants, Zhang, saw that his commander could not get the better of his adversary and reached for his bow. He rode forward and loosed an arrow at Colonel Sun. The latter saw it in time and pulled on the reins. The arrow hit his horse in the leg. He jumped clear and grasping his spear continued the fight on foot. The horse galloped on for a few more strides and then fell. Zhang, realizing he had missed, drew his sword and galloped forward to join the fight. His charge was halted by Thunderclap. Colonel Sun wanted to return to his ranks and get a new horse, but he was hemmed in by Lionface's relentless spear thrusts.

All this was too much for Colonel Hua, the Archer: "So these buggers think they can sneak up and shoot arrows, do they?" he ranted. "Then let them taste one of mine!" He bent his bow to the full, took careful aim at Lionface, and released his shaft. It took Lionface full in the face and he tumbled headlong from his horse. Colonel Sun ran up and finished him off. Then he went back for a new horse.

The fight between Zhang and Thunderclap continued, Thunderclap's cudgel rising and falling only inches from Zhang's skull as the latter defended himself by blocking and parrying. But Lionface's fall had put fear into his heart and gradually he began to lose the battle. Another of his northern comrades slapped his horse and galloped forward to assist him. To fight two at once was nothing to Thunderclap. The three horses formed a T-shape as the fight raged on.

But now Colonel Hua took a second arrow, fitted it to the string and aimed at Zhang's back. He bent the bow to the full and shouted "Take that!" as the arrow sped to its target, hitting with such force that it went right through and pierced the breastplate in front! Head down and heels in the air Zhang plummeted from his mount. His comrade seeing him fall dodged aside, turned his horse and galloped back to his own ranks. Thunderclap was hard on his heels. By now Colonel Sun had found a new mount and joined the others in urging the troops forward. The northerners were thrown into utter confusion. Their three remaining commanders could not withstand the onslaught and hastily retreated.

Now a great roar was heard from behind. This was because Marshal Niu, fearing Lionface might be defeated, had ordered Tigercat and Bearcat into the attack with five thousand cavalry each in two columns. Colonel Hua and his comrades hastily had their troops take up defensive positions just as the three enemy commanders they had been pursuing also turned their troops about and renewed their attack. The Song commanders found themselves under attack from three sides. They pressed on valiantly, but it was obvious they were encircled.

At this point another cheer rose heavenward on the east, causing panic among the northerners again. Two squadrons of Song cavalry, Twin Spears and company on the left flank, the Tamer and company on the right, were charging simultaneously. The northerners were completely routed; it was a massacre. Their leaders struggled back into the city and the gates were bolted. The Song army pursued them up to the walls but were obliged to withdraw, when wooden blocks and ballista missiles started raining down on them.

Soon after this, General Song and the main army arrived at a spot about three miles from the city and made camp. Presiding in his tent, Song Jiang ordered Magic Hand to record Colonel Hua's achievements. Suddenly a gust of wind passed through the camp from west to east, setting all the flags flapping. The Professor said: "This wind is an omen. They'll make a surprise attack on the camp tonight. We must prepare."

Song Jiang said: "Certainly it's something quite out of the ordinary!" He ordered four of the leaders with three thousand troops to set up an ambush on the left of the camp and four more with a similar force to conceal themselves on the right. Monk, Pilgrim, Iron Ox, Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost with the shield-bearers were concealed in the centre, with five hundred men. A shot was to be fired as signal for them all to attack. When they were all in place Song Jiang and the Professor settled down candle in hand, as if for a chat about military matters.

Now Marshal Niu, who had lost three of his officers and found, when they were counted, that he had lost more than two thousand men, was sitting gloomily in his tent when Tigercat came to him with a suggestion: "You should stop worrying, Your Excellency. That rabble of Song Jiang's have just had a string of successes. They will be feeling very pleased with themselves and they won't be expecting anything. Tonight let me raid their camp. We can carve them up and pay them back for what they did to us today."

"And I will lead the back-up force myself," Marshal Niu said excitedly. "Wildcat and Bearcat will stay and guard the town."

"If Your Excellency is going to be involved," said Tigercat contentedly, "we're bound to capture Song Jiang."

They marched that night in the second watch, Tigercat accompanied by his four lieutenants, with five thousand cavalry in light armour, no bells on their horse's bridles and the troops gagged to prevent talking. When they reached the Song camp they let off a bloodcurdling yell and charged in. They found the gates open and the camp brightly illuminated. Tigercat recognized a trap at once. As he struggled to turn his horse and retreat, the signal gun went off and the Song leaders charged in from left and right. Within the camp Iron Ox and the other five with their shield-bearing troops swept forward. The northerners were routed and fled in all directions. One of the leaders fell to Wu Song's sword, another was killed by Short-Arse. Tigercat and two others found themselves surrounded in the centre. Realizing they were in serious difficulties, Marshal Niu and two of the lieutenants led a rescue attempt. Amid the general confusion, both sides withdrew their forces.

Next day Niu counted his men and found over a thousand missing. He had also lost two more officers and another was gravely wounded, his life in the balance. As Niu was gloomily mulling this over, it was announced that an envoy had arrived from Weisheng with a proclamation. He quickly mounted and rode out of the north gate to receive him. After their return to the city, the proclamation was read: it told how the royal astronomer had recently observed in the night sky a planet which had invaded the field of Jin, heavenly counterpart of Tian Hu's kingdom. It was essential in consequence that Niu strengthen the city's defences and watch out for trouble. Niu in turn told the envoy how the Song emperor had sent Song Jiang to attack them, how the Song army had taken two cities in succession and were now quite close and how there had been fighting the day before and he had lost five officers. Only if reinforcements were sent quickly could the town be saved.

"At the time when I left Weisheng," the other replied, "we had no news of this. It was only when I was half way here that I heard rumours of Song Jiang's army being sent to attack."

Niu entertained the envoy with a feast and presented him with gifts, while at the same time laying up blocks of wood and ballista missiles and preparing bows and crossbows, fire arrows and incendiary materials, for a determined defence until the reinforcements arrived. Of this no more.

Meanwhile the Dandy, Short-Arse and company had completed their rout of the troops who attacked the camp, and had returned victorious. Next day Song Jiang ordered siege carts to be prepared for the assault on the city. He ordered Leopard's Head and three others to take ten thousand troops and attack the east gate, another four leaders with ten thousand troops to attack the south gate, a similar force to attack the west gate. The north gate he left free, for fear that if a relief force arrived and those inside launched a counter attack his own men would be caught between two fires. Another group, four leaders and five thousand troops, were to conceal themselves at the foot of a steep hill northeast of the city and a similar force were to lie in ambush in a dense wood northwest of the city — these would engage any relief force that appeared. Colonel Hua and three others with a thousand cavalry would patrol the perimeter and liaise with the forces attacking the gates. This party would be supported by three hundred infantry under Iron Ox and five others.

Having received their orders everyone went off to carry them out. Song Jiang, the Unicorn and the Professor with some of the minor leaders moved the camp to a position close to the city walls. Green-Eyes and Spots were ordered to prepare siege towers and scaling ladders and supply them to each of the attacking forces.

Leopard's Head and his companions erected their scaling ladders and siege towers outside the east gate and began pushing them up to the walls. Troops in light armour were ordered up into the siege towers, whilst those below shouted encouragement. The city's defenders responded with a shower of fire arrows, thick as a swarm of locusts. The attackers had no answer to this and in no time the siege towers were all ablaze and came crashing down. They suffered five or six dead and a dozen wounded. In the battle on the south and west soldiers were also killed or wounded by fire arrows and missiles. The upshot was that they fought for a week without any result.

In view of this, Song Jiang, the Unicorn and the Professor went themselves to the south gate to superintend the operation. While they were there Colonel Hua and his roving patrol arrived from the west gate heading east. Bearcat and two of his lieutenants were supervising the defence on the gate tower. When they saw Colonel Hua approaching the walls, one of them said: "Two of our commanders were wounded by that one the other day. Now's our chance to avenge them!" He took up his bow, fitted an arrow to it, took aim at Colonel Hua's heart and let fly. Colonel Hua heard the snap of the bowstring and leant backwards in the saddle. The arrow landed conveniently to hand and he wrenched it out and put it between his teeth while he straightened up. He laid his lance in the rest, took the bow in his left hand and fitted the arrow to it, took aim and fired. The arrow hit his opponent in the throat, passing right through and out the other side. Colonel Hua gave a triumphant shout: "Who do you think you are, you rat, shooting off arrows like that? You shall all die, one after the other!" With his right hand he took another arrow and shot again. There were screams from the tower and several hurtled to the ground. Bearcat and his remaining lieutenant, white with fear, took cover in the nick of time. Colonel Hua laughed con-temptuously: "Now you know something about the skill of the Archer!" he shouted, while Song Jiang and the Unicorn applauded loud and long.

"Why don't we all go with Colonel Hua to review the situation along the city walls?" the Professor said. So, closely guarded by Colonel Hua and his company, Song Jiang, the Unicorn and the Professor made a circuit of the city walls.

Later on back in the camp, the Professor summoned the former Lingchuan commander Geng Gong and questioned him about Gaizhou's layout. Geng Gong said: "Niu Wenzhong fancies himself as a military leader. He'll be up on the walls, organizing the city's defence. In the northern sector there are some temples and a large open space with nothing but grass." This gave the Professor an idea, which he explained to Song Jiang. The Flea and Madcap were summoned and given secret instructions. "This is the plan. Colonel Hua will also be given instructions and you will work in concert." Thunderer, Snake and Scorpion were told to take two hundred men and a sufficient quantity of signal rockets of various sizes and proceed in a certain way. Monk and Pilgrim were to have three hundred musicians. The Red-Haired Devil, Morbid, Perilous, and Yellow Dog with two hundred men each, all carrying incendiary materials were to head southeast and northwest, all according to the plan. The Magic Messenger was sent to the contingents on the east, west and south to give them the secret orders. When fires started inside the town they were to attack with all their might. Everyone left to put these orders into effect.

Now Niu Wenzhong had been watching for the relief force night and day, but there was no sign of it and he was extremely anxious. He reinforced the guards and had more wooden blocks and ballista missiles moved up onto the walls. Suddenly at dusk a tremendous shout was heard outside the north gate, while drums thundered and bugles blared. Niu rushed to the north gate but when he looked out from the walls the noise ceased. He could not tell where the enemy were. As he stood there hesitating, shouting broke out on the south, and again a din of gongs and drums that shook the heavens. He told the commander on the north gate to guard it strongly and rushed to the south gate. Again the shouting ceased as soon as he looked out and the drums and gongs were silent. He stared out for a long time, but there was nothing but the very faint sound of a drum beating in the Song position to the south. Otherwise all was quiet, not even a glimmer of light. He slowly descended from the wall. He was about to go back to check the government offices when a string of explosions rang out from beyond the east gate at the same time as shouting and thundering drums at the west gate. Driven thus from east to west and back again, he had no rest till dawn. Then the enemy renewed their attack on the town and did not withdraw till evening. That night at the first drumbeat bugles and drums clamoured again. Niu said: "The buggers are trying to scare us. We'd better ignore them. We'll just make sure our defences are strong and see what they do."

Suddenly at the east gate the sky was lit up, countless torches, siege towers and scaling ladders were being trundled up to the walls. Niu rushed to the eastern wall, where Wildcat and two of his lieutenants were fighting off the attack with fire arrows and ballistas. Then came an explosion that made the mountains and valleys reverberate and even shook the city's watchtowers. The defenders were terrified. For two nights there had been so much disturbance they hadn't been able to close their eyes for an instant and the attacks had been renewed at dawn. Niu himself had been constantly on patrol on the walls.

But now suddenly a host of banners were seen approaching from the northwest and a dozen Song scouts galloped into the main camp. Assuming it was the relief force, Niu ordered Bearcat to prepare to make a sortie to meet them.

Now this force approaching from the northwest belonged to the Jinning governor, who was Tian Hu's younger brother the third prince Tian Biao. He had received Gaizhou's request for help and had sent two of his best commanders, Feng Xiang and Wang Yuan, with twenty thousand troops. As they approached, about three miles out from the city they heard a sudden report and from the densely wooded slopes of the steep hill on either side of them two bodies of troops raced out. This was the ambush set up under Tattooed Dragon and the Tamer. Although there were twenty thousand in the Jinning relief force, they were tired after a long march and no match for these troops who after waiting there over ten days were in fine shape and raring to go, and who now came at them on both flanks. It was a rout. The northern relief force discarded gongs and drums, banners and spears, helmets and armour and a vast number of horses. The majority of the troops were killed. The two commanders escaped with their lives and led the battered remnants of their force back to Jinning. And that was that.

When Niu saw the two columns of the relief force cut off and fighting for their lives, he immediately ordered Bearcat to open the north gate and hasten to their assistance, the north gate, remember, being the one point from which the city was not under siege. But the moment Bearcat crossed the drawbridge he ran into Colonel Hua's roving patrol approaching from the west. The cry went up: "It's the Archer!" So frightened were they that instead of an orderly retreat they piled back into the city in a disorderly mob. Now, Bearcat's morale had already been shattered at the south gate. He had no desire to make a fight of it, but fled back into the city like his men. Colonel Hua's party rode forward and killed a score of enemy soldiers, but let the rest take refuge in the city without pursuing them. The gates were quickly barred.

The Flea and Madcap, dressed in northern uniforms, had now been swept into the city. After passing through the gates they took advantage of the commotion to slip into a small alley. Down this alley they found an ancestral hall with an inscription which read: "Temple of the Local Earth God". They crept inside and found a Taoist warming himself in front of a brazier at the east end. When he saw two soldiers enter, the Taoist said: "What's the news from outside, lads?"

They replied: "Bearcat said as 'ow we 'ad to go an' fight, but we ran into that bloke they calls the Archer an' even Bearcat hisself daresn't take 'im on. Proper pandemonium it was, so we got back inside the city sharpish. Then we took advantage of the confusion to come in 'ere." The Flea took out some loose silver and gave it to the Taoist, saying: "Give us a couple of bowls of that wine what you got stashed away, to keep out the bleedin' cold."

The Taoist responded with a pitying smile: "Don't you know there's a military crisis, has been for days? I haven't even got any incense left. Where would I get wine from?" He tried to give the silver back to the Flea.

Madcap pushed his hand away, saying: "Take it any'ow. We'll see again later. Day after day we been on guard, it's been 'orrible. We 'aven't slept a wink. You let us stay 'ere tonight and get a bit of shuteye, an' we'll push off first thing in the morning."

The Taoist shook his head: "Don't be angry with me. Marshal Niu has given strict orders. They come and inspect all the time. If I let you stay we wouldn't have a chance."

The Flea said: "In that case we'll 'ave to go somewhere else."

Madcap sidled up to the Taoist and squatted by the fire. The Flea took a quick look around to make sure no one could see them and then winked at Madcap. Madcap quietly took out a dagger. Oblivious to the danger, the Taoist went on warming himself. Reaching from behind Madcap ripped the knife across his throat. They bolted the doors of the temple. It was early evening, just before the first watch. The Flea went round the back to the kitchen, where he found a door. Beyond it was a little courtyard where dry grass was piled up under the eaves in two heaps. They carried this in and heaped it over the corpse. Then they unbolted the door. From the courtyard they climbed up onto the roof and concealed themselves on the far side of the ridge.

6 bright stars appeared in the sky. They waited a while, then slid down from the roof and went to reconnoitre outside the temple. There was no one in the street. They took a few more steps and paused to look around again. Although there were several neighbouring households, all were quiet and had their doors locked. There was only a faint sound of weeping. The Flea went a little further to the south. Beyond the corner of a long mud wall was a large expanse of waste land. There were dozens of piles of combustible materials on it. "This is their ammunition dump," the Flea thought to himself. "How come there's no one to guard it?"

The fact is that everyone was up on the walls engaged in repelling the enemy and no one had time to inspect this site. When the watchmen heard that the Song army had scattered the relief column, they reckoned it was all up with the city. They didn't bother about the munitions but were only concerned to save their skins and went off to find somewhere to hide away before the city fell. The two heroes went back to the temple and got their tinderboxes. They set light to the pile of grass on top of the Taoist's corpse. Then they went to the waste ground, where each piled up half a dozen bonfires. In a moment, the whole area was ablaze, flames mounting to the sky. The temple also had caught. One of the people with houses west of the ammunition dump heard the fire and came out with a torch to investigate. The Flea rushed up and snatched the torch away from him. "Let me go and alert Marshal Ox," he shouted.

The local saw their uniforms and naturally didn't think of objecting. Waving the torch, the Flea joined by Madcap, sped off southwards, shouting something about warning the Marshal. They started fires under the houses wherever they found a suitable place. Then they threw away the torch and melted into the background. They took off their northern uniforms and went to hide in a quiet place. Now that fires had appeared in half a dozen streets, the city was seething with alarm. When he heard that the ammunition dump was on fire the Marshal gathered a party and rushed to put the fire out. Outside the city, the attackers seeing the fires knew the Flea and Madcap were at work on the inside and redoubled their efforts. Song Jiang and the Professor, with Snake and Scorpion, rushed over to the south. The Professor said: "I noticed before that the city wall was quite low on this side." He directed Thunderclap and his men to move the siege towers up to the wall. Then he told Snake and Scorpion: "The enemies are demoralised, their troops are exhausted. See if you can get up onto the wall!" Halberd in hand, Snake climbed the siege tower beside the battlements and leapt from it onto the wall; Scorpion followed suit. With a great shout they charged along the parapet, sweeping and stabbing with their weapons. The soldiers were tired and frightened and when they saw Snake and Scorpion bearing down on them so ferociously, they flung themselves off the wall. Tigercat levelled his spear and fought several bouts with the two on the wall till a blow from Snake's halberd struck him through and Scorpion followed up and split his skull. By now more Song troops had poured into the city from the siege towers, over a hundred of them. Following Snake and Scorpion they charged down from the wall shouting: "Step forward and we'll make mincemeat of you!" They killed two of the commanders, felled the guards on the city gates, took control of the gates and lowered the drawbridge. Immediately Spearsman and his comrades rushed in. Together with Victorious, Spearsman led a charge to the east gate, where Tiger-cat An failed to stop them and was killed. They took over the gate and let Leopard's Head in. Thunderclap and the Supremo seized the western gate and let in Twin Spears. Three more of the enemy commanders were killed by their own troops. Corpses were draped over the wells, blood filled the gutters. Niu Wenzhong saw the city was lost and took to his horse and galloped out of the north gate, together with Bearcat and some two hundred troops. They had gone no distance at all when out of the gloom two figures loomed, Iron Ox and Monk Lu Zhishen, a wild warrior and a ferocious monk, and stood in their way. Truly, it is hard to escape heaven's net, difficult to evade earth's pitfalls.

Iron Ox dreams he is fighting the courtiers; Song Jiang divides his army into 2 wings

Seeing the city was lost, Niu Wenzhong had no recourse but to flee. He left Gaizhou escorted by Bearcat and three of the lieutenants and they ran straight into Iron Ox and the Monk, who with their infantry stood blocking the escape route. "We've been waiting for you on General Song's orders, you hopeless fuckers," Iron Ox shouted. "And we've waited a long time!" He came at them, whirling his two axes. The axes rose and fell and two of the lieutenants bit the dust. Niu was so terrified his soul flew right out of his body. Before he could make any move, a blow from Monk's staff smashed down, shattering helmet and skull, and he fell lifeless from his horse. Of two hundred soldiers there were no survivors. Only Bearcat and the remaining lieutenant escaped, dashing off into the undergrowth. "Let 'em go," the Monk said. "The two asses can report what's happened."

The heads of the three commanders were chopped off, according to custom, the horses were rounded up, the armour and helmets collected, and loaded with these spoils they returned to the city.

Song Jiang's main army now entered the city and orders were given out for the fires to be extinguished and the citizens protected. After this the leaders assembled to report their successes. Song Jiang ordered the heads to be displayed on the gates. Next morning notices were posted to restore public order. All three army columns were allowed to camp inside the city and rewards were given out to the commanders. The names of Madcap, Flea, Snake and Scorpion were inscribed on the honours list. A report was produced informing the court of the capture of Gaizhou, the contents of the stores and treasury were transferred to the capital and a full report was sent to Marshal Su.

It was now the end of the last month of the year. Several days elapsed while Song Jiang was reorganizing his army and then Hotshot, now recovered from his illness, returned with Doctor An to present himself for duty. "Excellent," said Song Jiang. "Tomorrow is the fifth anniversary of the reign. We must have a general gathering."

Next day at crack of dawn the company paraded in the garb of servants of the throne and Song Jiang led them in paying homage to the Emperor. When the formal ceremony of obeisance was done they exchanged their court dress for war robes of scarlet brocade and came in perfect order, all ninety-two of them including the recently surrendered Geng Gong, to greet their general with seasonal wishes. General Song Jiang had organized a big feast, a great celebratory banquet, and many a toast did they propose to him. After a good many rounds of wine, Song Jiang addressed them: "Thanks to you all, the nation has regained three cities. And now we are met here to celebrate New Year's Day. It is truly a special occasion. My only regret is that we are without Taoist Gongsun, Twin Rods, Scimitar, the boat captains, and those others who were left to guard the three cities."

The junior commanders were summoned and received their rewards and the same day goats and wine were ordered to be sent to the garrisons of the three cities in further recognition of their achievements. Before this order could be carried out, it was announced that envoys had arrived from these cities to convey congratulations to General Song Jiang on behalf of the leaders whose responsibilities did not allow them to attend in person. Song Jiang said happily: "This gives me almost as much pleasure as seeing them face-to-face." The envoys were rewarded and then everyone settled down to some serious drinking, which did not end before they were all drunk.

Later Song Jiang was planning an excursion to the eastern suburbs to greet the spring, for it was the time of the spring festival. In the evening the wind blew from the northeast bringing in heavily laden clouds, and snow began to fall, filling the whole sky. In the morning they all awoke to find something like this:

Soft as willow fluff, smooth as goose feathers; a flock of white egrets floating on high, white gulls swirling over the river: borne on the wind, spinning and eddying into palace courts, brighter than midsummer sun glinting on weapons. A thousand mountains banked high with jade cause the bedazzled woodcutter to lose his way, ten thousand dwellings dressed in white, what poems they have inspired from the recluse! If we have already had the bumper harvest snow portends, what happy omen is this? Many bear arms on the borders; what counts is not numbers but fortune's favour!

At that time Magic Hand said to the others: "There's quite a number of different names for snow: the smallest kind is known as 'bee swarm'; when the flakes are a little bigger it's 'goose feathers'; then you have the three-lobed flakes or 'triplets'; then the four-lobed 'quatrefoils'; the five-lobed ones are 'plum blossom' and the six-lobed are 'sestets'. This snow is formed from congealed air so you see it's six-lobed, reflecting the magic number six. After the spring festival what you get is always predominantly plum blossom, not the six-lobed kind any more. Although today is the day of the spring festival, we're still at the crossroads between winter and spring and this snow may be either five-lobed or six-lobed."

When Lungs heard this little lecture, he stepped out from under the eaves and began catching the falling snowflakes on the sleeve of his black robe to have a look at them. It was true, they were like six-petalled flowers, but there were some that were not perfectly formed or had sharp corners, and among them were some that were five-lobed. Lungs began crying out "It's true! It's true!" so everyone crowded around to look, with the result that a snort of warm air from Iron Ox melted all the snowflakes, causing general laughter.

Song Jiang wanted to know what was going on: "What are you laughing at?" he asked. "We were trying to look at the snowflakes but Iron Ox's hot breath melted them all," they said.

Song Jiang laughed too. "I've ordered wine so we can all have a party in the Spring Garden," he said.

Just to the east of the town there was a garden called Celebration of Spring. In the middle of it was the Pavilion of Fragrant Rain, screened by a grove of cypress, pine and plum trees. That afternoon they all gathered there and amid much noise and laughter and lively conversation the time passed quickly; soon it was dark and lamps were lit. Song Jiang was merry and kept reminiscing about the old times and the hardships they had passed through and how much he owed to them all. "I was just a local clerk," he said. "Then I committed a serious crime and you lot, fighting against the odds, heedless of personal danger, repeatedly risking your lives, came and rescued me. That time when Magic Messenger and I were taken out to the market place in Jiangzhou, I thought it was all up with us. Now I have become an officer of the crown, fighting for my country. When I look back on those past events, truly it's like a dream!"

At this point he began to break down and the tears streamed down his face. Magic Messenger and Colonel Hua, and others who had shared the hard times with him, were also moved to tears.

Iron Ox by now had drunk rather too much wine and was feeling the effects. In the middle of telling them something his eyes gradually closed and he went to sleep, resting his face on his arms. Suddenly the idea came to him that it was still snowing outside. His body seemed to float mysteriously and he found himself out in the open. When he looked around he was amazed: "There isn't any snow after all! What's the point of sitting indoors? Why don't I go and take a stroll round that temple?" A little way from the garden, just as he was leaving the city behind, he suddenly remembered something: "Heavens! I've forgotten my axes!" But when he put his hand to his belt, there they were. So he marched on, not thinking where he was going nor knowing how far he had gone when he saw a high mountain in front of him. Almost immediately he reached the foot of it and a man appeared before him wearing a scholar's cap and a light yellow Taoist's robe. This person approached and said: "If you're in the mood for a stroll, Commander, take a turn on the mountain, it's a blessed place."

"What is it called?" Iron Ox inquired.

"It's called the Mountain of the Heavenly Pool," the other replied. "Come back and see me again when you've had your walk."

Iron Ox followed the suggestion and walked all round the mountain. By the side of the path he came upon a little compound. Sounds of a quarrel issued from within. He rushed inside and found a dozen people with staves and cudgels smashing up the tables, chairs and other household items. In their midst was a tall fellow who was shouting: "Hurry up and hand over your daughter for me to marry, you old fool. Don't you dare refuse! You make just the slightest objection and I'll kill the whole lot of you!"

When Iron Ox heard this, he began to boil with indignation: "You fucking bastards," he hissed. "How dare you try to take away someone's daughter by force?"

"What's it to do with you if we want his daughter?" they shouted back.

Iron Ox took out his axes and started laying about him in a frenzy. To his surprise, he knocked down two or three effortlessly with the first blow. Some of them tried to escape, but he pursued them and with half a dozen blows sent seven or eight heads rolling. The ground was littered with corpses. Only one escaped and ran off. Iron Ox tried to go in again, but both leaves of the door were securely bolted so he demolished the door with a kick. Inside a white-haired old man and an old woman were sobbing. When Iron Ox charged in they cried out: "Oh no, they've come for us!"

Iron Ox shouted back: "I saw there was an injustice. I've killed all the bastards, come and see." The old man tottered after him to look. He grabbed Iron Ox's arm and said: "You've killed some villains all right, but I'm the one that'll have to pay for it."

Iron Ox said with a laugh: "Don't you know me, old fellow? I'm Iron Ox from Mount Liang. Along with my leader Song Jiang I've been amnestied and sent to get Tian Hu. My pals are all drinking in the city and I got bored with it so I came out for a stroll. Never mind about those bastards, if I'd killed a thousand or two, what the fuck would it matter?"

The old man wiped his eyes and said: "I suppose it's all right then. Please come in and sit down." When Iron Ox went inside he found a table already spread with wine and food. The old man bade him sit down opposite, filled a bowl of wine to the brim and offered it with both hands, saying: "You have saved my daughter. Please drink this cup."

Iron Ox took it and drank it and the old man offered him more. When he had drunk off four or five, a tearful old woman appeared leading a young girl, who saluted him respectfully with crossed arms. The old woman said: "Commander, since you serve with General Song and appear to be so thrifty, if you don't despise our unworthiness, please take our daughter with you."

When he heard this, Iron Ox leapt to his feet and said: "What a disgusting idea! Do you really suppose I killed those buggers because I wanted your daughter? Shut your fucking noise and don't talk such fucking shit!" With this he kicked over the table and rushed out of the house. Immediately a tall bearded character with a halberd strode after him, roaring out: "You black bastard, stop! What do you mean by killing all my people? What business is it of yours if I want their girl?" Raising his halberd he came charging at Iron Ox. Iron Ox swung his two axes furiously and they fought twenty bouts, till the other, seeing he could not win, knocked the axes aside and fled, trailing his halberd. Iron Ox followed hot on his heels. They came to a little wood where he suddenly saw a number of fine buildings. The other man flung away his halberd and disappeared among a crowd of people. As Iron Ox pondered this, he heard a voice from inside one of the buildings: "Iron Ox must cease this unruly behaviour. Bring him to me!" Suddenly it dawned on Iron Ox: this was the Hall of Culture and Ethics where the day before with his brother Song Jiang he had attended an audience with the Emperor. This was where the Emperor lived! The voice continued: "Down on your knees, quickly, Iron Ox!" He put away his axes. He could make out the Emperor seated on his throne a long way in front of him, with a number of officials lined up in front of the throne. He kowtowed assiduously three times, and then thought to himself. "Oh dear, I've missed one out!"

"Why were you killing people just now?" the Emperor asked.

Still kneeling he replied: "Those villains were trying to force someone's daughter. It made me angry, so I killed them."

"When Iron Ox sees an injustice he seeks to eradicate the evil," the Emperor said. "Your valour is commendable. I shall exonerate you from blame and appoint you to my personal guard."

"How far-sighted the Emperor is!" Iron Ox thought joyfully. He knocked his head on the ground a dozen times and then stood to attention.

In a short while the Grand Preceptor and the three wicked marshals, Tong, Yang and Gao appeared and kneeling before the throne said: "Look at this Song Jiang! He's been given a great army to get Tian Hu and he's just idling away the time instead of attacking, drinking every day. We request that Your Majesty punish him."

Iron Ox heard this and an indescribable rage swelled in his breast till he could no longer contain it and he charged forward with his two axes. With one blow to each he chopped off their heads and said: "Your Majesty don't listen to these villainous counsellors. Our dear leader has captured three cities. He is camped now at Gaizhou and about to launch the attack. How can they tell such lies?"

When the other officials saw Iron Ox kill the four bigwigs, they tried to arrest him, but he waved his axes and said: "If you touch me, you'll meet the same fate!", so no one dared lift a finger. Chuckling to himself, Iron Ox said: "That's great! Those four villains have got their just desserts. I shall go and tell the Leader." With that he strode out of the palace. Immediately he came to a mountain, which he saw at once was the place where he had just met the scholar. And there he was, the scholar, standing at the foot of the mountain. He greeted Iron Ox with a smile: "Did you have a pleasant walk, Commander?"

Iron Ox replied: "I'd better tell you, sir, that I have just killed four wicked ministers."

"Is that so?" said the scholar, quite unperturbed. "I was doing something in Fenjing. Just recently I happened to come here, and knowing of your loyalty and righteousness, I wanted to have a word with you. I have something important to say. At present Song Jiang is pursuing Tian Hu. I have a formula to impart to you that will enable Tian Hu to be captured. You must memorize it carefully and repeat it to Song Jiang." He then intoned to Iron Ox: "To exterminate Tian Hu and his ilk, jade arrowtip must serve your purpose." He repeated this five or six times. What he said seemed meaningful to Iron Ox so he carefully memorized the words. The scholar now pointed towards the woods and said: "There's an old lady over there, sitting among the trees." When Iron Ox turned to look, he found the scholar had disappeared. "That was quick!" he said to himself. "I'd better go and have a look to see if there's someone in the woods." There was indeed an old woman sitting there, and when he approached to take a closer look, it was his own mother! She was sitting on a black rock, her eyes tight shut. He rushed forward and embraced her: "Mother, are you still suffering? I thought you had been eaten by a tiger. But now here you are!"

His mother said: "My son, I was not eaten by the tiger."

Weeping he said: "I've been given an amnesty and now I really am a government official. My brother Song Jiang's army is camped at the northern capital. I will carry you there on my back." At this moment there was a sudden commotion and out rushed a ferocious striped tiger. It roared and waved its tail and sprang. Iron Ox grabbed his axes intending to chop it down but he used too much force and both axes bit the air and then smashed down into the table in the Pavilion of Fragrant Rain in the Celebration of Spring Garden.

Song Jiang and the others had been chatting about everyday events and the talk was at its most absorbing when they saw Iron Ox had dozed off at the table. They thought nothing of it. Suddenly there was this fearful racket. Iron Ox in his sleep was beating the table with both hands, upsetting bowls and dishes, splattering his sleeves with the sauces. He kept repeating: "Mother, the tiger's gone, the tiger's gone!" When he opened his eyes and saw the bright light of the lamps and all his comrades sitting around him still drinking, he exclaimed: "By all that's wonderful, it was all a dream!"

The others laughed and said: "What was a dream? What are you so pleased about?"

Iron Ox told them how he had dreamt of his mother, that she wasn't dead after all, but his conversation with her had been interrupted by a tiger! They expressed their sympathy. Then he recounted how he had killed the thugs and kicked over the table. At this point Monk, Pilgrim and Madcap clapped and shouted: "Bravo!"

"That's not the half of it!" Iron Ox said with a grin. And he told them how he had killed the four evil ministers. They all applauded and shouted out: "That's great, that's terrific! That's the sort of dream that's worth having!"

Song Jiang said: "I don't know what you're making such a noise about. It's only a dream, it's not important!"

But Iron Ox was just getting to the main point. Pulling up his sleeves, he said: "Who says it's not fucking important? I've never done anything more enjoyable in my life. Besides, I had another strange dream. A scholar told me some kind of verse: 'To exterminate Tian Hu and his ilk, jade arrowtip must serve your pur-pose.' He said this was the secret of destroying Tian Hu and told me to memorize it carefully and tell it to you."

Neither Song Jiang nor the Professor could explain this. When Doctor An heard the words "jade arrowtip" he was dying to say something, but Hotshot gave him a look and he smiled a little and after that did not open his mouth. The Professor said: "This is a pretty strange dream. If the snow clears we can attack." They finished their drinking and went to bed and the night passed uneventfully.

Next day the snow had begun to thaw and in the command tent Song Jiang, the Unicorn and the Professor divided the army into two columns to attack from either side. The eastern force would attack through Kettle Pass and move on to Goodborough to get behind the rebel headquarters; then they would turn back via Dagu to Lin where they would join up with the others. The western force would take Jinning and penetrate to the northwest of Weisheng where they would meet the others at Lin.

Having divided his forces, Song Jiang said to the Unicorn: "From here our two forces will attack from the east and the west. Which side will you take?"

The Unicorn replied: "I shall accept whichever you give me. It is not for me to choose."

Song Jiang said: "Nevertheless, let us test heaven's will. Let's write the two divisions down on ballot papers and each draw one." So Sterling wrote:

East

And:

West

On 2 pieces of paper and after Song Jiang and the Unicorn had both prayed and burnt incense, Song Jiang drew 1 of them; now because of the result, a number of valiant commanders were to join the army. And a famous wizard was to appear at the foot of 9 Dragon Mountain.

Scimitar wins over 3 leaders; Iron Ox lands them in a mess

After dividing up the forces in Gaizhou, Song Jiang and the Unicorn draw lots, having first prayed and burnt incense. Song Jiang draws the eastern route, to Fort Kettle and Goodborough, so the western, through Jinning, falls to the Unicorn. They are only waiting for the snow to completely thaw before setting out. The defence of Gaizhou is left in the hands of Colonel Hua and four others with twenty thousand troops. On the sixth of the month, an auspicious day, the two generals muster their troops.

News now came in that two cities, previously beaten into submission by the rebels, had, on hearing of the approach of the government army, overpowered their governors and were handing them over as prisoners. A delegation headed by the elders of these two places had arrived with a tribute of goats and wine. This development was most welcome to Song Jiang: he rewarded them and made a friendly announcement recognizing their return to allegiance. The two governors were executed as a demonstration that the forces of the government were now in control and as an example to other rebels.

That same day the two armies marched out of the north gate. Colonel Hua had organized wine for the send-off. Taking cup in hand, Song Jiang said to Colonel Hua: "After your exploits against the enemy I have every confidence in your ability to defend this city, my friend. The threat is from the north. If the enemy attack, it is necessary to strike back and destroy their morale so they will not intrude south again." Colonel Hua attended carefully to his orders.

Song Jiang again took his cup and addressed the Unicorn: "Today at the start of our campaign we have received this good news of the handing over of the prisoners and surrender of these two cities. You will now be able to attack Jinning straight away, secure a quick victory, capture the rebel leader Tian Hu, inform the court and enjoy wealth and honour thereafter."

The Unicorn said: "It is owing to your reputation, dear brother, that those two cities have surrendered without a fight. You have entrusted me with this task and I shall of course address it with the utmost seriousness."

Song Jiang took the copy of the picture by the Prodigy's friend that he had previously had Magic Hand make and gave it to the Unicorn for his own use. He then established the three divisions of his troops: vanguard under Leopard's Head and three others, rearguard under Colonel Sun and seven others and the main force led by himself and the Professor. The combined force of fifty thousand troops set off heading northeast. His second-in-command the Unicorn bade everyone farewell and with his own forty leaders and fifty thousand troops marched in a northwesterly direction.

After seeing them off Colonel Hua returned to the city. He gave orders for two camps to be set up a mile or two north of the city under the Young Master and Spots each with five thousand troops, provided with crack archers and every kind of incendiary device to foil the enemy. He also, it goes without saying, established ambushes east and west of the city. Please bear in mind that seven other leaders had been left to defend the three previously captured towns.

When Song Jiang and his contingent had marched ten miles he saw a mountain range ahead. It was some while before they reached it. The sight was striking:

Peak piled on peak stands in the goose's way;
Glimpses of cliffs like city walls are seen
Mid towering clouds and winding waters green.

As Song Jiang was examining the scene, Iron Ox pointed and said: "Those mountains are exactly like what I dreamed of the other night."

Song Jiang summoned Geng Gong, the enemy general who had surrendered to them earlier, and asked: "You are familiar with the region, you must know all about those mountains. If it is as Guanzhong's picture shows, Mount Fang is east of the provincial capital and this is called Mountain of the Heavenly Pool."

Iron Ox spoke up: "That's the name that scholar used in my dream. I had forgotten it."

Geng Gong said: "It is indeed the Mountain of the Heavenly Pool. Its fallen rocks and cliffs are like a city rampart and in the old days people used to take refuge there. Nowadays the locals say it's haunted. A mysterious red glow is often seen at night. And woodcutters have observed a strange odour there."

"This all seems to confirm Iron Ox's dream," said Song Jiang.

They marched twenty miles that day before making camp. Nothing of note occurred on the way. Soon they were taking up a position just south of Kettle Pass.

Kettle Pass was situated under the mountain's eastern crest, where the terrain was shaped like a kettle. In Han times a customs post had been established here, and it became known as Kettle Pass. To the east was Baodu or Calf Mountain and Kettle Pass lay between the two mountains, some twenty-five miles south of Goodborough and Goodborough Pass. It was held by eight of Tian Hu's commanders with thirty thousand crack troops. One of these commanders, Shan Shiqi, the younger brother of a rich man of the region, was exceptionally talented and skilled in fighting. Because he had killed a man and wanted to escape punishment he joined Tian Hu and after achieving success in battle had been made a general. He wielded a heavy steel staff with great expertise. When Tian Hu heard that the court was sending Song Jiang's forces against him, he sent this Shan Shiqi to Goodborough to pick ten thousand first class troops and join the other seven at Kettle Pass. Once there his orders were to get on with the job and not worry about reporting back for orders.

When Shan Shiqi reached Kettle Pass and heard that Gaizhou had fallen he reckoned it would not be long before the Song army attacked the pass. So he spent each day training his men and feeding up his horses, in readiness for the battle. Suddenly it was reported that Song Jiang's army had made camp only a mile or two south of their position. He mobilized ten thousand cavalry and with three other commanders put on armour, mounted and rode out to do battle.

The two armies were drawn up facing each other. The archers on either side began shooting at the opposing ranks. Martial music struck up on both sides and colourful banners were unfurled. Where pennants marked the opening in the northern ranks Shan Shiqi rode forth: "You marsh-dwelling outlaws!" he roared. "How dare you invade our territory!"

On the opposite side Leopard's Head rode forward and shouted in reply: "You're a bunch of common robbers! The imperial army is here now so what's the point of resisting?" He twirled his lance and gave his horse its head. The two adversaries met in the middle: while two armies cheered, two riders clashed, four arms struck this way and that, four horse's legs became entangled. They fought more than fifty bouts and neither had the advantage. Leopard's Head secretly admired his opponent's skill. One of the northern lieutenants believing his commander could not gain victory by himself galloped to his assistance, whirling his sword; on the other side Hotshot also galloped into action. The fight raged on: four assailants in two pairs. Hotshot and his opposite number fought more than twenty bouts. His strength ebbing, Hotshot turned his horse and galloped away. The other gave chase. Hotshot rested his lance, reached into his saddlebag and took a stone. He twisted in the saddle and with a shout of "Pow!" flung the stone, hitting his opponent square on the nose so that he fell from the saddle streaming with blood. Hotshot took up his lance again intending to finish him off but two other northerners were galloping to the rescue.

When those above on the pass saw one of their champions bested and fearing defeat for the commander sounded the gong for retreat, Song Jiang did likewise. "We got one of their commanders today," he said to the Professor. "It's bound to affect their morale. But the mountain terrain is difficult and their fort appears to be very strong. What's our best plan for defeating them?"

Leopard's Head said: "Let me challenge them again tomorrow. I'm sure I can defeat that leader of theirs. Then you can launch a determined attack."
"Don't be in such a hurry!" the Professor said. "As Sunzi says, 'When you can't win, stick to defence. When you can win, attack!'"
Song Jiang said: "The Professor is quite right."
Next day when Leopard's Head and Hotshot asked permission to engage the enemy, Song Jiang said: "We may have won one battle, but it's still not going to be easy to take the pass. You must have Spearsman and Hasty to back you up."
Leopard's Head and Hotshot with five thousand men advanced to the foot of the pass, banners waving, drums thundering. They hurled challenges and insults at the enemy all morning, but there was no response. Just as they were about to give up, a gun went off in the fort, the gates opened and Shan Shiqi with four of his commanders and twenty thousand men charged out. Leopard's Head said to his companion: "They think they've an advantage because we're tired. We must attack." Hasty and Spearsman now came up from the rear. The armies faced each other and without a word engaged. Leopard's Head found an opponent. When Shan came out, Hotshot took him on with his spear. Hasty with his axe did battle with two others. With both armies roaring encourage-ment, the seven riders revolved in a cloud of dust, whirling round like shadows on a lantern. Leopard's Head fought till he was drunk with the excitement of battle. Suddenly he let off a cry and struck his opponent from his horse with a thrust of his spear. Hasty's two opponents were running out of strength when they saw their comrade fall. One of them feinted and galloped off. The other, planning to follow suit, tried to parry Hasty's axe but was cut in two.
When he saw he had lost two of his commanders Shan also galloped away towards his own ranks, but Hotshot gave chase. He took a stone and flung it at the retreating general. It landed with a resounding crack on Shan's helmet, frightening him out of his wits. He crouched low in the saddle and fled. The one remaining enemy commander hurriedly ordered his men back to the pass, but they were caught by Leopard's Head and his cavalry and totally routed. Shan and the remnants of his troops scuttled back into the fort and barricaded themselves inside. Leopard's Head continued the pursuit to the foot of the pass, but there they were assailed with arrows and stones by the defenders and could not gain entrance. Leopard's Head was hit in the left shoulder and gave the order to retreat. Back in the camp Song Jiang told Doctor An to treat Leopard's Head. Fortunately he had thick armour and the damage was slight. Of this no more.
When the roll was called, Shan found that he had lost more than two thousand men, as well as two commanders. It was decided to send a messenger to the Prince at Weisheng to tell him that Song Jiang's army was powerful and would be difficult to hold off and to entreat him to send reinforcements to secure the situation, and at the same time arrange secretly for the commanders on Calf Mountain, Tang Bin, Wen Zhongrong and Cui Ye to march east and cause trouble in the rear of the Song army. A time would be set, with a gun as signal for the defenders to charge down the pass: the enemy would be caught between two fires and surely defeated. Having made the plan, Shan strengthened the guard on the fort, and then there was nothing more to do but wait for Tang Bin's reply.
Meanwhile Song Jiang, depressed that Kettle Pass seemed impregnable and had held them up already more than two weeks, was sitting gloomily in his tent when it was suddenly announced that an envoy had arrived with a confidential letter from Scimitar, who had been left to defend Weizhou. Song Jiang and the Professor hastily opened it. Here is what they read:
Tang Bin, commander of the garrison at Calf Mountain was formerly with me in Pudong. Because he is valiant and steadfast, I had a great affection for him. Ill-treated by some influential people he lost patience and killed one of his enemies. The authorities arrested him immediately. He wanted to take refuge on Mount Liang, but south of Pudong the road took him past Calf Mountain and he fell in with robbers. He fought with the two leaders, Wen Zhongrong and Cui Ye, and neither of them could defeat him so they asked him to stay and be chief of the stronghold. When Tian Hu seized Kettle Pass he wanted him to surrender. Tang Bin had no wish to do so but he realised he was isolated and had no alternative. He remained on the mountain to cover Kettle Pass .1 flank. Recently he heard that I was governor of Weizhou and on New Year .1 s Day he rode over to Weizhou, coming secretly and unescorted to explain his true feelings to me. He said he had always respected you for your honour and integrity and that his chief desire was to surrender to you and fight under your banner to redeem his fault. I myself rode back with him to Calf Mountain to encourage the other two, Wen Zhongrong and Cui Ye, to pull their socks up. They have agreed to reform and we now have a secret deal and their word as pledge.
After reading this through carefully Song Jiang and the Professor decided not to make any move but to wait and decide on their strategy after observing developments in the fort.
After Shan had sent the secret message to Tang Bin asking for his support, the soldier returned with this reply: "The moon is full at present. I will not move my forces till it has waned. We do not want the enemy to see what we are doing."
Shan said: "That's reasonable."
There was no attack from the Song army either for the next ten days. Then it was suddenly reported that Tang Bin was approaching from the east with a group of horsemen. Soon Tang Bin reached the fort and went to see its commander: "Tonight in the third watch my two lieutenants with ten thousand men will slip away from Calf Mountain and head east. They will wear light armour and ride without bells on their harness. By break of day they should be behind Song Jiang's lines. You must be ready to play your part with a sortie from the fort."
"We shall have them in a vice," Shan said gleefully. "It's the end of the Song army!" He ordered wine for Tang Bin in celebration.
After nightfall Tang Bin looked out and remarked: "That's funny. There seems to be someone prowling around out there." As he spoke he took two arrows from the sheaf of one of his bodyguards and shot them into the dark. And indeed it was the case that in order to capture the fort Song Jiang had stationed men outside to spy on their activities under cover of darkness. With the arrow he fired Tang Bin had hit one of these men in the right leg, but from its effect it appeared the arrow had no barb. Puzzled by this the soldier examined the arrow and found that some lengths of cloth had been tightly wound around the tip. He realized something was up and sped back to the camp to report to Song Jiang. By the light of the lamp Song Jiang tore off the covering and found several lines of minute spidery script. It was a secret message from Tang Bin: the fort would be handed over to them early next day. Wen and Cui would take up positions behind the General's lines and a gun would be fired as signal for those inside the fort to launch an attack. This would be the opportunity for Tang Bin to seize the fort. He requested General Song to be ready to enter it.
Having read this missive, Song Jiang made secret preparations with the Professor. The latter said: "Scimitar has confidence in all this. But if enemy troops are going to be in our rear, we cannot neglect to take precautions. Send Colonel Sun and four others and ten thousand troops with drums and banners to take up position in the rear. If Wen and Cui do turn up, they must keep them out of the camp until the fort is definitely in our hands. They should not allow them to advance until they hear the report of the big gun. And let Spearsman and Hasty set up an ambush with five thousand men on the east, and Leopard's Head and Hotshot do likewise on the west. When they hear the gun they can come out to back us up and we'll enter the fort together. But just in case there's any treachery they'll be there to help out."
"You think of everything, Professor!" Song Jiang said.
So the orders were given and everyone prepared accordingly.
Up on Kettle Pass, Shan in accordance with what Tang Bin had told him listened for the gun from behind the Song position. Some time after dawn a whole string of reports sounded to the south and a cloud of dust was seen rising to the rear of the Song army amid much waving of banners and general confusion. Tang Bin said: "Wen and Cui have got there. It's time for us to attack." They set off in order, Shan in the lead, Tang in the second wave. Two commanders stayed behind to guard the fort.
When the Song army sighted the attack they quickly retreated. Shan led the charge, urging his cavalry on. Suddenly a gun fired and two troops of cavalry appeared from the Song left and right flanks and charged. At the same moment Tang Bin ordered about turn and led his troops back up to the pass, where they took up a position with spears at the ready, leaving Shan and his lieutenant to carry on the fight alone. Another gun, and from the Song ranks Iron Ox and the shield bearers poured forward. Shan realized some plan was afoot and ordered a retreat. But the way back to the fort was now blocked: "You must answer to Tang Bin! Kettle Pass is already in Song hands! Dismount and surrender!" he shouted, as he killed the first of the retreating rebel leaders with his lance. Shan was totally nonplussed and could only lead a few dozen of his men off to one side in a desperate attempt to escape. Leopard's Head and Hotshot let them go and continued on forward, wanting first of all to secure the pass.
At this point Iron Ox and company reached the top. Another gun and they joined Tang Bin in killing the guards. The fort was taken. In this action another two rebel commanders had been killed, one in the fort and the other outside. The northerners fled, abandoning helmets, armour and horses. Two thousand were dead and five hundred taken prisoner. The rest surrendered.
Soon Song Jiang and the main army arrived and entered in due order. Tang Bin dismounted, prostrated himself before Song Jiang and said: "My fault is great, but I have heard of your righteousness and humanity. I wanted to join you, but could not find the way, so I was unable to make your acquaintance. Now heaven has granted me this opportunity. This will make me happy for the rest of my life!" Again he prostrated himself.
Song Jiang returned the courtesy and raised him up, saying: "If you are willing to declare your allegiance to the throne and join me in subduing the rebels, I will report it when I return to the court and the Emperor is bound to pardon you."
Colonel Sun now reported back with Wen and Cui, the two outlaws who had marched to the rear of the Song army. Song Jiang had them brought in while Colonel Sun stationed his forces outside the fort. The two outlaws said to Song Jiang: "We would count ourselves lucky to serve under you as your slaves and work like dogs or horses."
Song Jiang said: "You have helped us to capture the pass. This is no small contribution. It will all be clearly noted on the record." A feast was held after this to celebrate with Tang and his two companions. A count was taken of the troops inside and outside the fort: twenty thousand had come over from the rebels and a thousand horses. All the leaders were rewarded for their work. Then Song Jiang asked Tang how many troops there were at Goodborough. "Originally there were thirty thousand," he said. "Shan brought ten thousand here to reinforce the pass. So now there must be twenty thousand, plus the ten commanders."
Tang Bin also said: "Tian Hu relies on Kettle Pass as a shield for Goodborough. Now it has fallen, he has lost a limb. Humble as are my talents, I would like to lead the attack on Goodborough."
Geng Gong, the commander who had surrendered at Lingchuan, was keen to go with him and Song Jiang consented. A little later he said to Wen and Cui: "You used to be on Calf Mountain and know the conditions there. I hear much of your valour. I would like to give you some troops and ask you to fortify it. When we are ready to attack Goodborough we will ask you to join us. What do you say?"
"Your wish is our command," they answered in unison. After wine had been drunk they left for Calf Mountain.
Next day, when Song Jiang gave out orders he sent Magic Messenger to the Unicorn at Jinning to inform him of the military situation and return straight away. While Magic Messenger was performing this duty, Song Jiang discussed things with the Professor and made dispositions for the attack on Goodborough. Tang Bin and Geng Gong with ten thousand men were to attack the east gate, Hasty, Hotshot and another ten thousand the south gate, leaving free access by the west gate for reinforcements from Weisheng, to prevent the besiegers being caught between forces inside the city and others outside. Iron Ox and companions with five hundred infantry would form a roving patrol. Colonel Sun and two others would take their troops up to Kettle Pass to help Demon King and Flautist defend it. This done, he and the Professor with the rest of them struck camp and marched toward Goodborough, camping again just a few miles from it to the south.
Now our story divides. The officials of Tian Hu's defence committee in Weisheng received reports from Shan Shiqi, the commander of Kettle Pass, and from Tian Biao in Jinning and duly informed Tian Hu that the Song forces were strong and posed an imminent threat both to Kettle Pass and to Jinning. When Tian Hu held a meeting with his staff to discuss the sending of reinforcements, someone stepped forward wearing a yellow turban and a cloak of crane's down, like the great general, Zhuge Liang, and said: "Great Lord, I would like to go to Kettle Pass and repel the enemy."
This man's name was Qiao Lie. He was from Jingyuan in Shaanxi. When his mother was pregnant she dreamed that a wolf entered the room, which later turned into a deer. When she awoke she gave birth to Qiao Lie. At the age of eight Qiao Lie was already expert with spear and staff. Wandering in the mountains one day, he met a magician who imparted his secret arts to him and he learnt how to conjure up winds, summon rain, ride the mists and mount the clouds. He went to the Two Immortals Mountain in Jiugong seeking the Way but the Master refused to receive him and sent an acolyte with these instructions: "Your command is external, you have yet to grasp the hidden truth. Turn to good and beat the demons, then you will come to me again."
Visibly angered, Qiao Liu withdrew. Henceforth he relied on his own efforts to achieve knowledge, through his ceaseless wanderings. Because of his reputation for magic, people called him the Wizard. Later he came to the district of Anding. A serious drought occurred there, with not a drop of rain for five months and the authorities published an appeal for a rainmaker, promising a reward of three thousand cash. Wizard Qiao Lie accepted the challenge and went to work. Abundant rain ensued. When the magistrate saw there was a sufficiency of rain, he forgot about the promised reward. That wasn't all. There was a crooked scholar in the town called Ho Cai who was very thick with the local treasurer. When he heard about the affair, he encouraged the treasurer to hand over the lion's share of the reward money to the magistrate and appropriate the rest for himself. Ho Cai then borrowed from him and made a small profit. The treasurer even gave three strings of cash to the Wizard, but said: "With a talent like yours, you really don't need the money. I am responsible for collecting taxes and I can never get it all in. I have to scrape it together here and there. If you take my advice, you'll leave this reward money in the treasury for the time being. Then when you need it you can always come and take it out."
The Wizard flew into a passion. "That reward money was contributed by the wealthy householders of the district. How can you embezzle it? What's in the treasury comes from the blood and sweat of the people and you want to cream it off to buy yourself smiles and pleasures and let affairs of state go hang. I'll kill you, you corrupt and profligate vermin, and get rid of a worm at the heart of the treasury!" He raised his fist and smashed it into the man's face. A debauched degenerate like that, fat and short of breath to boot, could hardly put up a fight. The Wizard punched and kicked him into such a condition that when he had crawled home battered and bruised he took to his bed and lay there in a sorry state for four or five days till he died of his injuries. His wife lodged an accusation with the authorities. The magistrate guessed that the reward money was at the root of the trouble. He signed a warrant and sent bailiffs to bring in the accused, Wizard Qiao Lie, for questioning. When the Wizard heard this, he immediately went back home and packed his things and then went with his mother to seek refuge in Weisheng. Here he gave himself out to be a Taoist sage and exchanged the name Lie for Qing, taking the religious name of Tao Qing.
Not long after all this, Tian Hu started his rebellion and, having heard of this Tao Qing's special gifts, recruited him. The Wizard helped Tian Hu to gain control of many districts by fabricating scandals, making full use of his magic arts and duping simple people. Tian Hu relied on his judgement in everything and named him Holy Sage, Protector of the Land, Marshal of the Army and Deputy Chief Minister. By this time he had changed his name and was called Grand Master Qiao Taoqing.
The Wizard now asked Tian Hu to give him command of an army to reinforce Kettle Pass. Tian Hu said: "You are diligent in my service, Grand Master!"
They had hardly finished speaking when Sun An, one of Tian Hu's ministers, appeared and said: "I would like to take an army to reinforce Jinning." Tian Hu gave them both joint command of the expedition against the southerners and gave each of them twenty thousand men.
The Wizard also said: "The situation at Kettle Pass is serious, so I shall take light cavalry and ride with the utmost speed to rescue them." Tian Hu was delighted and ordered his military council to allot them the troops. This done, the two generals mustered their troops before departing.
This Sun An was the Wizard's fellow-countryman — from the same district, that is. He was tall and strong and a fairly skilled tactician. His energy was exceptional. He had studied martial arts to considerable effect and wielded a finely engraved double-edged sword. He had killed two men in a family vendetta and was relentlessly pursued by the authorities so he fled from his home. He had been a close friend of the Wizard's and when he heard that the Wizard was serving with Tian Hu he went to Weisheng to take refuge with him. After the Wizard introduced him to Tian Hu and spoke of his prowess, he received a palace appointment. Now with ten officers and twenty thousand men he set out to reinforce Jinning.
Meanwhile the Wizard himself set off with his four commanders. They marched by night towards Goodborough and quickly reached a point just a few miles north of the city, when their scouts reported: "Kettle Pass fell to the Song army yesterday. Now they are advancing on Goodborough in three columns."
The Wizard was infuriated. "These fools are impudent. I shall have to show them the power of my art!" He ordered his forces to go forward with all speed. They ran straight into the forces of Tang Bin and Geng Gong who were attacking the north gate.
When they heard that two thousand horsemen had appeared in the northwest, Tang and Geng formed their troops up for battle. The Wizard's forces halted and they faced each other, banners waving and drums beating. Between the northerners and the southerners there was but the length of a bowshot. Surrounded by four officers at the head of the northern troops Tang and Geng could see a Taoist on horseback under a red umbrella. A black banner in front of the horse bore two lines of large gold characters, seventeen in all, which said: "Protector of the Land, Holy Sage and Chief Minister for War, Grand Master Qiao the Wizard, leader of the Expedition against the Southerners." Geng Gong exclaimed in alarm: "This fellow is to be feared!" Before they could engage, Iron Ox with his roving patrol of five hundred men happened on the scene and wanted to attack. Geng Gong said: "This is Tian Hu's right hand man and most accomplished fighter. He knows magic, he is truly formidable!"
Iron Ox said: "What good will his fucking magic do him when I've chopped the fucker's head off?"
Tang Bin also said: "Don't underestimate him!" But Iron Ox wasn't listening. Waving his axes he charged forward. Fearing trouble, his companions Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost followed on with five hundred of their shield-bearers. "The fools must learn some manners!" said their antagonist with a devilish laugh. With the utmost composure he took his precious sword and pointed at the sky, muttered a spell and cried out "Chrrr!" Instantly the clear blue sky filled with black clouds and mist, a violent wind got up and sand and dust began to fly. Black murk swallowed up Iron Ox and his five hundred men. It was like being inside a black lacquer box: no glimmer of light, no chance of moving an inch, nothing but the sound of wind and rain. They knew not where they were.

Well, you may be the bravest of the brave but you can't grow wings and fly away:
Not even the fiery-headed door god escapes earth's pitfalls, heaven's net,

Song Jiang remains loyal to his lord; Qiao the Wizard wins by magic

Now Iron Ox had ignored the words of Tang Bin and Geng Gong and led his forces out in an attack and got into difficulties through Wizard Qiao's use of magic and all his force, five hundred or more, had been taken alive, not a single one escaped. Geng Gong, when he saw things were turning out so badly, turned his horse's head eastward and with two cracks of the whip fled the scene. Tang Bin saw Iron Ox and the others caught and their forces scattered and saw Geng Gong flee, so he thought to himself: "This magic of Qiao the Wizard's is powerful stuff. If I'm caught alive I shall be made a mockery. They say that a soldier should value honour more than life. Anyhow, the way things are now it's better to die!" So furiously brandishing his lance he galloped forward in a desperate charge. Qiao the Wizard quickly muttered a spell and cried: "Chrrr!" and among his ranks a cloud of sand rose up and swept down upon Tang Bin. Completely blinded by the sand, Tang Bin was unable to strike a blow. Caught by the enemy and wounded in the left leg he fell from his horse and was taken alive. There was in fact a rule among the northerners that for every officer captured alive the reward was double, so the leaders were never killed. But among Tang Bin's troops — ten thousand of them all lost in the sand — it was a massacre. They were scattered like chaff and the greater part perished.
Leopard's Head and Spearsman at the east gate heard the noise of a great battle south of the city and rushed over there to give support. The city garrison had recognized the Wizard's banner and quickly opened the gates to receive him. Iron Ox and his comrades were also herded into the city.
Geng Gong was now seen fleeing with the remnants of his force. They were galloping flat out, saddles awry, reins flying, helmets skewwhiff. They only pulled up when they saw Leopard's Head and Spearsman. These two asked where the rest of their troops were. Struggling to speak, Geng Gong finally managed to blurt out a couple of words. Leopard's Head took him back to the main camp and on the way they ran into Short-Arse and Steelbright with a patrol of three hundred cavalry. They went together to inform Song Jiang.
Song Jiang was horrified to hear that Iron Ox and the others had been captured. "Iron Ox and his comrades are done for!" he wailed.
The Professor tried to comfort him. "Don't get so upset," he said. "We'll soon put things right. If they've got magic on their side we must send at once to Kettle Pass and fetch the Demon King to fight them."
"We can do that," Song Jiang said, "but at the same time we must go forward and bargain with those bandits for Iron Ox and the others."
The Professor tried in vain to dissuade him. Leaving the Professor in charge of the camp, he set off at once himself at the head of eight of his most trusted commanders and twenty thousand troops heading north to Goodborough. Hasty and Hotshot joined up with them and with banners waving and thundering drums, shouting and banging gongs, they charged up to the city walls.
Meanwhile the Wizard had entered the city and gone to preside in the court room. The ten military commanders reported to him and were about to hold a welcoming party for him when scouts reported the arrival of the Song troops. The Wizard responded angrily to the news: "The effrontery of the bastards!" He said to the garrison commander: "I'm going to go and get that Song Jiang!" He mounted and with four of his lieutenants and three thousand cavalry rode out of the city to encounter the enemy.
The Song troops were drawn up ready for battle when the gates opened and the drawbridge was lowered and a host of cavalry poured out. At their head was the Wizard, his precious sword unsheathed. The two armies, their banners waving, faced each other. Each set up a heavy fire of arrows and crossbow bolts at the opposing ranks. Trumpets blared and drums rolled on either side. From the Song ranks Song Jiang rode forth, with Perilous bearing his standard and his commanders spread out to his right and left. Half choking with indignation he pointed at the Wizard and shouted: "You rebellious brigands. Quickly return my brothers and their troops to me. If you're not quick about it, I shall take you alive and chop you into a thousand pieces!"
The Wizard replied: "Mend your manners, Song Jiang! If I don't choose to give them back, how do you suppose you're going to make me?"
By way of answer Song Jiang pointed with the stock of his whip and his commanders charged en masse. The Wizard through clenched teeth growled out his magic spell, pointed west with his sword and shouted "Chrrr!" In an instant countless warriors appeared in the west and bore down on the Song forces. Then the Wizard pointed north with his sword, muttered a magic formula and cried out "Chrrr!" Immediately heaven and earth went dark, the day was obscured, sand flew and stones rolled, earth shook and the heavens rocked. As Leopard's Head and company charged they could see nothing before them but sand and darkness, no sign of an enemy. They were stopped in their tracks. They sat there on their horses, baffled and bewildered. Then Leopard's Head galloped back to protect Song Jiang and flee with him northwards. The Wizard ordered his troops in pursuit. They caught the Song force and cut it to pieces. It was a rout.

Song Jiang and his commanders fled in confusion but they had not covered more than a few hundred yards when something extraordinary happened: the open plain in front of them became an expanse of tossing billows with no visible shore or limit, vast as the great Eastern Ocean. Even had they possessed wings they could not have flown across it. The enemy behind were catching up, evidently death awaited them. Monk, Pilgrim and the Red-Haired Devil cried out: "Surely we're not going to let ourselves be captured!" They tried to turn and charge. Suddenly there was a clap of thunder and up in the sky appeared twenty or more spirit knights in golden armour who came on with whirling weapons, overwhelming Monk and his friends. The northern troops followed up and took them all prisoner. Then there was a great shout:

"Song Jiang dismount and be tied up if you want to live!"

Song Jiang gazed heavenwards and sighed: "I do not fear death, it is only that I have not yet repaid my Emperor's favour and I leave my old parents without support. Nor can I rescue Iron Ox and my other comrades. But with things as they are all I can do is fight to the death, to avoid being shamed." Leopard's Head and the other six crowded closely about him and said: "We will follow the Leader in suppressing demons and killing bandits!" In these straits Perilous, hit in two places by arrows, still held aloft the Leader's standard and followed in Song Jiang's footsteps never more than a foot behind. The northerners, seeing the Leader's standard still flying, were wary of advancing.

Sword in hand, Song Jiang and his companions thought about killing themselves. But at that moment a figure was seen approaching. It spoke: "Stop. You have nothing to fear. I am the Lord of the Fifth Stem. I have seen your honour and loyalty and I have come to turn back the evil tide and enable you to return to your camp."

It was an astonishing sight. He bore two horns on his head, his body was black, he was naked but for a pair of yellow trousers and in his left hand he held a bell. He bent and picked up a clod of earth and flung it at the towering waves. Instantly the original plain reappeared. "You must suffer a few days of disaster," he said. "But now the water has gone and you must return quickly to your camp and send someone to Weizhou for reinforcements. Make every effort to defend your country!" With this he changed into a whirlwind and disappeared.

Their amazement knew no bounds. Surrounding Song Jiang to protect him, they headed south. After a mile or two they saw a cloud of dust and another squadron of cavalry appeared. It was a force led by the Professor, coming to their assistance. Song Jiang said to him: "I ought to have listened to your advice. I might not have seen you again, ever!"

The Professor said: "You can tell me about it when we get back to the camp."

They entered the camp in good order and then recounted how a god had come to save them in their predicament.

The Professor put a hand to his head and said: "The Lord of the Fifth Stem is the Earth spirit. Your valour must have impressed the Lord of the Earth. Remember, earth conquers water!" Understanding now the manner of their delivery, Song Jiang and his companions gave thanks to heaven.

Now as evening came on some defeated soldiers returned and told how in the confusion they had been attacked by four enemy commanders from Goodborough, who made a sally that killed many and scattered the rest. A count was made and more than ten thousand were found to be missing. The Professor said: "The enemy are using magic. They've already defeated us twice. We must plan quickly and decide how to defend this camp. Our troops are demoralized for the moment. It is only to be expected that these devilish devices, phantom warriors and the like, will sap their resolve. We must vacate the camp and fix up goats to make the drum sound, whilst we make our real camp a few miles off."

Song Jiang gave out the order and the army withdrew to a certain distance. The Professor also told him to create two camps: a smaller one contained within a larger, connected at the corners in a complex six-lobed pattern. These orders were carried out and when it was all set up the arrival of Demon King from Kettle Pass was announced. He went immediately to see Song Jiang and asked for detailed information about the Wizard. Then he said: "Don't worry brother. It is undoubtedly magic. Tomorrow I will make up a spell and capture him."

The Professor said: "If he does not attack tomorrow, I shall sit tight and wait till Taoist Gongsun arrives."

Song Jiang accordingly sent Hotshot, Short-Arse, Snake and Scorpion and five hundred cavalry, with instructions to ride posthaste by night to Weizhou and bring back Taoist Gongsun to rescue them from this enemy. They saddled their horses, bade farewell to Song Jiang and left. The army then set about laying out barricades of deer's antlers and strengthening the stockades; they strung their bows and unsheathed their swords, laid armour and weapons ready to hand and made sure that bells were rung and there was plenty of noise as, candle in hand, they waited for day.

As for the Wizard, having got Song Jiang into serious difficulties with his magic, he was planning to press home the advantage and capture him. When he saw that the water had suddenly disappeared and Song Jiang had slipped away, he was greatly put out. "My magic spell was something quite out of the ordinary, how did he manage to break it? He must have someone really special in his army." He withdrew his troops to the city and held a meeting with his commanders. They prepared a celebratory banquet in his honour, while the Song captives were brought before him. One of the northern commanders standing on the Wizard's left, started berating Tang Bin when he was brought in. "You turncoat, the Prince of Jin has never let you down!"

Tang Bin shouted back: "Your time is up, all of you."

The Wizard ordered them all to speak their names. Iron Ox just glared at him, held his chin up, stuck out his chest and shouted: "Listen here, you sneaky Taoist. I am Iron Ox Li Kui, otherwise known as the Black Whirlwind."

The others, including Monk and Pilgrim, in response to his questions resolutely refused to open their mouths. The Wizard therefore ordered some of their troops to be fetched. They were soon brought in by the sword and axe bearers and after questioning them one by one the Wizard learnt that Iron Ox and his companions were Song commanders. Then he addressed them, saying: "If you agree to surrender and serve our Prince of Jin, you will all be rewarded with high honours."

Iron Ox replied in a voice like thunder: "What do you think I am? Cut out the fucking shit. If you want to chop me up, that's your business. Cut me a hundred times and if I blink you can call me a coward!"

The others also abused the Wizard: "You perverted Taoist! Stop dreaming! You can cut our heads off, but we won't bend a knee, our legs are iron."

Enraged, the Wizard ordered them to be taken away and executed. Monk laughed out loud: "For me to die is like going home. If I die today, I am following the Way." The sword and axe bearers surrounded them as they were taken down. The Wizard thought to himself: "I've never seen such hard men. I'd best leave them be and think about it." He hurriedly ordered his men to untie their hands and guard them closely. Pilgrim began to shout: "Come on, then, you filthy rebels, cut my head off quickly and be done with it!" The Wizard lowered his head and said nothing as his guards escorted them out.

The Wizard had seen his magic water trick fail and he was already anxious in his heart. He remained in the city and waited to see what the Song army would do. Neither side ventured forth. After five or six days two more northern commanders arrived. They reported to the Wizard and their troops were quartered inside the city. When the Wizard saw that the Song troops had fortified themselves in their camp and were not going to attack, he assumed they must have run out of ideas. He mustered a force and with four of his commanders and twenty thousand men left the city at the fifth drumbeat and camped at Five Dragon Mountain, intending to attack at dawn. He said to his second-in-command: "Today we must capture Song Jiang and take back Kettle Pass." The latter replied: "We have confidence in Your Honour's magic art."

The Wizard launched his attack on Song Jiang's camp with ten thousand troops. When the Song scouts got the news they reported it at once to Song Jiang, who ordered Demon King and the Fire and Water Generals to muster their men, saddle their horses and counter-attack.

The Wizard was observing the Song camp from the top of a knoll. He could not help admiring what he saw. The report of a gun was heard from the camp, the gates opened and troops poured out. On either side now many-coloured banners waved, and the heavens shook to the thunder of the drums. The Wizard came down from the knoll and rode out in front of his lines, his commanders on either side of him. On the Song side Demon King rode out through the gate of pennants. Brandishing his trusty sword, he hurled abuse at the Wizard: "You lying Taoist, how dare you give yourself such airs!"

The Wizard thought to himself: "Most likely this fellow knows some magic. Let's try him out." He shouted back: "Curb your tongue, you hopeless loser! Do you dare pit your martial skills against mine?"

Demon King retorted: "If you want a contest, come out and fight!"

The two armies cheered and the drums rolled. Demon King slapped his horse, pointed his sword and charged. The Wizard likewise urged on his horse, waved his sword and galloped to the encounter. Two swords were raised on high, two demons fought. At first it was just two riders locked together in combat; later each brought his supernatural powers into play and it was two spiralling black clouds swaying this way and that between the armies, to and fro and back and forth. The men of both armies watched open-mouthed. Drunk with the fever of battle, Demon King thought he spied an opening and slashed at his opponent. But his sword bit the air and he almost fell off his horse. The Wizard had drawn him on intentionally, inviting the blow while he himself performed the empty dragon skin trick. Back now in front of his troops he guffawed loudly. Demon King retired chastened to his own side.

Next, two passages formed in the Song ranks, to left and right. From the left the Water General stormed out, with five hundred infantry all in black armour with black banners, carrying shields and javelins, pitchforks and sharp swords; from the right the Fire General rode forth with his fire-masters dressed in scarlet, carrying torches, pushing and dragging fifty fire carts loaded with reeds and other incendiary materials. Tied to the back of each man was an iron gourd, filled with gunpowder and five-coloured smoke powder, which they lit simultaneously. These two columns of troops, those on the right enveloped in black smoke, those on the left with fire spiralling up to heaven, came on at pace, striking fear into the hearts of the northerners, who were on the verge of fleeing. The Wizard shouted: "Deserters will be executed!" With his trusty sword in his right hand he muttered a spell and instantly a black cloud covered the earth, a storm broke out and huge hailstones began to pelt the Fire and Water contingents. The storm intensified and their lights were extinguished. The hailstones battered their formation to pieces and frightened the Water General and the Fire General out of their wits. They scuttled back to their own ranks without having had a chance to strike a blow, their pride squashed flat as a pancake.

In a little while the hail ceased and the clouds withdrew and the sky was as blue, the day as bright as before, but the ground was still covered with countless hailstones smooth as a hen's egg and the size of a man's fist. The Wizard could see the enemy — pates cracked, foreheads bloodied, eyes half closed, noses skew-whiff, slipping and sliding all over the place on the ice. He shouted out in stentorian tones: "Do you have anyone else with special abilities?" Whereupon Demon King, shamefacedly advanced, hair dishevelled, waving his sword and desperately mumbling a spell. A violent wind arose in all four quarters blowing sand and rocks about, while there was darkness over the earth and the sun went out. Urging on his men Demon King charged. The Wizard laughed and said: "What can you hope to achieve with this piddling magic of yours?"

He too waved his sword and made magic. He muttered a spell and the wind turned on the Song forces driving them back. There was a loud clap of thunder and countless ghost troops and spirit warriors filled the sky and came charging down on the Song forces. Horses whinnied, men screamed, and there was total panic. The Wizard and his four commanders followed up with a murderous charge. Now his magic had failed him, Demon King gave up all attempt at resistance and fled. As the northerners harried them and the situation became desperate, a beam of golden light appeared in the Song camp. It scattered the sand storm and caused the spirit warriors to fall flat on the ground. Everyone could now see that they were just cutouts of coloured paper. When the Wizard saw his spirit warriors had failed, he concentrated all his magic powers. With hair flying, he waved his sword and recited another spell: a shout of "Chrrr!" and the Magic of the Three Waters was launched. Within seconds a vast sea of blackness began sweeping in from the north. Then a gentleman rode forth from the Song ranks. He brandished an ancient sword patterned like a pine tree, recited a spell and cried "Chrrr!".

Immediately a host of yellow-robed spirit warriors appeared in the sky and flew northwards. They dispersed the black cloud. The Wizard was stunned. When they saw the Wizard's magic defeated, the Song forces gave a shout of triumph: "Qiao you evil Wizard, a greater power than yours is at hand!" The Wizard flushed to the tips of his ears in mortification and retreated to his own ranks. That mastery of the spirit world the Wizard had striven so hard for now hangs its head and has lost its impetus. Truly it would be as hard to wash out this occasion's shame as to hold the water of 3 rivers in the hands.

Now the person in the Song army called on to defeat the Wizard's black arts was of course Taoist Gongsun. When he received word from Song Jiang in Weizhou, he came rushing back, accompanied by Short-Arse, Hotshot, Snake and Scorpion. He went to see Song Jiang immediately. This was just when the Wizard was using his magic arts to defeat Demon King. It was the eighth day of the second month, designated by the fifth stem and seventh root. Now the fifth stem corresponds to the element "earth", and Taoist Gongsun asked the Lord of the Heavenly Roots and Stems to subdue those northern waters, sweep back the noxious miasma and restore bright day. When he and Song Jiang rode out in front of the troops, they were able to see the Wizard and his army ignominiously fleeing south. Taoist Gongsun said to Song Jiang: "We've beaten him, but if we let him get back into Goodborough he'll dig in his heels. Quickly, order Spearsman and Hasty to move east to the south gate with five thousand troops to deny them entry. Short-Arse and Blackface can take five thousand to cut him off on the west. Tell them if they encounter the defeated army simply to prevent them from entering the city and not to engage them." Song Jiang gave the necessary orders and his commanders carried them out. It was just after nine o'clock when Song Jiang and Taoist Gongsun with six other commanders and twenty thousand men began to advance. The northern commander guarding the Wizard, fought a rearguard action. More troops joined them under two other commanders. They had just reached the camp on Five Dragon Mountain when they heard the Song drums and gongs behind them, and the heaven-shattering cheers of the men as they surged forward. One of the Wizard's lieutenants said: "Stay in the camp, Your Honour, while I and my forces engage them in a fight to the death."

Now the Wizard had boasted in front of the whole army. Moreover, in the practice of his magic he had not hitherto met a rival. To find himself now hard pressed by the Song army was a total loss of face. He answered: "No, all of you stand back and let me deal with them." He deployed his troops in a long battle line behind him, with his lieutenants bunched up on the right and left. "You bog-dwelling bandits," he yelled at the Song army. "What gives you the right to throw your weight about like this? I shall have to hand you out another thrashing!" This Wizard, you see, was from Jingyuan in the far northwest, a very long way from Shandong, and he didn't know Song Jiang and his company at all!

Then the Song army, with much waving of banners, lined up for battle. The two armies faced each other: trumpets brayed, drums thundered. The yellow banner of the southerners was flourished, a passage opened among the pennants and two riders appeared. There sat the Shandong Guardian of Righteousness, Song Jiang the Opportune Rain. On his left hand was Dragon in the Clouds Taoist Gongsun, pointing his trusty sword at the Wizard and saying: "What you have learnt is only the external Tao, you have not grasped the true way, quickly dismount and surrender!"

The Wizard looked closely and saw that it was the one who had broken his spells. "Do you really think I would surrender to you, just because my magic went wrong today?" he answered.

"You still dare to talk about that piddling magic of yours?" Taoist Gongsun said.

"If you think yourself so superior you'd better take another look at what I can do!" the Wizard shouted back. He summoned up all his powers and pronounced a magic formula. He pointed at his lieutenant, whereupon the latter's spear was snatched as if by an invisible hand, wafted through the air like a flying serpent and directed down at Taoist Gongsun's head. Taoist Gongsun pointed his sword at Thunderclap and the latter's wolf-tooth mace rose out of his hand and parried the spear, darting this way, that way, through the air, as if controlled by the wind. Both armies watched in silent amazement. With a loud crash, and an answering shout from the onlooking troops, the shaft of the mace met the spear and knocked it out of the air. It landed with a resonant thud on the northerners' war drum, splitting its skin. The soldier carrying the drum turned white as a sheet. Next thing, the mace was back in its owner's hand, as if it had never left it. The Song soldiers laughed till the eyes disappeared in their faces. Taoist Gongsun shouted: "So you think you can fool around with weapons in front of the master, do you?"

The Wizard responded by conjuring up another spell: he pointed to the north and shouted "Chrrr!". Immediately a black cloud gushed from Five Dragon Mountain behind their camp, and in the midst of it a black dragon with huge scales and billowing mane. As it flew towards them Taoist Gongsun emitted a loud guffaw and also pointed to Five Dragon Mountain. Out shot a yellow dragon, at the speed of lightning, something between cloud and mist in form. It flew at the black dragon and there in the sky they began to fight. "Come forth, green dragon!" the Wizard now shouted and a green dragon raced out from the mountain, but after it came a white dragon opposing it. The armies watched the contest open-mouthed. The Wizard whirled his sword and shouted: "Quickly, red dragon, to the rescue!" Instantly a red dragon appeared and came swirling down. There in the sky the five dragons wove to and fro and it was just as the five elements, metal, wood, water, fire and earth, interact with and counter each other, within a single mass. A violent wind arose and several dozen of the standard bearers in either army were bowled over by its force. Taoist Gongsun transferred the sword to his left hand and with his right tossed his deer whisk into the air, where it performed a somersault and became a great bird like a wild goose and flew off. In seconds it waxed and grew till it reached to the ninth heaven when it turned into a giant roc hovering in the sky like a black cloud before stooping on the dragons. With a splitting sound like thunder the dragons burst asunder, scattering scales and talons in all directions. You see, this Five Dragon Mountain was a sacred place, where five-coloured clouds were often seen. The dragon god appeared to men in their dreams there, so a temple had been built, within which was displayed an ancestral tablet of the Dragon Lord and the green, yellow, red, black and white dragons of the five directions, formed from clay, gilded and painted in bright colours, were to be seen winding up the corresponding sides of a pillar. The two men had used magic to make these dragons fight as their representatives, and then the big roc Taoist Gongsun had fashioned out of his whisk smashed the five dragons to pieces and the shards rained down on the heads of the northern troops. The soldiers screamed in panic and could find no shelter from those ancient hardened chunks of pottery which left them black and blue and bleeding heavily. In a short space of time more than two hundred were injured and fled. The Wizard found he was bereft of his powers and could do nothing about it. A yellow ceramic dragon's tail falling on him from the heavens nearly cracked his skull and squashed his Taoist cap. Taoist Gongsun pointed once more and the roc softly vanished and the whisk was back in his hand again. When the Wizard made to produce more magic, Taoist Gongsun worked his Five Thunders magic. From his head sprang a yellow-turbaned spirit warrior who shouted: "Get off your horse and surrender, Wizard!"

The Wizard tried a spell, but it had no effect whatsoever. Flabbergasted by his powerlessness, the Wizard slapped his horse and fled back to his own ranks. Leopard's Head now let his horse go, whirled his spear and gave chase, shouting: "Stop, you evil sorcerer!" Two of the northern commanders rode out with readied weapons to stop him and Spots rode to support him. They fought it out in two pairs out in the middle to the cheers of the two armies. Leopard's Head fought more than twenty bouts with his opponent and neither could gain an advantage till Leopard's Head spotted an opening and lunged at the legs of his adversary's horse. The horse fell and Leopard's Head thrust his lance into the other's chest, killing him. The second northerner, at the height of his contest with Spots, saw his comrade fall, dodged aside and galloped off. Spots gave chase and brought his iron club down on the man's head, smashing both helmet and skull, so he fell dead from his horse. Song Jiang pointed with the stock of his whip and the Gardener, Green-Eyes, Steelbright and Auntie Gu charged together. The northerners fled in disarray and there was great slaughter. The Wizard, surrounded by four of his commanders, now abandoned the camp at Five Dragon Mountain and headed for Goodborough. They had passed the mountain and were only about two or three miles from the city when the sound of a war drum erupted ahead of them and with loud cheers a lively body of men poured out of a small path on the east, led by Spearsman and Hasty. Before the two sides had engaged the two commanders guarding Goodborough saw fighting outside the town and led a sortie from the south gate with five thousand troops. Spearsman and Hasty separated their forces to take them on. Hasty went one way with two thousand troops and his opponent resisted for a dozen bouts before Hasty, furiously wielding his axe, chopped him in two. The second northern commander hurriedly retreated into the town. Hasty galloped in pursuit and killed a hundred northerners, but had to stop when he reached the south gate because the enemy were safely inside and had raised the drawbridge and barred the gates. When wooden blocks and ballista missiles began to rain down from the walls, he was obliged to withdraw. Meanwhile Spearsman with three thousand men remained to block off the retreat of the main northern army. In spite of having lost one battle the northerners at this point still had twenty thousand men to oppose Spearsman. But two of the commanders had no stomach for the fight and fled westwards with five thousand cavalry escorting the Wizard. The remaining two encircled Spearsman who was greatly outnumbered, until Hasty and Song Jiang arrived from south and north. The northerners could not hold out against attacks from three sides. One of the leaders, wounded in the left shoulder by a thrust from Spearsman, fell from his horse and was trampled into the mud. The other tried to flee but was caught by Hotshot, whose spear transfixed him from the back and brought him crashing to the ground. In the ensuing rout most of the thirty thousand were killed. Corpses littered the fields and blood ran in rivers. Drums, trumpets, banners, helmets and armour were captured, horses were abandoned in countless numbers. The survivors scattered in all directions. Song Jiang's combined forces now numbered twenty-five thousand. They heard that the Wizard and his two commanders were fleeing north with five thousand and would have set off in pursuit, but it was late afternoon and the troops after battling furiously all day were hungry and exhausted. Song Jiang was about to recall them and return to camp for food and rest, and was pleased to hear that the Professor knowing how long and hard they had fought, had ordered Demon King and the Fire and Water Generals to come to their assistance with twenty thousand troops, equipped with torches and flares. Taoist Gongsun said to Song Jiang: "Now we've got reinforcements, you and the army go back to camp to rest and eat while I and the other three continue the pursuit. It is imperative that we get their Wizard to surrender."

Song Jiang said: "It is thanks to your powers that we have escaped disaster. After your unflagging efforts you should come back to the camp with us and rest. We can finish things off tomorrow. The Wizard is a broken reed; we've nothing more to fear from him."

Taoist Gongsun said: "There is something you should know, brother. My old teacher, the Great Sage, said these words to me many times: 'In Jingyuan there is someone they call the Wizard, who knows the rudiments of Taoism and came to me as a seeker after the Way. Initially I rejected him, because of a certain devilish spirit in him, because he had a base nature with a propensity to evil and because the time was not ripe. Latterly the evil of his nature has been in retreat: a happier destiny has superseded and he has turned to virtue. If haply his path crosses yours, you can reform him and once equipped with my mystic powers there will be profit from him in times to come.' On the way here from Weizhou, in obedience to your orders, I made some inquiries about this enemy with magic powers, and Marshal Zhang told me that the general who surrendered to you, Geng Gong, knows him well. Apparently he is that same Wizard my master spoke of. We have already seen that his magic is on a par with mine. It's only with the Five Thunders method, imparted to me by the Great Sage, that I was able to overcome him. This district is called *Good*borough, which fits in with my teacher's verse: 'Turn to good and beat the devils.' If we allow him to escape, most likely he will go to perdition and my master's mantra will not be fulfilled. This opportunity must not be lost. That is why I must continue the pursuit and find a way to make him surrender."

This long speech made all clear to Song Jiang and he was full of gratitude. With the rest of the leaders and troops he withdrew to the camp for food and rest, while Taoist Gongsun with Demon King and the Fire and Water Generals and ten thousand troops pursued the Wizard as proposed. Meanwhile the Wizard and his two commanders with the remnants of their army, some five thousand men all told, had approached Goodborough from the west. They were heading for the west gate when suddenly drums and trumpets sounded and a fierce squadron of cavalry emerged from behind a thick wood and charged. At its head were Short-Arse and Blackface. They rapidly deployed their five hundred men and blocked his way to the city. The Wizard's two lieutenants led a desperate charge. Their opponents, in accordance with Taoist Gongsun's orders, made sure they could not enter the city but did not actively engage them either and let them get away to the north. The defenders of the city had heard that the Wizard's magic had failed him, that he had suffered defeat and that the Song forces were strong. They were anxious about their defences and reinforced all the gates. They made no attempt to open them and come to their leader's assistance. Not long after this Blackface and Short-Arse were joined by Taoist Gongsun and his forces. "You two had better go back to the main camp for rest and food," he told them. "I am going to continue the pursuit."

They did as told. It was late afternoon. The Wizard and his companions were hurrying north, like dogs kicked out of the house or fish escaped from the net, with Gongsun and his commanders in hot pursuit. Taoist Gongsun shouted after them: "Dismount and surrender, it's futile to resist!"

The Wizard shouted back: "Everyone must serve his own master, why do you seek my destruction?"

Dusk had already fallen. The Song troops had lit torches and flares which illuminated the scene as brightly as day. When the Wizard looked about him, he could only see his two commanders and about thirty troopers. The remainder of his force had fled in all directions. He was about to draw his sword and kill himself but one of his lieutenants stayed his arm and said: "You must not do it, Your Honour." He pointed to the mountains which lay ahead of them and said: "We can take refuge up there." The Wizard, at the limit of his powers, followed his 2 commanders into the mountains. Now, north east of Goodborough was a mountain range called the Hundred Valleys, a spot where the legendary emperor, Shennong, inventor of agriculture, used to test the crops. There was a place there known as Shennong's Temple. This is where the Wizard and his companions set up camp. There were now only some fifteen men with them. The reason why Taoist Gongsun had allowed him to escape into the mountains was that he wanted to force his surrender. If the Song force had caught him they would have killed him, even if there had been not one but five thousand of him. But enough of this. Suffice to say that after allowing him to escape into the mountains Taoist Gongsun divided his men into four sections and posted them on all sides of the Hundred Valleys. In the second watch a host of torches appeared, one lot on the east and another on the west. This was because Song Jiang on returning to base had ordered Leopard's Head and Hotshot out on patrol that night, each with five thousand men. When they joined up with Taoist Gongsun it made a force of twenty thousand in two camps. They had the Wizard thoroughly surrounded, as you can imagine.

When Song Jiang heard next day that Taoist Gongsun had got the Wizard and his forces bottled up in the 100 Valleys, he made plans with the Professor to attack Goodborough. Orders were given to strike camp and March on the city. But the surrounding water had still not drained away. The defenders of the city had strengthened the moat and after two days, it still had not fallen. In his camp south of the city Song Jiang was depressed at the failure. Since the day Iron Ox and his companions were taken prisoner nothing had been heard of their condition and Song Jiang's heart bled for them. The Professor sought to comfort him: "Stop worrying, brother. The city should fall into our hands for the mere cost of a few pieces of paper."

"What's your idea?" Song Jiang asked eagerly. Calmly the Professor placed 2 fingers together and expounded his plan. It was to have important results.

Then the Professor said to Song Jiang: "The garrison of the city are weak and vulnerable. Previously they relied on the Wizard's magic. Now he has been defeated and they know they are not going to be relieved; they are bound to be scared. I had a look early this morning from an observation platform and the guards on the walls look demoralized. Now we can take advantage of their distress to open up a new route. Tomorrow the seriousness of their predicament will induce them to surrender and the city will fall into our hands with no bloodshed at all."

Song Jiang was delighted with this: "Your counsel is always invaluable, Professor," he said. After their deliberations, a dozen or so copies of a military dispatch were produced. It read as follows:

Song Jiang, Commander-in-Chief of the Imperial Pacification Expedition to the North to the garrison commanders and the citizens of Goodborough:

Tian Hu's crime of rebellion is subject to the full penalty of the law, but his allies and accomplices may be excused. If garrison commanders repent of their errors and return to the right path, and having resolved to turn over a new leaf order their troops and people to open the gates and surrender, I will vouchsafe to petition the Emperor for a pardon. If your commanders remain obdurate, then all and sundry, both the military and civilians,must, as the Emperor's loyal subjects, do what is right by overpowering the military commanders and reinstating allegiance to the Emperor. The leaders will be richly rewarded and may expect honours and rank. If you persist in error or shirk your duty the city will be taken and not a stone will be left standing nor a single person alive. This is our word.

Song Jiang gave orders for this proclamation to be attached to the heads of arrows that were fired into the city from all sides. He ordered the commanders attacking the gates to relax the pressure and observe developments within. Next day at dawn a huge outcry was heard in the city, following which flags of surrender were raised on all the gates. Two junior officers of the garrison had killed the three commanders and their heads were displayed on poles as a sign to the Song army. Iron Ox and the others were released from the gaol and mounted in sedans; the gates were thrown open and they were escorted triumphantly out of the city. The people then lit incense and candles to welcome the army. Song Jiang ordered the commanders of all units to form up their troops and march in good order into the city. Not a blow had been struck, not a soul had been harmed and the populace expressed their joy vociferously.

Once Song Jiang was ensconced in the government offices, Iron Ox and his companions entered and said: "We had almost given up hope brother! It is only because of you we are able to meet again. It is like a dream!"

Song Jiang and the others wept tears of relief. Later the leaders of the uprising came forward and prostrated themselves. Song Jiang hurriedly returned the compliment and raised them up saying: "You have done the proper thing, your lives are secure. There is no need for this ceremony."

They replied: "Immediate surrender was our only chance to escape punishment. Your graciousness is engraved on our hearts, we owe you our lives." They also gave a full account of how Monk, Iron Ox and the others had never faltered but had steadfastly abused their captors. Song Jiang was moved to tears of admiration.

Iron Ox said: "They tell me that lousy bugger is holed up over in Hundred Valleys. Let me go and chop the fucker up, to relieve my fucking feelings."

Song Jiang said: "Taoist Gongsun and his men have got the Wizard penned in there, because he wants him to surrender. It's something to do with a mantra of the Great Sage's. So hold your horses!"

Monk said to Iron Ox: "Listen to the Leader's orders! You must!" So Iron Ox desisted.

Song Jiang now issued a proclamation to allay the people's fears, rewarded the army commanders and had the exploits of Taoist Gongsun and the leaders of the uprising recorded. He was busy with military matters when it was reported that the Magic Messenger had returned. As soon as he entered Song Jiang asked him the news from Jinning.

Magic Messenger reported as follows: "I went to Jinning as you ordered and found the Unicorn attacking the city. He said to me: 'Wait till I've got the better of this lot, and then you can go back and tell our Leader the good news.' He kept me there three or four days, but Jinning simply would not fall. Then one evening on the sixth of this month there was a thick fog, so thick you couldn't see in front of your nose, and the Unicorn ordered his men to place sandbags surreptitiously under the walls. Around midnight, when the sentries on the northeast had grown careless, our troops crept up by means of the sand bags onto the city walls and killed a number of guards. Tian Biao fled via the north gate. His remaining commanders surrendered. More than five thousand war horses were taken and over twenty thousand troops gave themselves up. A considerable number were killed.

"The Unicorn now had control of Jinning. When daylight came the mist lifted. As the pacification process was proceeding it was suddenly reported that Tian Hu's deputy chancellor Sun An and ten lieutenants had arrived on the scene with a relief force of twenty thousand and had taken up a position only a few miles from the city. The Unicorn ordered Thunderclap and three others out to oppose the Chancellor and himself led the reserves. Thunderclap and the Chancellor fought sixty bouts but it was a stalemate. When the Unicorn arrived with his troops, he was impressed by the Chancellor's valour and ordered the gongs sounded to break off the fight. The Chancellor did likewise and everyone returned to camp.

"The Unicorn told everyone that such a brave antagonist would have to be defeated by guile, not force. Next day he laid an ambush and then rode forth himself to challenge the Chancellor. When they had fought some fifty bouts the Chancellor's horse suddenly stumbled and threw him. 'That does not count,' the Unicorn shouted to him. 'Quickly, get yourself a new mount!' The Chancellor found himself a new horse and they fought another fifty bouts. Then Unicorn feigned defeat and galloped off luring his opponent towards the edge of a wood. A report rang out and from either side the troops who had been waiting in ambush rushed out. The Chancellor had no time to act: his horse stumbled on the trip wires and the troops rushed up and seized both man and horse. Three other northern commanders dashed to the rescue, but were halted by the Blue-Faced Beast, Golden Wings and Redeye. As they fought it out, three pairs of riders, the Blue-Faced Beast gave a sudden cry and lunged with his spear, knocking his opponent from his horse. Golden Wings tricked his adversary into thrusting with his sword and dodged aside so that the blow hit only the air, and before he could recover Golden Wings' spear had pierced his heart. The third northern commander, seeing his two comrades fall, slapped his horse and galloped back towards his own ranks. But Redeye gave chase and brought his axe down on his head, smashing both the helmet and the skull inside. The Unicorn now urged his troops forward and the northerners were routed. Four or five thousand were killed and the rest ran three miles or more before making camp.

"Our troops returned victorious to the city. Some of them brought in the Chancellor, bound hand and foot. The Unicorn personally released his bonds and received him with the utmost courtesy, urging him to renew his allegiance to the Emperor. When he found the Unicorn's treatment so honourable, the Chancellor was willing enough to cooperate. He said to the Unicorn: 'There are still seven commanders and fifteen thousand troops at large. Will you allow me to go and negotiate their surrender?' The Unicorn could see no objection to this. The Chancellor rode by himself to the northern camp and talked the seven into surrendering. The Unicorn was delighted to see them and entertained them with wine. The Chancellor said: 'I marched out of Weisheng at the same time as the Wizard, who headed off to relieve Kettle Pass. This fellow has magic powers. I am afraid General Song may have some trouble with him. The Wizard and I are fellow countrymen. On account of your generosity towards me I would like to go to Kettle Pass and find out what is going on. I will try to persuade the Wizard to surrender.' The Unicorn gave his consent and sent me along with the Chancellor to report the victory. He told off the Son-in-Law and three others with twenty thousand troops to reinforce the garrison at Jinning. He is taking the remainder to attack Fenyang. We left only yesterday but I let the Chancellor do the magic walking with me. Today on the road I learnt that you were besieging Goodborough and that you had the Wizard surrounded. Just before we got here I heard that you had taken the city so I came here at once. The Chancellor is waiting outside."

Song Jiang was very pleased and told Magic Messenger to show the Chancellor in.

When the latter entered, Song Jiang saw it was someone quite out of the ordinary, of noble mien and dignified bearing. He came down to welcome him.

"I deserve a thousand deaths for opposing you." The Chancellor said, kowtowing respectfully.

Song Jiang returned his greeting and insisted: "You have changed your ways and returned to the right path, help me to subdue Tian Hu and when we return we will petition the court. You are sure to be rewarded with office." The Chancellor thanked him and stood up. Song Jiang bade him be seated and poured wine for him.

"The Wizard's magic is dangerous," he said. "It is fortunate that Taoist Gongsun was able to defeat it."

"Taoist Gongsun wants him to surrender, so he can put him back on the right track," said Song Jiang. "He has been holed up there for three or four days, but he still shows no sign of surrendering."

"We are good friends," said the other. "I must go and tell him to surrender."

Song Jiang sent him off by the north gate with Magic Messenger to Taoist Gongsun's camp. When the Chancellor explained his intentions, Taoist Gongsun was pleased and gave him permission to climb the mountain and seek out the Wizard. He rode off up the mountain alone.

The Wizard, remember, was hiding out with the two commanders and fifteen soldiers in the Shennong temple where they survived by sharing the Taoists' vegetarian food. There were only three Taoists at the temple and the Wizard and his party had soon eaten up all the food it had taken them months to collect from the faithful, but since they were outnumbered they had to put up with it. The Wizard heard the hubbub that day in the city below and climbed a ridge to see what was going on. When he saw soldiers all round outside the walls and people coming and going through the gates, he knew it had already fallen to Song Jiang. As he was lamenting this, he noticed a woodcutter emerge from a wood on the hillside below, with an axe stuck through his belt and a staff over his shoulder. Slowly and deliberately the man wended his way up the mountainside, singing to himself:

On the way up: hauling a boat.
On the way down: go with the flow.
Hauling a boat: nowt but a chore.
Go with the flow: please thyself.
On the way up is not so bad:
Get to the top, 'tis all the way down.

As he listened to this little woodcutter's ditty, the Wizard felt uncertain. "Do you know what the news is of the city?" he asked the man.

"The deputy governor has been killed by his two subordinates and the city has gone over to the Song," the man replied. "Song Jiang's force captured it without striking a blow."

"So that's the way it is," said the Wizard. The woodcutter completed his ascent and having reached the top headed off round the shoulder of the hill. A man on horseback now appeared, also making his way up the hill towards the temple. The Wizard was surprised to recognize Chancellor Sun An. What was he doing here? The Chancellor dismounted and made obeisance. "You were leading the relief column to Jinning, Chancellor," the Wizard said. "Why are you here on your own? It's swarming with troops down there. Why did they let you through?"

"Let me explain, brother ..." the Chancellor said. Noticing that the Chancellor failed to address him as Lord Protector, the Wizard realized something was wrong. "Let us go into the temple," the Chancellor said, "and I will tell you everything."

After the Wizard's two commanders had been introduced, the Chancellor recounted the fall of Jinning. The Wizard was struck speechless. "Do not be mistrustful, brother," the Chancellor said. "General Song is completely just, and if we enter his service and renew our allegiance to the Emperor, we will not be losers by it. I have come here to find you. Did you not once seek knowledge from the Great Sage?"

"How did you know about that?" the Wizard asked.

"The Great Sage would not receive you and sent an acolyte to tell you that you should 'Turn to good and beat the demons', am I right?"

"Yes, yes," the Wizard replied eagerly.

"Do you know who it was who broke the power of your magic?" the Chancellor asked.

"My adversary! I only know that he is one of Song Jiang's people. I know nothing of his background."

"He is the Great Sage's disciple, his name is Gongsun Sheng and he is one of Song Jiang's deputies. It was he who explained that mantra to me. This place is called Zhaode or Goodborough. Don't you see how the collapse of your magic power accords with the saying: 'Turn to good and beat the demons'? Gongsun Sheng has the Great Sage's injunction to reform you and set you back on the right path. That is why he has you surrounded here but has not come up to capture you. He has the means to overcome you and if he wished you harm what would stop him? Please see the truth."

These words effected in the Wizard a great awakening and with his lieutenants he duly accompanied the Chancellor down the mountain to where Taoist Gongsun was camped.

When the Chancellor announced him, Taoist Gongsun came out to welcome him into the camp. The Wizard prostrated himself and asked for pardon: "You show me such mercy as I do not deserve. After the trouble I have given you, it makes my guilt even greater."

Taoist Gongsun returned his greeting with alacrity and entertained him warmly. Seeing the other treated him so honourably, the Wizard said: "I was blind not to recognize a good man. If I am permitted to serve you I shall be happy all my life."

Taoist Gongsun now called off the siege and his commanders on all sides packed up and followed him back into the city. Song Jiang also received them most courteously and spoke conciliatory words. The Wizard, seeing Song Jiang's friendliness, was even more pleased. The other Song commanders arrived and Song Jiang ordered them all to be quartered inside the city. Wine was served in celebration. During the banquet, Taoist Gongsun said to the Wizard: "This magic of yours, at the highest level it can't compare with the Nirvana that the Boddhisattvas for aeons past attest to, the sense of being at home in mystic knowledge. And at the ordinary level it's no more than what the thirty-six immortals of Fairyland can achieve when years of exercises have enabled them to practise the art of metamorphosis, transcending the world of appearances and knowing the joy of creation. All you've got is a few borrowed spells which allow you to usurp natural powers and call ghosts and spirits to your aid, what in Buddhism they call sorcery and in Taoism we call necromancy. If you think this knowledge will enable you to transcend the mundane and achieve pure spirituality, what a huge error that is!"

When he heard all this the Wizard felt as if he had woken from a dream. He prostrated himself before Taoist Gongsun and called him master. The others too after listening to the Taoist's explanation of these secret mysteries were awed by his spiritual prowess. Finally the party broke up and they all went to bed. The night was uneventful.

Next day Song Jiang told Magic Hand to write out a report informing the court of the capture of Jinning and Goodborough and requesting Marshal Su to appoint officials to fill the vacant posts in the six captured cities as quickly as possible so the rest of them could get on with the campaign. As soon as this document had been satisfactorily drafted it was entrusted to Magic Messenger to deliver, with orders to start at once.

Magic Messenger packed his bags, chose a fleet-footed orderly to accompany him, bade farewell to Song Jiang and with his magic walking reached the Eastern Capital next day. He went straight to Marshal Su's palace to hand in the report and was lucky enough to catch the Marshal in his office. He spoke to one major-domo Yang, to whom he gave some small monetary gifts, asking him to see that the report reached the Marshal. Yang took it in and a few minutes later returned to say: "The Marshal orders you to attend on him." Magic Messenger followed him inside. He found the Marshal ensconced on his throne reading the report. When Magic Messenger had paid his respects the Marshal said: "This is a critical juncture and your arrival is most timely. The other day the Grand Preceptor and his gang in the presence of the Emperor brought accusations against your leader of incurring heavy losses of commanders and men, betraying public trust and shaming the country. They launched this campaign of defamation to persuade the Emperor to impose heavy penalties. The Emperor prevaricated. Then Deputy Chief Minister Chen memorialized him, accusing the Grand Preceptor and company of making false accusations against good men and picking on the innocent. He said that you had broken through Kettle Pass and asked for your accusers to be punished for bearing false witness. This only made the Grand Preceptor more determined to secure Chen's downfall. Yesterday he told the Emperor that Chen was author of a slanderous book, In Praise of Yao. Yao was supposed to represent the Emperor Shenzong and in some way this implied a criticism of himself. He wanted Chen punished for slander. Fortunately the Emperor has not yet pronounced judgement. This report of victory you bring will not only save Chen's bacon but also take a lot of pressure off me. I shall report this at tomorrow's dawn court." Magic Messenger thanked him and went to find somewhere to rest and await the outcome. Of this no more.

Next morning Marshal Su attended the dawn court, which was held in the Hall of Culture and Ethics. Immediately after the acclamation, Marshal Su announced Song Jiang's victories and told how he was in hot pursuit of Tian Hu and had won control of six provinces, as reported by a messenger who had just arrived from him. His Majesty expressed his complete satisfaction. Marshal Su also said: "As for the accusation that Deputy Chief Minister Chen wrote In Praise of Yao to represent the former emperor as Yao and Your Majesty as Shun, since when was praising Yao a crime? Minister Chen is honest and straightforward. He deals with affairs in a forthright manner and is brave and resourceful. I request that he be promoted and sent to Hebei to oversee the army. He is sure to achieve good results." The Emperor gave his consent and issued a proclamation saying: "Minister Chen is hereby promoted to Marshal and entrusted with the Northern Pacification Campaign. Imperial Commissioner Chen is to proceed with twenty thousand imperial guards to Song Jiang's headquarters to take over the running of the campaign. He is to take silver to pay them and reward commanders and men."

The court broke up and Marshal Su returned to his residence and summoned Magic Messenger to receive the reply. Magic Messenger after learning the outcome bade the Marshal farewell, and left the capital. Doing his magic walking he reached Goodborough next day. The whole trip had only taken him four days.

Song Jiang was busy arranging his forces and discussing the next campaign. When Magic Messenger returned he asked at once for news of the mission. Magic Messenger delivered Marshal Su's reply. When he had read it Song Jiang gave a full account to the other leaders. They all said: "That Commissioner Chen's a brave man! We'd better not just sit here twiddling our thumbs!" Song Jiang announced that the next attack would start as soon as they received the imperial edict. They all took note and remained in their quarters in the city. Of this no more.

Now north of Goodborough in the same province was the town of Lu. When Chi Fang, commander of the garrison there, heard that the Wizard was cut off, he sent a messenger to Weisheng by night with an urgent report for Tian Hu. The head of Tian Hu's bogus administration received it and was just about to take it in when the news suddenly broke that Jinning had fallen and that Third Prince Tian Biao was fleeing for his life. Hard on the heels of this news came the arrival of Tian Biao himself.

The Third Prince went in with the minister and prostrated himself before Tian Hu. He broke out into a loud wailing: "The Song army are too strong. They have captured Jinning and killed my son. I only just managed to escape. I have betrayed the trust you placed in me. I deserve a million deaths!"

The Third Prince continued to weep as the minister also reported his news: "I have also received a report from the commander of Lu saying that the Wizard is cut off by the Song forces and the fall of Goodborough is imminent."

Tian Hu hastily summoned all his officials, including the president, the vice-president and the army commander to discuss the situation. "Song Jiang has violated our borders, seized two of our main cities, killed many of our troops and is presently besieging the Wizard, what are you all going to do about it?"

At this point the Royal Brother-in-Law Wu Li spoke out: "There's no need to worry Your Majesty! I know my duty to my country, I shall raise an army and set off for Goodborough and in short order capture that Song Jiang and his rabble, and restore the cities to your rule."

This Royal Brother-in-Law was originally just a rich man of Weisheng. He was profoundly skilled in the use of spear and staff and immensely strong. He was a good shot too with the bow and wielded a fifty catty wind-splitter of a sword. Tian Hu was captivated by the beauty of his young sister and married her. He subsequently made the brother Grand Marshal, with the title "Royal Brother-in-Law".

The Royal Brother-in-Law went on: "My daughter Qiongying recently dreamt that a spiritual being had instructed her in the martial arts. When she awoke she found she was endowed with outstanding strength. Not only is her martial skill exceptional but she also has another miraculous talent. She can throw a stone and kill a bird ten times out of ten. People have taken to calling her 'Jade Arrowtip' I shall make her commander of my vanguard and I am confident she will achieve great things."

After the Emperor had confirmed their appointment and the Royal Brother-in-Law had thanked him, army commander Ma Ling announced, "I'd like to lead a force against the enemy at Fenyang." Tian Hu was pleased and granted him a seal and a general's banner, as well as jewellery. The Royal Brother-in-Law and Ma Ling each received 30000 troops and rapidly prepared to march. We shall say nothing of Ma Ling and his force as they march towards Fenyang but turn our attention to the Royal Brother-in-Law as, armed with the King's commission, he goes down to the parade ground to select thirty thousand troops, and organise arms and equipment for them. Returning to his residence he gave his daughter her orders as leader of the vanguard, took leave of Tian Hu and mustered his troops for the march. So Jade Arrowtip under her father's command marched on Goodborough. The intervention of this woman warrior was to have consequences.

Hotshot meets his destined bride; The Professor plans to poison the Royal Brother-in-Law

The Royal Brother-in-Law has made his daughter Jade Arrowtip commander of the vanguard and is himself following on behind with the main army. The girl was just sixteen, a lass beautiful as a flower. She was not his real daughter. Her original name was Qiu and she was the daughter of a man called Qiu Shen. Her home was in a little Fenyang village called Flossdown. This incidentally was the same Flossdown that was famous in the days of Duke Jin of the Spring and Autumn period. Her father, who was quite a rich man, attained the age of fifty without having a male heir. Happening to lose his wife, he took a second wife — a girl from another village — and she gave birth to Jade Arrowtip. When the girl was ten, her grandfather passed away and her mother had to go back to her native village with her husband Qiu Shen for the funeral. This village was in the next district, more than twenty miles away. Since it was so far, they were obliged to leave the child behind in the care of their butler Ye Qing and his wife. When they were half way there, a band of robbers suddenly materialized and killed the husband, scattered the retainers and kidnapped the wife. The retainers made their way back and told the butler, Ye Qing, what had happened. Now although this Ye Qing was only in service, he was what could be called a man of honour and knew something of spear and staff play. His wife besides was a sensible woman. When Butler Ye Qing told his employer's relatives, the latter appealed to the police to catch the robbers and buried the body. But the Qius' only real concern was to secure the inheritance for one of their own, and the butler and his wife were left to take care of their young mistress. A year or more later when Tian Hu's rebellion broke out, he seized Weisheng and sent out the Royal Brother-in-Law to plunder. When the latter got to Flossdown and started grabbing all the riches and kidnapping men and women, the Qiu heir was killed by Tian Hu's rebels and Butler Ye Qing and his wife together with Jade Arrowtip were all seized.

Now the Royal Brother-in-Law had no children. Struck by Jade Arrowtip's beauty he took her to show to his wife, whose name was Ni. Never having had a child of her own, Mistress Ni loved Jade Arrowtip at first sight and treated her as a daughter. From the start Arrowtip was extremely clever and had a hundred pretty wiles. Realizing she could not run away, since she had no relatives to turn to, and knowing Mistress Ni loved her, she persuaded her adoptive father to take Butler Ye Qing's wife An into his employ. As a result the butler's wife and Arrowtip were inseparable.

When he was first arrested, Butler Ye Qing had thought about escaping. But Arrowtip was still young and he and his wife were virtually all she had left in the world, and he realized that if he ran away there was no knowing what would become of her. It was fortunate his wife was there for her and if the opportunity presented itself he would try to get them all to safety. His master had met his end, he was no more. Then there was nothing for it but to serve the Royal Brother-in-Law.

After a successful campaign the Royal Brother-in-Law gave Butler Ye Qing his wife back, but she continued to come and go in the governor's residence and report the news to Jade Arrowtip. The Royal Brother-in-Law petitioned Tian Hu and Butler Ye Qing was given an official position.

Later the Butler was sent by the Royal Brother-in-Law to the Stonehouse Hills to fetch timber and stones. A member of his military escort pointed at the cliffs and said: "There is some beautiful rock there that is white as snow, absolutely flawless. The local inhabitants tried to carry it off and there was a tremendous clap of thunder and some of those who were trying to take it fainted from terror and did not come to for quite a while. Now they all bite their fingers and pray and daren't go near it."

When the Butler went with them to look, everyone cried out in amazement: "How extraordinary! Before it was just a block of white stone, now it's turned into a woman's body!"

The Butler went up to it and had a good look. Truly it was extraordinary. It was the body of his late mistress. The face was quite unharmed, but the skull was shattered, as if she had fallen off the cliff. He shed tears of horror and amazement, but this was not the time or place for explanation.

At this point a soldier stepped forward: he had been one of Tian Hu's grooms and he gave a detailed account of Mistress Song's capture and death. "It was back in the first days of the Prince's rebellion, in a place called Jiexiu, that he kidnapped this woman, intending to make her his concubine. She persuaded him to free her from her bonds. When they got here she threw herself down from the top of the cliff and died. Seeing she was dead, the king told me to strip off her clothes and jewellery. I actually lifted her onto my horse and took off her clothes, I got a very good look at her face, there can be absolutely no doubt that it's her. That was over three years ago, and the body is still in perfect condition."

The Butler wept copiously at this tale. Turning to the soldier he said: "I recognize her too. It's Mistress Song, the daughter of my neighbour." He ordered the soldiers to bury the body, and lo and behold, it was a block of white stone again. Everyone was full of wonder as they went off to complete their business fetching stone. When the Butler returned to Weisheng he told his wife how Tian Hu had kidnapped Mistress Song and how she had killed herself to preserve her chastity. He asked her to inform Arrowtip discreetly.

When Arrowtip heard this it was as if a thousand arrows pierced her heart. All the time she had to repress her tears and grieve in secret but not for a moment did she abandon her thoughts of revenge. When she closed her eyes one night a spirit appeared to her and said: "If you want to avenge your parents, let me teach you martial arts." She was a clever girl and when she awoke she remembered everything. She secretly got a staff, bolted the door of her room and practised. After quite a while she was expert. Gradually the winter of the fourth year of the reign drew near. One evening Arrowtip happened to fall asleep with her head resting on the table. Suddenly there was a rush of wind and a strange scent assailed her nostrils. A scholar appeared, wearing a turban, accompanied by a young warrior in a green robe, whose role was to teach her the art of throwing stones. The scholar said to her: "I went all the way to Gaoping to invite the Unshakeable Star here to instruct you in magic skills that will save you from the tiger's den and enable you to avenge your family. This gentle-man is also your destined partner from a previous incarnation." These last words were a cause of such embarrassment that she quickly covered her face with her sleeve. In doing so she brushed the knife. The clatter it made woke her to the cold moonlight and a dying lamp. It was like a dream and not a dream. She sat there for a long time in a daze before she lay down to sleep again.

Next day she remembered about the art of throwing stones. She picked up a round stone the size of a chicken's egg outside her window and without thinking threw it at the upward-pointing finial on the ridge of the roof. It was a direct hit and with a crash the tile shattered into a thousand pieces which fell in a cloud to the ground. The noise brought Mistress Ni, her adoptive mother, running to see what had happened. Arrowtip artfully explained: "Last night I dreamt that a god came to me and said: 'Your father has a royal destiny. I have come to teach you the mystic arts of battle, to help your father in his ambition.' Just now I picked up a stone and threw it without thinking and it broke the tile on the roof."

Mistress Ni was astonished. She reported the tale to her husband who refused to believe it and summoned Arrowtip for questioning. When she was tested in the handling of spear, sword (long and short), halberd, cudgel, staff, trident and harrow, she was found to be proficient in them all. As for the art of stone-throwing, she never missed! The Royal Brother-in-Law thought to himself in amazement: "I am indeed destined to fortune. Some kind of heavenly spirit is aiding me." The upshot was that he ordered Arrowtip to practise her horsemanship and swordplay and news of her prowess spread throughout the household and the people of Weisheng also became excited. They dubbed her "Jade Arrowtip". The Royal Brother-in-Law wanted to find a husband for Arrowtip but she said to his wife: "I won't marry anyone but a stone-thrower. If you try to marry me to anyone else, I shall kill myself." Mistress Ni told this to her husband, who decided the whole business was too difficult and gave up the idea.

The two words "royal destiny" burgeoned in the Royal Brother-in-Law's mind and he made Arrowtip commander of his vanguard. His idea was that a split between two factions would allow him to take the middle ground and assume the rule himself. He picked his troops carefully, instructed his officers and marched out of Weisheng. He allotted five thousand picked troops to Arrowtip in the vanguard, whilst he himself followed on with the main army.

We shall leave the Royal Brother-in-Law and his adopted daughter Jade Arrowtip as they advance, and turn to Song Jiang and company who were waiting for the arrival of Commissioner Chen in Goodborough. After ten days it was announced that he had come. Song Jiang led the others a long way out of the city to meet him and escort him to his quarters in the governor's residence which for the time being was to serve as military headquarters. They all paid their respects. The Commissioner knew all about Song Jiang's virtues but happened not to have met Song Jiang face to face. Now that he saw his modesty and generous spirit he felt even more respect for him. "His Majesty, who has heard of your repeated successes, has sent me here to supervise operations. I come with carts loaded with gold, silver and silk to reward you all."

They prostrated themselves in thanks and said: "We are grateful, Your Excellency, for all you have done on our behalf. We know it is you who have won us this reward. The Emperor's favour comes to us as a result of your merit and even if we lay down our lives for you we can never adequately repay you."

The Commissioner said: "You have done sterling work. When you return to the capital the Emperor will find you important posts."

Song Jiang again prostrated himself and said: "May it please you, Your Excellency, to undertake the administration of Goodborough, so that we are free to deploy our forces and attack Tian Hu in his lair and disrupt his forces."

The Commissioner said: "Before I left the capital I mentioned to the Emperor that the cities you have captured lack administrative officers and a time limit was set for them to start their duties. They should arrive any day now."

Song Jiang distributed the reward among the army and at the same time composed a dispatch with which he sent Magic Messenger to every district and village ordering his commanders to await the arrival of the new officials and then hand over to them and report back for duty with their troops. He sent to Fenyang for news of the situation there. He informed the Commissioner of the contribution made by Tang Bin who had surrendered in Hebei, and recommended the two leaders of the uprising in the city for the command at Kettle Pass and Calf Mountain, in order to release Colonel Sun and Whiskers for further duties. The Commissioner agreed to everything.

Suddenly an urgent report came in from the scouts. "Tian Hu has sent Ma Ling with a relief force for Fenyang and the Royal Brother-in-Law and Princess Jade Arrowtip are marching on Xiangyuan from the east."

After consulting the Professor, Song Jiang organized a force to meet the enemy. At this point the Wizard said: "Ma Ling possesses magic powers and has a method of magic walking. He carries a metal block which he throws with deadly accuracy. I have received many favours from you but I have not yet done anything for you. I would like to go with my master, Taoist Gongsun, to Fenyang and persuade Ma Ling to surrender."

Song Jiang was well pleased and ordered two thousand troops to accompany them. The two of them bade him farewell and set off at once.

Song Jiang now ordered Hasty with six other leaders and twenty thousand troops to attack Lu, while Short-Arse with Steelbright, Blackface, Auntie Gu and a thousand cavalry were to carry out reconnaissance and ascertain the position of the northern troops. He himself bade farewell to the Commissioner and marched out of Goodborough heading north with the main army, together with Chancellor Sun An, who had come over to them just recently, and thirty five thousand troops.

On reaching a point north of Mount Wuyin in Xiangyuan district Short-Arse and his patrol came upon the advance guard of the northern army under two commanders, one of them being the Butler. The two forces clashed, with drums thundering and waving banners. At the forefront of the northerners was the other commander, Sheng Ben. On the Song side Short-Arse galloped forward to do battle. Without a word he slapped his horse, twirled his spear and charged. A shout went up from both sides as Sheng Ben galloped to meet him. When they had fought a dozen bouts Steelbright rode out with whirling sword to support her husband. Two opponents at once was too much for Sheng Ben and he turned his horse and galloped off. Steelbright galloped in pursuit and cut him down with a blow of her sword. Short-Arse and his men charged and the Butler, unable to face them, hurriedly retreated. The Song forces gave chase and killed five hundred or more. The remainder scattered in all directions. The Butler, with no more than a hundred horsemen, fled to somewhere about eight miles south of Xiangyuan. Jade Arrowtip and her forces were encamped here.

Just six months before, Tian Hu had sent the Butler with General Xu Wei to the garrison of Xiangyuan. When the Butler heard that Jade Arrowtip, whom he had served so faithfully, remember, after her true parents were killed, had been made commander of the Royal Brother-in-Law's vanguard, he requested permission to take his troops out on reconnaissance hoping for a chance to meet up with his mistress. The Prince sent another of his officers, Sheng Ben, along with him and he was the one killed by Steelbright. The Butler now was fortunate enough to make contact with Jade Arrowtip's forces.

When the Butler came into the camp, he saw how his mistress had grown up: although a woman, her appearance was dignified and imposing and she bore herself like a true leader. The moment she saw who it was, she dismissed her aides and said to him: "Although I've escaped from the tiger's den, I've only got five thousand men. How am I going to avenge my parents? If I run away it seems like a betrayal. I am in a quandary and I was waiting for you."

The Butler said: "I have been thinking about it but I can't see any way. If I think of something, I'll let you know." He had hardly finished speaking when it was announced that the southerners were attacking. Jade Arrowtip armed at once and marched out to meet the enemy.

The two armies faced one another, banners and drums responding to each other on either side, the troops drawn up in battle formation. In the opening of the northern ranks a beautiful young woman warrior appeared, seated on a silver charger. On this young woman's standard it was clearly written: "Princess Jade Arrowtip, Leader of the Vanguard for the Expedition against the Southerners." Even the Song troops exclaimed in admiration. Stirring martial strains were heard on either side while brilliantly coloured embroidered banners blotted out the sun.

When Short-Arse saw it was a beautiful woman, well, naturally, he drove his horse forward, levelled his lance and charged. To cheers from either side, Jade Arrowtip slapped her horse, twirled her halberd and rode to meet him. After a dozen bouts, Short-Arse simply couldn't control his thoughts and his work with the spear became confused. Arrowtip thought to herself: "This man's disgusting!" She feinted and then slashed him in the left leg. His legs waved in the air and he fell headlong from his mount.

When Steelbright saw her husband wounded, she gave a furious shout: "You dirty bitch! What are you playing at?" and charged to the rescue. Arrowtip levelled her halberd and received the charge. Short-Arse was still floundering on the ground and the northerners surrounded him and took him captive. But Blackface and Auntie Gu snatched him away from them. Auntie Gu saw Steelbright could not get the better of Arrowtip and rode to her assistance, wielding her two swords. Imagine that encounter! Three women, six arms, four swords and a halberd, all whirling about like a snowstorm, like a shower of shattered crystal, like a blizzard of flower petals! So fast was the movement that to the eyes of the onlookers in the two armies it became just a blur! After twenty bouts Arrowtip feinted, then put up her halberd and fled, while the other two gave chase. Arrowtip switched the halberd to her left hand and in her right took a stone. She bent her willow waist, screwed up her eyes, took aim at Steelbright and let fly. It caught Steelbright on the wrist of her left arm. The pain caused her to drop one of her swords and she turned her horse and galloped back to her own ranks. Auntie Gu abandoned the chase and rode to help her comrade. Arrowtip reined in her horse and turned to chase them. Blackface furiously charged, waving his two rods. But before he arrived, a stone from Arrowtip clattered on his helmet of hardened bronze. That was enough for him. He abandoned the attack and galloped back to his own ranks. They all retreated with the wounded Short-Arse and Steelbright.

As Arrowtip was preparing to follow up, a loud report rang out. It happened to be the end of the second month, the time of year when there are willow branches in bud waving in the breeze and horses neighing restlessly in the meadows. Down the hillside raced a squadron of men: Leopard's Head and the Chancellor, together with Iron Ox and his infantry in support. The two groups met with thundering drums, waving flags and a continuous uproar. Eight-pointed lance at the ready, Leopard's Head led his troops forward. Opposite, Jade Arrowtip twirled her square halberd and urged her horse on. When Leopard's Head saw it was a woman he shouted: "What makes you think you can oppose the imperial army, you wretched female?"

Jade Arrowtip answered not a word but twirled her halberd, slapped her horse and charged. Leopard's Head rode to meet her. The horses clashed, the weapons were raised. After countless bouts Jade Arrowtip was too exhausted to block the blows so she dodged aside with a wild sweep of her halberd and turned her horse and fled eastwards. Leopard's Head galloped after. The Chancellor who was also out in front saw her banner and shouted: "Don't follow her commander, it's probably a trick." But a redoubtable warrior like Leopard's Head was not going to listen to that. He strove all the harder to catch her. Over the springy turf eight hooves clattered with the sound of upturned cups, as they flew like the wind.

Jade Arrowtip waited till Leopard's Head closed on her, then took the halberd in her left hand and reached into her saddlebag with the right, took out a stone, twisted in the saddle and launched the stone directly at his forehead. Leopard's Head was sharp-sighted and agile and he parried the stone with the butt of his spear. Seeing she had missed, she took another and it flashed through the air like a shooting star. With awesome accuracy it sped towards Leopard's Head. Too late he tried to dodge. The stone hit him in the face and the blood spurted out. He put up his lance and returned to his own side, pursued by Jade Arrowtip.

The Chancellor was just about to go forward when the men in his ranks made way and outpoured five hundred battle-hardened infantrymen led by Iron Ox, Monk, Pilgrim, Snake and Scorpion. Brandishing his axes Iron Ox charged forward shouting: "What's that bloody woman playing at?" Jade Arrowtip grasped another stone and flung it at Iron Ox, catching him square on the temple. Iron Ox had a shock but luckily his skin was tough and his bones strong. and though the wound was painful there was no serious damage. Seeing she could not knock him down, Jade Arrowtip galloped back to her own ranks. Iron Ox, tiger's whiskers bristling with indignation, eyes bulging in fury, roared into the attack. His comrades, fearing for his safety rushed after him. The Chancellor tried unavailingly to stop them. Jade Arrowtip saw them all coming and knocked Snake to the ground with another stone, whereupon the other three rushed to pick him up. Iron Ox was still out to get her, so she waited till he was close; her next stone caught him on the temple. This second hit drew blood. But Iron Ox was made of steel. Painted red with blood, that swarthy face seemed on fire. Whirling his axes he burst upon the northern ranks and began wreaking havoc.

The Chancellor had seen Jade Arrowtip return to her own ranks and mustered his men for a charge. But at this moment the Royal Brother-in-Law along with General Xu Wei and eight junior officers arrived with the northerners' main army and there was confused fighting on all sides. Monk and Pilgrim rescued Snake and then returned to the fray. Scorpion took charge of his brother and was trying to get him away from the fighting when they were overtaken by the enemy, bound and dragged back to the other side. Iron Ox's infantry were repulsed. But the Chancellor, fighting with desperate courage, cut one of the northern commanders down from his horse with a single sword blow. The Royal Brother-in-Law was also hit in the neck by an arrow fired by one of the Chancellor's men and fell from his horse. The General made a desperate charge, rescued him and put him on a horse.

When Jade Arrowtip and her commanders saw the Royal Brother-in-Law hit by an arrow, they hurriedly sounded a withdrawal. By now more Song troops were coming up from the south. This time it was Hotshot, who had received an urgent dispatch in the camp from which he learnt of a stone throwing woman warrior among the northerners who had wounded Steelbright and others. He wondered greatly at the report and begged Song Jiang to let him go at once to reinforce them, because he wanted to see this woman warrior for himself. But Jade Arrowtip had already withdrawn from the field. Escorting her adoptive father, the Royal Brother-in-Law, she was riding off towards Xiangyuan, skirting the great forest. Hotshot stared after her. The poem says:

Surrounded by the bustle and pageantry of war.
She enters the forest and is lost to view,
Among multitudes of flowers, a flower's easily concealed.

When the Chancellor saw Snake and Scorpion taken and Monk, Pilgrim and Iron Ox charging into battle, he would have liked to muster his troops and join in, but it was getting dark and he and Hotshot were obliged to protect Leopard's Head and order their troops back to camp.

Song Jiang was in his tent where Short-Arse's wounds were being attended to by Doctor An. Short-Arse turned out to be not only wounded in the foot, but also cut about the face. When Doctor An had finished treating him he turned his attention to Leopard's Head. Song Jiang was extremely upset when he heard Snake and Scorpion had been taken and the whereabouts of Iron Ox and the others were not known. In a little while the Pilgrim and Iron Ox appeared, muddy and bloodstained. "When I saw how excited Iron Ox was," said the former, "I was determined not to hold back. Together we murdered them, smashed right through them till we reached the city walls. There we found they had Snake and Scorpion tied up and were just about to take them inside. We killed the escort and grabbed our two comrades. But their general came up with the main army and recaptured them. We fought our way out and came back empty-handed. We don't know where Monk has got to."

Song Jiang's eyes filled with tears. He ordered search parties out in all directions to listen for any sign of Monk and told Doctor An to attend to Iron Ox. Night had now fallen. Song Jiang ordered a roll call and it was found they had lost more than three hundred. The defences were strengthened and alarms set up. Nothing happened that night. When it was reported early next morning that there was no news of Monk, Song Jiang grew still more gloomy. He sent Lungs and three others out to search, each with a detachment of light cavalry. He would have liked to attack the city himself, but too many of his leaders were wounded and he was obliged to rest his forces. Those in the city had barred and bolted their gates and did not come out to fight. After two days Perilous caught a spy and brought him in. The Chancellor recognized him as the northern superintendant, Butler Ye Qing. He said to Song Jiang: "From what I hear this is a brave man. He ventured out of the city all on his own. There must be something behind it." Song Jiang had the man's bonds released and told him to come forward. The Butler kowtowed repeatedly and said: "I have a secret matter to discuss. Please dismiss your aides and I will explain myself."

Song Jiang said: "These are all my friends. We have no secrets from each other. You may speak freely."

The Butler then said: "In the battle the other day, the Royal Brother-in-Law was hit by a poisoned arrow. He has become delirious and the doctors in the city can do nothing for him. On the pretext of looking for a doctor I have come out to make certain inquiries."

Song Jiang asked: "What are you doing about the two leaders of ours you captured the other day?"

"I didn't want any harm to come to them. Since the Royal Brother-in-Law's mind is not clear I have been giving the orders for him. For the time being the two commanders have been locked up and they are quite safe there."

The Butler told them what Tian Hu had done to Jade Arrowtip's true parents and all the rest of her story. When he finished he was overcome with grief.

Song Jiang remained uneasy. Since the Butler was a northerner, he feared a plot. As he was hesitating, Doctor An stepped forward and said: "Truly it must be a stroke of fate. This is no accident!"

Then he explained. "Last winter commander Zhang, our Hotshot that is, dreamed that a scholar asked him to go and teach a young woman how to throw stones. He also told him that this girl was destined for him as his wife. When he awoke he appeared to have lost his wits. That was when you sent me away with him to Gaoping for the rest cure. I took his pulse and realized it was some kind emotional disturbance. I questioned him at length and finally he confessed the cause of his illness and I was able to proceed with the cure. Now that we have heard this story of the Butler's, does it not sound exactly as if it refers to Hotshot?"

Song Jiang again asked the surrendered Chancellor, who replied: "I had certainly heard that Jade Arrowtip was not the Royal Son-in-Law's real daughter. One of my officers and the Royal Son-in-Law's aide are close friends, so I have heard quite a lot about the girl. The Butler's story could well be true."

The Butler said: "My mistress Jade Arrowtip is resolved to have vengeance and wipe out the disgrace. I have witnessed her ferocious courage in battle. I fear that if the city falls it will be reduced to rubble. I have risked death to come here. I implore you to help us."

The Professor stood up and took a long, hard look at the Butler. "His distress seems genuine," he said to Song Jiang. "I am sure he is honest. Heaven will favour your purposes and allow a filial daughter to have vengeance!" Then he lowered his voice and said to Song Jiang in confidence: "Although our forces are divided into three columns to attack, if Tian Hu joins up with the Jin, we will be caught between two fires. If the Jin refuse to take the field and Tian Hu's plan fails, he will surrender to them. Then how will we pacify the region? What I have in mind requires inside help. This is an opportunity. Given this match of Hotshot's, we need only do thus ... and thus ... Then Tian Hu's fate is in Jade Arrowtips's hands. The spirit Iron Ox saw in his dream is a harbinger of this. Don't you remember the lines he was told to memorize: 'To exterminate Tian Hu and his ilk, jade arrowtip must serve your purpose'?"

Song Jiang suddenly got the message and nodded enthusiastically. He summoned Hotshot, Doctor An and the Butler and explained the secret plan. They set off in accordance with their instructions.

Well, the commander of the garrison at Xiangyuan saw the Butler returning and heard him shout: "Quick, open the gates! I am Superintendant Ye Qing. I was sent to fetch doctors Quan Ling and Quan Yu and we've just arrived!" One of the guards reported it to the guard commander and shortly afterwards the order came back to open the gates. The Butler entered the city with his two doctors in tow. They went straight to the palace. From within came the order for them to enter and get to work. The Butler went in first with Quan Ling and asked among the staff and attendants for his mistress Jade Arrowtip, to whom he introduced the doctor. When they arrived at the Royal Brother-in-Law's couch they found him scarcely breathing. The doctor took his pulse and applied some ointment and gave him a tonic to take. In three days the patient's skin gradually regained a healthy colour and his appetite began to return. In just five days, although the wound had not fully healed his appetite was normal. He was delighted and told the Butler to bring the doctor in to see him. "Thanks to your brilliant treatment," he said to him, "my wound has healed. One day when I come into my own, you shall share in my fortune."
The doctor prostrated himself and said: "My skill is slight and unworthy. But I have a brother who was with me a long time in the rivers and lakes and who picked up some skill in martial arts. He is expert in making up medicines. I beg Your Excellency to give him advancement."
The Royal Brother-in-Law gave orders for the doctor's brother to be admitted. Since his appearance was quite out of the ordinary, the Royal Brother-in-Law was well pleased with him and told him to stay outside the palace and be ready for orders.
The two brothers kowtowed and left. Four days passed and then it was suddenly reported that Song Jiang was advancing on the city. When the Butler went to report this to the Royal Brother-in-Law he impressed on him that Song Jiang's forces were powerful and bold and only the Princess would be able to repel them.
The Royal Brother-in-Law ordered Jade Arrowtip down to the parade ground to organize an army. At this point the Doctor's brother said: "I am here at your service, Your Excellency. I have heard that the enemy are approaching. My ability is slight, but if you give me an army I will endeavour to see the enemy so beaten that nothing survives, not so much as a scrap of armour." Then the Butler feigning a great anger said to him: "Since you've got such a big mouth, do you dare test yourself by fighting me?"
Quan Yu replied with a laugh: "I studied the eighteen weapons from childhood, I am certainly your match."
The Butler requested the Royal Brother-in-Law's permission, which was granted, together with arms and a horse. The two men armed and mounted and went to it on the parade ground in front of the saluting post: backwards and forwards they fought, sculpted into a single block, moulded into a single mass, man against man, horse against horse. They fought forty or fifty bouts and neither had the advantage. All this time Jade Arrowtip was standing on the sidelines studying Quan Yu's face. Suddenly she exclaimed: "He looks like someone I saw before; his technique with the spear is just like mine." After pondering this for a while, she suddenly remembered: "The person in my dream, who taught me to throw stones, had a face like that. I wonder if he can throw stones too." Grasping her halberd she galloped forward and interposed it between the two combatants. She was afraid, you see, that the Butler might injure Quan Yu. She didn't know they were really both on the same side. With her halberd she aimed a blow at Quan Yu and he met it with his. They fought fifty bouts. Suddenly she turned her horse and galloped back towards the pavilion. Quan Yu raced after her. She grasped a stone, turned and flighted it towards the pit of his stomach. He saw it coming and stuck out his hand and caught it deftly. Marvelling at his dexterity, she took another stone to throw. As he saw her raise her arm, he also took a stone and threw it. There was a loud crack as the two stones met in mid-air and broke into splinters which fell to the ground.
The commander of the garrison, General Xu Wei, and most of the others were all manning the gates that day and there were only some junior officers at the parade ground. Some of these suspected Quan Yu might be a spy. But when they saw that their mistress Jade Arrowtip, who was a princess, was prepared to compete with him and since it was the Royal Brother-in-Law's own confidential aide Butler Ye Qing who had brought him in, it was impossible for anyone to raise objections. Evidently there was nothing to be done about it and they thought best to trim their sails to the wind. Anyway, Tian Hu was destined for defeat and heaven hid the truth from the Royal Brother-in-Law. He called Quan Yu in and presented him with robes, armour and a horse and gave him command of two thousand troops to go out and meet the enemy. Quan Yu thanked him and led his troops out of the city promising he would repulse the enemy and report victory when he returned. The Royal Brother-in-Law was delighted. Having rewarded Quan Yu he retired for the night, which passed uneventfully.
Next morning the Song troops had arrived and the Royal Brother-in-Law sent Quan Yu out with three thousand troops to engage them. From early morning till noon the attacks continued and Quan Yu put the Song commanders to flight with his stone throwing. He led his troops in a charge to occupy Mount Wuyin and Song Jiang's army were pushed right back and retreated to Goodborough. Quan Yu returned in triumph to the city and announced his success.
The Royal Brother-in-Law was tremendously pleased. "Now that you have this person," the Butler said to him, "and also Jade Arrowtip, there's no need to worry about how fierce the Song commanders are. How can we not prevail?" He also said: "Previously my mistress expressed a wish. She said she would only marry someone who could throw stones. This man is so valiant, he would not disgrace her."
The Butler persisted and finally the matrimonial union became a reality, settled and sealed irrevocably. The Royal Brother-in-Law having given his consent, the sixteenth of the third month was chosen as being an auspicious day, the appropriate ceremonies and feasting were laid on and Hotshot was welcomed into the family as son-in-law. There was music, singing and merriment that day, mountains of brocades and embroideries, meats and wine galore; it goes without saying that the bridal chamber was resplendent with lights. The best man conducted the ceremony. Side by side Hotshot and Jade Arrowtip dressed in their wedding finery did homage to the earth god and then to the Royal Brother-in-Law, her bogus father. Swelling music rose to heaven, rare perfumes tickled the senses. The couple made a solemn vow as they entered the bridal chamber. The Jade Arrowtip whom Hotshot observed in the light of the lamps was quite different from the one on the parade ground. There is a poem about this:

Her waist more flexible than branches of the willow on the belvedere.
Her gliding steps' allure
A thing more rich than men's ability to find a price for.
Now as she turns her head under the lamplight,
It's an immortal you see.
Floating among heaven's peaks.

From then on Hotshot and Jade Arrowtip were like fish and water, clasping each other close as lacquer or rubber, it goes without saying.
That night in bed Hotshot divulged to his bride his real name. He was in fact Hotshot Zhang Qing, a commander of the Song forces and Quan Ling the doctor was Doctor An, also of the Song army. Jade Arrowtip likewise recounted all her troubles. The sound of their voices went on all night. The plot was hatched in two days' time. The Royal Brother-in-Law was poisoned, General Xu Wei was inveigled into the palace for a secret meeting and also killed. The rest surrendered. Hotshot and Arrowtip ordered total secrecy in the city: anyone who betrayed the secret together with all his friends and family would be put to death. Any who opposed the uprising, military or civilian, would be liquidated. Thus the news was prevented from leaking out. Snake and Scorpion were released from prison and with Hotshot and the Butler took command of the four gates. Doctor An escorted by the Butler's men returned to Goodborough to inform Song Jiang. The Professor ordered Iron Ox and Pilgrim to take Magic Hand by night to see Hotshot and Jade Arrowtip in Xiangyuan, where he was to study samples of the Royal Brother-in-Law's handwriting and forge a letter telling Tian Hu how he, the Royal Brother-in-Law, had acquired a live-in son-in-law. The Butler was instructed to deliver this to Weisheng and see what happened. The Butler duly bade farewell and set off for Weisheng.
Back in Goodborough, after Magic Hand and Doctor An had left, Song Jiang heard that Hasty and the Spearsman had captured Lu. The messenger who reported the victory said: "When Hasty and his troops invested Lu, their commander barred the gates and refused battle. Spearsman and his men devised a plan: they stripped naked and taunted the defenders, working them up to such a pitch that they were desperate to fight and the commander had no alternative but to open the gates and attack. The northerners streamed out in all directions in a frenzy. Our men fought them and retreated at the same time, luring them on till they were scattered and far from the city. Then Tang Bin charged from the east and Spots from the west. Under pressure from both sides they could not get back and close the gates and Spots and Tang Bin fought their way inside and seized control. Spearsman ran the commander through with his lance and as for the others, some died and some fled. More than five thousand northerners were killed, three thousand war horses were taken and ten thousand troops captured alive. When Hasty and his party entered the city they reassured the people and sent off this report."
Song Jiang was delighted with the news. He composed a report for Commissioner Chen and recorded the exploits of Hasty and company and gave out rewards. He also wrote out a military order, requiring all units to return to base so they could launch a combined attack. The messenger returned to Lu.
In Weisheng the members of Tian Hu's military council kept getting reports of the Wizard and the Chancellor surrendering and Goodborough and Lu having fallen. Tian Hu had a shock when they informed him. As he was discussing with them what to do, it was reported that the aide to the commander of Xiangyuan, Butler Ye Qing had arrived with a letter from the Royal Brother-in-Law. Tian Hu had him shown in at once. Now this visit was to have important consequences. Weisheng would be razed to the ground and the robbers would gather there, a certain usurping prince would be taken alive.

The Monk is delivered from the well of karma; White-Water Dragon floods the town of Taiyuan

Now Tian Hu had received a letter delivered by Butler Ye Qing. He broke the seal and handed it to one of his officials who could read and had it read out to him. Here is what it said: "I, the Royal Brother-in-Law, have taken in a son-in-law named Quan Yu. This individual is extremely brave and has routed the Song army, forcing Song Jiang to retreat to Goodborough. I have today sent my daughter Jade Arrowtip with him to attack Goodborough. I venture to send my servant Ye Qing with this good news and as to the business of the marriage I beg Your Majesty to forgive my fault in arranging it without authorization."
After reading this Tian Hu looked somewhat relieved. He issued an order confirming Quan Yu in his status of royal son-in-law and sent the Butler back accompanied by two of his own officials with the order and also a gift of red patterned silk, brocades and silver for the new royal relative. The Butler took his leave and with his two companions set off for Xiangyuan.
Previous to this Magic Messenger on Song Jiang's orders had conveyed his military order to all districts and areas, before proceeding to Fenyang to find out how the Unicorn was faring. The new administrative officials had been arriving in the districts in a continuous stream. Accordingly the army commanders had been handing over the reins of government to them and reporting back to Goodborough in turn. First came the commanders of the Weizhou garrison, Scimitar and Twin Rods, together with Colonel Sun and his companions from Kettle Pass and Wen and Cui from Calf Mountain. When they had reported to Commissioner Chen and Song Jiang, it was announced that the water-borne chief White-Water Dragon and the rest of his commanders, having received intelligence of the fall of Lu, had sailed the fleet from the Wei via the Yellow River to Lu Water and were assembled there ready for action. Song Jiang ordered a celebration, at which there was much wine and excited talk. Next day he ordered Scimitar and company to Lu, with the boat commanders to back them up, and sent Hasty and company to attack two other towns behind enemy lines and stir things up in their rear. He wanted to waste no time, fearing that the enemy in desperation might surrender to the Jin.
In due course all the other garrison commanders handed over to the new civilian administration and returned to base with their troops. After greetings had been exchanged they heard how Colonel Hua had fought another engagement with the northern commander Shan Shiqi in which two thousand enemy troops were killed, the commander surrendered and the other officers fled. When they brought Shan Shiqi in there was wine to celebrate.
Song Jiang and the army now stayed put in Goodborough in order to reinforce the deception involving Hotshot and Jade Arrowtip and convince Tian Hu that he was too scared to venture forth. Of this no more.
The Unicorn had by now overcome Fenyang. Tian Bao as he fled had happened to meet up with Ma Ling's company. This Ma Ling was practised in magic. He could ride both on wind and fire and, like a good horse, a hundred mile journey meant nothing to him, a fact which had earned him the name of Magic Steed. He made expert use of a metal block, with which he could inflict terrible damage. It was also believed that in battle a magic eye would appear in the middle of his forehead, for which reason he was also know as God of Fire. He was second only to the Wizard in his magic powers. He had two lieutenants Wu Neng and Xu Jin, who had also acquired some of his arts. Magic Steed now joined forces with Tian Bao to form an army with eight other commanders and thirty thousand troops. They marched to a point a few miles north of Fenyang and made camp. The Song commanders judged it unwise to engage them there and retreated into Fenyang. Not only did they not dare attack the northern army; they were also concerned that the northerners might attack them.
As the Unicorn and his companions were considering their predicament, a guard from the east gate rushed in and reported that Song Jiang had sent Taoist Gongsun and the Wizard with ten thousand troops to their assistance. The Unicorn immediately had the gates opened to admit them. The Unicorn invited Taoist Gongsun to sit in the place of honour, with the Wizard next to him, and offered them wine. "The powers of this Magic Steed are prodigious," he told them. "He has already wounded Sergeant Lei, and half a dozen others. I am stuck here, helpless, and you've arrived in the nick of time."
The Wizard said: "I and my master, Taoist Gongsun, asked General Song to send us here to capture him." As he was speaking a guard rushed in and said that Magic Steed was attacking the east gate, his two lieutenants were at the west gate and Tian Bao with four others was at the north gate. Taoist Gongsun said: "I will make a sally from the east gate and deal with Magic Steed, the Wizard will go from the west gate and capture Wu Neng, while you attack from the north gate and take on Tian Bao."
The Unicorn ordered four others to assist the Wizard. Magic Messenger asked to join Taoist Gongsun because he had heard that Magic Steed could do magic walking. The Unicorn gave his consent. He also ordered River-Jumper and others to back up the Wizard. He himself with Thunderclap and company sallied forth from the north gate and attacked Tian Bao. Outside Fenyang waving banners veiled the sky to north, east and west that day as the battle raged.
We shall ignore for the moment the progress of the Wizard and the Unicorn and tell how Magic Steed's men, waving their banners, beating their drums and shouting taunts and challenges outside the city, saw the gates open, the drawbridge descend and the southern army pour out. They formed up in a line like a long snake. Magic Steed levelled his halberd and shouted out: "You rotten band of fucking losers, give us back our city at once. One moment's delay and you're done for!"
Golden Wings and Redeye rode forward and shouted back: "Your time has come, the day of your death is here!" Then they brandished spear and mace, slapped their horses and charged Magic Steed, who came to meet them. After more than ten bouts, Magic Steed got out his metal brick and took aim at Golden Wings. But Taoist Gongsun had already ridden forward and began to do magic with his sword. As Magic Steed raised his arm, Taoist Gongsun waved his sword and there was a sound like a clap of thunder: a red light burst out, and Taoist Gongsun's sword blazed with fire. Magic Steed's block fell to the ground, rolled about and melted. Taoist Gongsun had the true Taoist magic and in an instant the ranks of the southerners and their weapons were all blazing with light and had formed into a flaming crocodile, like a fire dragon. Magic Steed's metal magic was defeated by Taoist Gongsun's fire magic.
Taoist Gongsun now flourished his whisk and the whole army advanced together. The northerners suffered a huge defeat: smashed to bits, they were, turned inside out! Two thirds of the men were lost. Magic Steed fled for his life. It was lucky for him that he had his brand of magic walking, enabling him to run away eastward, borne on wind and fire. Magic Messenger who had already strapped on his amulets for magic walking gave chase, halberd in hand. But soon Magic Steed had done a dozen miles to Magic Messenger's ten and was out of sight. However, as he sped onward he came upon a fat monk who ran straight at him and knocked him down with a blow of his staff. Easily as one might drive a sheep the monk made Magic Steed captive.
As this monk was questioning his prisoner, Magic Messenger caught up with them. He took in what had happened and as he drew near he recognized the monk as Lu Zhishen the Flowery Monk, who had marched with the other army, Song Jiang's that is, on the eastern route. "However did you get here, Father?" he asked in amazement.
"Where is here?" Monk replied.
"We're east of Fenyang," Magic Messenger said. "This is the northern commander Magic Steed. There's just been a battle in which Taoist Gongsun broke his magic spells and I was chasing him. The bugger can certainly move! It's like a miracle from heaven that you were here to stop him."
Monk said with a grin: "Well, I'm no miracle from heaven. Actually I came out of the ground!"
Together they trussed Magic Steed up and with plain earth-bound steps made their way back to Fenyang. Magic Messenger asked Monk again where he had been and as they walked the latter explained: "The other day Tian Hu sent this fucking woman to attack outside Xiangyuan, near Goodborough. She was good at stone throwing and she wounded many of our commanders. I was at the front of a charge, intending to capture the bitch. I wasn't watching out and there was a concealed pit in amongst the undergrowth. I went right in with both feet and ended up sitting on the bottom. Fortunately I wasn't hurt. I looked around and found an opening on one side. When I explored this, a strange thing happened: I seemed to see the sky and the moon. There were farms and cottages and there were crowds of people, all busy at their work. When they saw me they laughed. I didn't stop to ask why; I just kept on going. Beyond the human habitations I came to a completely deserted area. Eventually I found a thatched hut. Coming from inside it was the tock-tock of the wooden fish. There was a monk in there just like myself, sitting cross-legged and reading the scriptures. I asked him the way and he answered with a smile: 'Where you come from is where you must come from, where you go is where you must go.' This didn't make much sense to me and I began to get annoyed. He just went on smiling and said: 'You know where you are.'
"'How the fuck should I know where I am?' I said.
"Again he said: 'At best you should think of combating evil; at the lowest level there is fear of hell. It is very big, the universe, it is vast, what mind can encompass it?' Then he went on: 'All men have a mind; where there is mind there is desire. Hell and heaven, all are born from desire. The three worlds therefore are nothing but mind, the ten thousand laws are but mental phenomena. If there is no desire, reincarnation ceases, the cycle of rebirth is broken.' When I heard his words I was enlightened. I gave a great shout of acclamation. Still smiling he said: 'You have entered the well of karma and it is hard for you to escape from illusion. I will direct you.' He led me out of the hut. We took but a few paces and then he said: 'Here we must part, but we will meet again!' Pointing to the way ahead he said: 'Proceed straight on and capture the magic steed.' When I turned round he was gone. There was a flash of light, and suddenly the scene changed. This man appeared. I saw him hesitating and I knocked him down with my staff. But I have no idea what I am doing here. Obviously the seasons are quite different here from Goodborough; the peaches and plums are in full leaf, no sign at all of any flowers."
Magic Messenger was amused. "Spring is over," he told him, "the peach and plum blossom has all fallen."
The Monk did not believe him. He protested: "It's not the end of the second month yet. It was only just now I fell down the well. I was there just a short time. How can spring be over?"
Magic Messenger found all this very puzzling. But soon with their captive they were back in Fenyang.
By this time Taoist Gongsun had completed his rout of the northern army and recalled his troops to the city. The Unicorn and his group had killed three of the enemy commanders and after pursuing Tian Bao and Duan Ren for several miles had scattered the northerners. Tian Bao and his remaining commanders took their defeated army north. The Unicorn withdrew with his forces to the city and met the Wizard and his company returning from their pursuit of Wu Neng and Xu Jin. The northerners had suffered defeat and heavy losses at the hands of the combined Song forces. Wu Neng had been knocked off his horse and killed by a blow from the White-Spotted Snake's sword and Xu Jin had been run through by Hound. Many horses were captured, together with a vast quantity of uniforms, armour, gongs, drums, saddles and bridles.
The Unicorn and the Wizard now combined their armies and made a triumphal entry into the city. Just after the Unicorn reached the government offices Monk and Magic Messenger arrived with their captive, Magic Steed. Delightedly the Unicorn asked Monk: "How did you get here? And what is the news of the Leader's campaign against the Royal Brother-in-Law?" Monk retold the story of his falling in the well and Song Jiang's battle with the Royal Brother-in-Law and all of the Unicorn's commanders marvelled at his account.
Then the Unicorn himself untied Magic Steed's bonds. Magic Steed had already heard what Monk said on the road and now seeing the Unicorn was so honourable he prostrated himself and indicated his will to surrender. The Unicorn rewarded the whole army. Next day the commanders left in charge of Jinning reported for duty to Fenyang, having been replaced by the new officials. The Unicorn sent Magic Messenger off to tell Song Jiang of the victory and held a discussion with his second-in-command the Strategist, about how to continue the campaign and so on.
Magic Steed meanwhile had passed on his method of rapid walking to Magic Messenger and they both reached Song Jiang's camp within a day to give a full report of the victory. When Song Jiang heard about the Monk he was as pleased as he was astonished. He went himself to report it all to Commissioner Chen. Of this no more.
Back now to Tian Bao and his lieutenants: creeping like curs kicked out of the house, darting like fish escaped from the net, they scurried into Weisheng. As Tian Bao, weeping, confessed his shameful dereliction, an official of the usurper's War Council rushed in and said: "For two days, Sire, we have been inundated with reports of defeat — of Magic Steed captured, of the troops of Scimitar and Twin Rods besieging this town, of the Unicorn having taken that town. Only from the Royal Brother-in-Law in Xiangyuan does there come the good news that the Song troops are too scared of him to attack."
Tian Hu was too devastated by the situation to take any decision. Some of his military and civil officials discussed things and proposed surrendering to the Jin to the north of them. But a deputy chief minister named Lucky Bian intervened, saying: "The southerners only have three armies. Weisheng is surrounded by mountains, we have supplies enough for men and livestock for two years. Your Majesty's crack guard number over twenty thousand. There are two towns east and west of us with fifty thousand troops in each. To our rear are four more cities strongly defended, with ample supplies to enable them to hold out for a good while. There is an old saying: 'Better face a crowing cock than a buffalo's backside.'"
Tian Hu was hesitating about what to say to this, when it was announced that Butler Ye Qing had arrived. When Tian Hu had him shown in, he prostrated himself and said: "The Princess and her consort, whose repeated successes have given them supremacy in the field, are attacking Goodborough. They were about to lay siege to the city, when the Royal Brother-in-Law fell sick and was unable to direct the operation. They beg Your Majesty to send a replacement commander and some picked troops to help them win Goodborough back."
Another of the usurper's officials, Superintendent Fan Quan, now stood up and said: "I have heard that the Princess and her consort are very brave. The Song army dare not face them. If Your Majesty would lend his own weight to this attack, supported by brave soldiers and intrepid commanders, it is certain to succeed. If you leave the young Prince to govern in your stead, I could assist him."
Tian Hu agreed to this proposal. In fact Fan Quan's daughter had been a stunning beauty and he had given her to Tian Hu who favoured her greatly. He had therefore no reason to mistrust Fan Quan's words. The latter had taken large bribes from the Butler, however. He also understood the strength of the Song army and had made up his mind to sell his country.

Tian Hu sent Lucky Bian with ten commanders and thirty thousand troops to oppose the Unicorn and Colonel Hua. He also ordered Marshal Fang Xuedu with a force of the same size to confront Scimitar and his troops. He himself with two of his ministers, two field-marshals and two generals was to lead an army of a hundred thousand picked troops. Sacrifices to flag and leaders were performed, oxen and horses slaughtered and the army rewarded. Another edict was promulgated appointing Tian Hu's younger brothers Tian Bao and Tian Biao with Fan Quan and a number of other officials, civil and military to advise Prince Tian Ding in governing the country.

When the Butler heard this he secretly sent someone he could trust to ride post haste to Xiangyuan and inform Hotshot and Jade Arrowtip. Hotshot sent Snake and Scorpion out of the city by means of a rope to inform Song Jiang, with orders to return at once.

Lucky Bian waited while his commission was made out and the troops selected. He wasted three days on this. Then with his commanders and thirty thousand troops he marched out of Weisheng's east gate. His force was in two divisions: the vanguard had three commanders and five thousand troops. They had reached a place called Mount Floss, where a forest ran along the foot of the mountain; the leading troops were just skirting the forest, when there was a sudden clamour of gongs and a squadron of cavalry burst out from behind the shoulder of the hill. What had happened was that on receiving the report from Hotshot, Song Jiang had told Colonel Hua and others to ride here at speed with a force of five thousand cavalry in light armour and with horse's bells removed. One of these commanders now rode to the front with a spear in either hand. This was the Song commander Twin Spears, leading exponent of the cavalry charge. He shouted out: "What troops are you? Surrender at once, what are you waiting for?"

One of the enemy shouted back angrily: "You swamp-dwelling outlaws! Why are you attacking our towns?"

Twin Spears replied: "We are the imperial army. Resistance is pointless!" Slapping his horse and levelling his two spears he charged and the enemy commander rode to meet him. After twenty bouts the northerner began to tire and could no longer parry effectively. Twin Spears ran him through the throat and he fell lifeless from his horse. His comrade, enraged, galloped at Twin Spears, but Colonel Hua rode out to cut him off. After more than ten bouts Colonel Hua turned away and his opponent gave chase. Colonel Hua took an arrow and fitted it to his bow. Twisting in the saddle he took aim and fired, hitting his enemy in the face. The helmet fell, the legs kicked in the air and the rider crashed to the ground. Colonel Hua turned and finished him off. Twin Spears and the others swept the enemy back, killing two more of their leaders. The northerners were defeated and the better part of five thousand men were killed, the rest fled. They captured many gongs, drums and horses and pursued the enemy a couple of miles until Lucky Bian's army arrived on the scene.

Now Lucky Bian was originally a farmer and the strength of a water buffalo was in his shoulders and arms. He was an experienced fighter and had been head of a robber band. The two armies met and faced each other, banners waving, bugles blaring and drums thundering. Lucky Bian rode in front of the northern forces, wearing a bronze winged helmet and fish-scale armour. He was a tall man, with a thick growth of whiskers surrounding his mouth, square-jawed, broad-shouldered, with straight eyebrows and round eyes. He rode a powerful charger and shouldered a mountain-splitter of an axe. He had four lieutenants on either side and other officers behind to protect him. His troops were drawn up in perfect order.

From the Song side the Tattooed Dragon rode out: "Who do you think you are?" he shouted. "Dismount at once and let us tie you up to avoid dirtying our weapons!"

Lucky Bian laughed scornfully. "Pitchers and jugs have ears, don't you have any? Do you mean to say you haven't heard of Lucky Bian?"

Tattooed Dragon replied: "You peasant! This is the imperial army, what chance do you think you have against us?" With that he slapped his horse, levelled his 3-pointed double-bladed weapon and charged Lucky Bian, who came to meet him whirling his axe. 2 horses met, 2 weapons were raised. Sword and axe clashed, horses' feet tangled. They fought more than thirty bouts but there was no victor.

Colonel Hua was so impressed by Lucky Bian's martial skills that he thought it dishonourable to use an arrow, impersonal as that is, so he slapped his horse, levelled his spear and joined the fray. Lucky Bian fought bravely with the two of them and still there was no victor. The northern leader feared their man might lose and sounded the gong for withdrawal. Since it was getting late and they were outnumbered, Colonel Hua and Twin Spears made no effort at pursuit. They withdrew to the south and the two armies camped about three or four miles apart. That evening a big wind got up from the south, thick clouds descended and at midnight a great rainstorm broke. Tian Hu by this time was more than thirty miles from Weisheng, with all his officials, commanders and troops. At nightfall they made camp. The camp-followers and concubines were in the tents and Tian Hu was relaxing with Fan Meiren, his concubine, in his tent. That was the night the rain came. The downpour continued five days without stopping. It was difficult for the soldiers to cook or even to stand on their feet. Above them heaven seemed continually weeping, below them was always the sound of water gurgling. Of this no more.

Meanwhile Hasty and others met up with Scimitar's party and the water-borne leaders and their boats and conferred. Leaving the Water General and the Fire General to defend Lu, Scimitar advanced with his army by land and water. He captured Yushe and left it in charge of Hasty and Spots. Then he pressed home his advantage, taking Dagu and killing the senior garrison commanders, whose subordinates surrendered in droves. He calmed the populace, rewarded his troops and sent a messenger to Song Jiang to report the victory. Next day Scimitar and his group also encountered the rain storm, which pinned them down in their camp. Suddenly it was reported that the Unicorn had left the Son-in-Law and others to settle Fenyang and attacked and taken two other towns where he left Victorious and the Supremo and the Kong brothers in charge respectively, and was now investing Taiyuan with the main army. But because of the rain he was unable to attack it. The White-Water Dragon chanced to hear this report and rushed to Scimitar to say: "This incessant rain that the Unicorn has run into means we can't afford to delay. What if the enemy should make a desperate sally from the city? But I have an idea. I'd like to go and discuss it with the Unicorn." Scimitar gave his consent. So the White-Water Dragon left, appointing the Tong Brothers, Cave Dragon and River Rider, to take charge of the boats in his absence. He took the Pilot, White Eel and the Ruan Brothers with him, and two thousand sailors. Wearing straw hats and wooden clogs they braved the storm and made their way with all speed to the Unicorn's camp. Despite the weather they talked for a long time. The Unicorn was excited, and ordered his men out to brave the elements and cut down trees and build rafts, while the White-Water Dragon and his party made their own preparations, of which we shall say nothing here. Now Tian Hu's officials in Taiyuan, garrison commander Zhang Xiong and his two subordinates were real monsters. These three were the cruellest among all the rebels. The soldiers under their command were wild and licentious and the people of the town, persecuted beyond their endurance, had abandoned homes and possessions and fled in all directions. Seventy or eight percent of them had left. Though surrounded, Zhang and his gang were still confident they could hold out. He and his pals reasoned as follows: with all this rain the Song army had no chance of plunder, they had no advantage by land or water, firewood was scarce, they would have no heart to make a long stay of it, a quick counter-attack would certainly bring victory. It was the beginning of the fourth month and Zhang Xiong was just about to attack out of all four gates when he suddenly heard the thunder of gongs on all sides. He hurriedly climbed the watchtower, whence he was able to observe the Song army struggling through the rain in clogs, clambering onto the high ground. Whilst he was wondering what this meant, he heard a thunderous roar from the Zhibo Drain and from east and west of the town: it was as if thousands of men and millions of horses were charging. A moment later a huge wave swept down on them, a raging torrent, like the great neap tides of September or the floods when the waters of the Yellow River spill over. Truly they had no more chance than three planks put there to shore up a collapsing dyke or a couple of sandbags that are meant to stem a river in spate.

Hotshot & Arrowtip work in tandem; Song Jiang & the Commissioner jointly announce victory

So White-Water Dragon working in concert with the Pilot, White Eel and the Ruan brothers and all their company of sailors had taken advantage of the deluge and the surging waters to flood Taiyuan by breaching the Zhibo Drain and Jin Water. Instantly the water came boiling out:

The water gushes forth, a great wave rears up. Soldiers ride in on planks and rafts, commanders advance on the flying flood. Gods howl, ghosts weep, the day is plunged in sightless murk. Peaks shake, mountains crumble, the vast wave roars like an angry beast. City walls come tumbling down, there's no more shelter anywhere. Banners vanish on the tide, their green and red tangled with the soldiers' spears. Frothing and foaming, the rushing waters have gone berserk. Corpses wallow like fish or turtles, hot blood bubbles through the waves. In a moment trees are uprooted, in an instant rafters are hobnobbing with the waters.

A tremendous hubbub arose in the city. When they saw the water rushing towards them soldiers and civilians clambered onto walls and rooftops or clung to planks and beams. The weak, the elderly, the obese could only climb onto chairs and tables. But moments later even benches and tables were swept away as houses collapsed and they all went to join the fishes and the turtles. White-Water Dragon, the Pilot and White Eel and the Ruan brothers rode the floodwaters towards the city and fetched up on a level with the city wall. Their men leapt out onto it, cutlasses in hand, and began killing the guards. Other troops attacked on rafts.

Under this onslaught resistance could only crumble. Up on the watchtower the commander, Zhang Xiong, cursed his luck ceaselessly as he watched the two brothers, Pilot and White Eel, halberd in hand, leap with a shout from their craft, land on the walls and race up the tower. They slaughtered a dozen guards in quick succession. The rest fled in confusion. There was no escape for Zhang Xiong. The Pilot knocked him down with a blow of his halberd, while White Eel rushed forward and struck off his head with a loud crunch.

By the time the waters began to recede, countless numbers of soldiers and inhabitants were dead, either drowned or killed in the fighting. The south wall was left encumbered by beams, pillars, leaves of doors, window handles and the like, and floating corpses. The only building still standing in the city was the summer palace built by Emperor Shenwu of the Northern Qi dynasty, which had very solid foundations. Those who were near it rushed up the steps in a jostling, trampling crowd. More than two thousand people died, and even on that eminence and on the city walls the survivors numbered only about one thousand. Outside the city the Unicorn had secretly warned the people in advance that when a gong was struck they were all to go up onto the high ground. Moreover outside the city there was more open space, so the waters dispersed faster and the people did not drown.

The west gate was seized by White-Water Dragon and his sailors, the north by the Pilot and White Eel, the east by Ruan the Second and Ruan the Fifth, and the south by Ruan the Seventh. So the Song flag now flew over all four gates. In the evening when the water receded and the land was revealed again, White-Water Dragon threw open the gates and invited the Unicorn in. No cock crowed, no dog barked inside the city and the corpses were heaped in mounds. Although the wickedness of Zhang Xiong and his cronies was manifest, White-Water Dragon's treatment of them was exceedingly cruel. Thousands knelt everywhere in the mud and water, kowtowing like people offering candles at the temple, and begging for mercy. After examining them the Unicorn found that only a dozen or so were soldiers, the rest were just ordinary people. Two of the commanders had climbed into the branches of a tree next to a building behind the government offices. When they saw the waters receding they crept down but were captured and taken before the Unicorn. He ordered them to be executed and the corpses displayed. He had the money in the treasury distributed to relieve the common people who had suffered from the floods inside and outside the city. He sent a messenger to Song Jiang to report the victory, ordered his troops to bury the dead and repair the walls and buildings and commanded the people to stay in their homes.

We shall say no more about how the Unicorn settled Taiyuan, but return to the time before the city's fall when Tian Hu with an army of a hundred thousand was forced by the rain to halt and make camp south of Brass Key Mountain. His scouts reported that the Royal Brother-in-Law was dead and that the Princess and her consort had retreated to Xiangyuan to bury him. Shocked by this news, Tian Hu sent a messenger to Xiangyuan with orders for Jade Arrowtip to fortify the city strongly and for her consort Quan Yu to report to him for duty. He also wanted to know why the people he had sent to Xiangyuan had not reported back.

Next day the rain had ceased and at dawn despatch riders came in with news that Song Jiang was sending the Chancellor and Magic Steed with troops against them. This report threw Tian Hu into a passion: "Those two received the highest favours from me," he ranted. "Now they turn traitor! It is not to be endured! I shall have to go and have a word with them myself! The rest of you must spare no effort. Anyone who captures them will be richly rewarded with gold and honours."

The army advanced under Tian Hu's personal command and encountered the Song forces. From the enemy's banners the northerners could see that the commanders they faced were Colonel Sun and the Flautist. At the front of the northern army were massed soldiers with clubs, axes, swords and lances; amid the paired banners, under a yellow ochre umbrella with a nine-coiled flying dragon, seated on a silver-maned white horse with jade trappings and gold saddle, was the great rebel prince Tian Hu, personally directing the engagement. From the rear of the southern ranks now came Song Jiang who was also personally in command, with the Professor and others at his heels.

When Tian Hu heard Song Jiang was there he wanted to start the battle at once and capture Song Jiang. But just then a messenger arrived to say: "Scimitar and his forces have taken two more cities and in the west the Unicorn has also taken two more. They have flooded Taiyuan and no one is left alive there. Deputy chief minister Lucky Bian was halted at Mount Floss by Colonel Hua and others, while the Unicorn came up from Taiyuan to attack from the rear. Lucky Bian could not hold out against this attack from two sides and was defeated and captured by the Unicorn. The Unicorn has now joined forces with Scimitar and they are surrounding Qinyuan and have it in an iron grip."

One of Tian Hu's ministers, Li Tianxi, held the position while the other four retreated with him. But then a report sounded from Brass Key Mountain and Monk with four others and a picked force of infantry secretly deployed there by Song Jiang began to advance in two columns. Tian Hu hurriedly ordered his royal guard into action but they were immediately met by Magic Steed and the Chancellor, coming in on their flank from the east. Magic Steed bestriding wind and fire attacked the northerners with his metal block, while the Chancellor cut and thrust with his two swords. They went through the northerners' ranks as if there were no one there, slicing the army in two. The Professor had used his forces so cleverly that although there were a hundred thousand of the northerners they made mincemeat of them, scattering them to the four winds and inflicting a massive defeat. As minister Li Tianxi and the others fled east with Tian Hu in their midst they found themselves opposed by Monk and his company with their stout staves and the shield bearers with their javelins and knives, who cut a bloody swathe through the enemy troops, scattering their commanders and forcing them to flee west. Although Tian Hu had the pick of the royal guard under his command, now they had to face the imperial army they found they had never met such fierce opponents. How could they be expected to put up a fight?

Only a few of Tian Hu's staff now remained — two commanders, one official and the chief of police, with about five thousand demoralized troops. Clustering around him they retreated.

Then, when the danger was already extreme, another body of cavalry charged in from the east. When Tian Hu saw them he raised his eyes to heaven and said with a sigh: "Now it's the end!" The leader of this troop was a bold young commander wearing a blue turban and green uniform and grasping a wooden lance, seated on a tall charger with a white curling mane. On his standard it said clearly: "Quan Yu, Leader of the Campaign against the Southerners". The Butler who was following close behind Tian Hu saw this banner and explained it to the King. Tian Hu immediately sent word to the Princess's consort, for that is who it was, that his help was needed. The Royal Consort came forward, dismounted, knelt and said: "Sire, I am in full armour and I cannot make proper obeisance. I deserve to die for such disrespect."

Tian Hu said: "That is no fault, my dear friend."

"The situation here is desperate," the Consort said. "I beg Your Majesty to take refuge in Xiangyuan. When the Princess and I have repelled the enemy, we will invite you to return to the palace in Weisheng and devise a plan to return things to their former glory."

Tian Hu was well pleased with this. He gave the orders and they set off for Xiangyuan, the Consort taking up the rear to guard against attacks from pursuers. As they reached the city a hubbub arose behind them. When the guards saw who it was they quickly opened the gates and lowered the drawbridge. As one of Tian Hu's commanders led the troops forward, the soldiers heard pursuit behind and there was a rush to get into the city in which no respect at all was paid to the King. As soon as they were inside there was a loud report and on either side the concealed troops sprang forward forcing the northern commander and his men into some concealed pits, where they were indiscriminately massacred with long spears. Less than half of the unfortunate three thousand men survived. A cry went up: "We want Tian Hu alive!" Realizing the city had turned and it was all a trap, Tian Hu hurriedly reined in his horse and fled north. The Consort, alias Hotshot of course, and the Butler gave chase. But Tian Hu's horse was swift and they couldn't catch him. When he was already a bowshot ahead a gust of wind suddenly arose in front of his horse and a girl appeared and called out: "Tian Hu you swine, you killed my family, where do you think you can run to?" Then from where she stood another gust of fateful wind caught him head-on, and next thing she was gone. Tian Hu's startled horse shied and whinnied and he was thrown to the ground. Hotshot and the Butler now caught up. Leaping from their horses they pressed forward with their men and made him prisoner.

One of Tian Hu's last remaining guards commanders charged to the rescue, but Hotshot hurriedly remounted, grasped a stone and let fly, hitting the northerner square in the face and knocking him from his horse. "I'm no bloody Prince Consort," he roared. "I'm Hotshot, a warrior in the Song army under General Song Jiang."

Simultaneously Iron Ox and Pilgrim charged out of the city at the head of five hundred infantry, scattering the Palace guards and the police superintendent's two thousand men like chaff. After dispatching the guard commander, Hotshot tied Tian Hu up and drove him back into the city. The gates were then locked, and orders given that they were not to be opened again until Song Jiang had destroyed all the northern forces and Tian Hu could be handed over.

Monk now came on the scene. When he saw Tian Hu had already been taken, he and his followers turned west again and continued to harry the enemy till they reached the foot of Brass Key Mountain. The time was now around five o'clock.

Song Jiang had fought the northerners all day and killed more than twenty thousand of them. Leaderless now they fled in all directions. Fan Meiren, Tian Hu's concubine, and the other female attendants were all killed by the soldiery. Four of the commanders including minister Li Tianxi and thirty thousand troops were holed up on Brass Key Mountain, where Song Jiang had them surrounded. When Monk came to report that Hotshot had captured Tian Hu, Song Jiang clasped his hands together in joy and immediately sent an urgent dispatch to Xiangyuan instructing Pilgrim and company to make sure the gates were securely bolted and keep Tian Hu under the closest guard. He also ordered Hotshot off to Weisheng to assist Jade Arrowtip.

Now Jade Arrowtip had received secret instructions from the Professor and was lying in wait on the slopes of Mount Shipan outside Wuxiang, with Snake and Scorpion and six others and five thousand cavalry all in northern uniforms and insignia. When they received news that the battle with Tian Hu had begun, they marched with all speed to Weisheng. That evening, at sunset, with a crescent moon hanging in the sky, Jade Arrowtip approached the city walls and sang out sweetly: "It's the Princess. I'm escorting the Prince. Open up, quick!" The guards rushed to the palace to report. The brothers Tian Bao and Tian Biao mounted and galloped to the southern ramparts. They raced up to the top of the gate tower to look: there was the yellow ochre umbrella, and beneath it, seated on his lively grey with the embossed saddle, the Prince. In front of him stood a young woman warrior, with "The Princess Jade Arrowtip" in large characters on her standard. Behind was a long train of ministers and officials stretching into the distance. In ringing tones Jade Arrowtip called out: "We have been defeated by the Song army. I have rescued the Prince and brought him here. Come out to receive him at once!"

Having seen the Prince, they opened the gates and went out. As they halted before his horse, the Prince shouted out: "Seize those two villains for me!" His officers leapt forward and arrested them.

"But we are guiltless!" they cried, struggling to free themselves. But the officers bound them. In fact this "Prince" was the Professor's invention: he had the Chancellor select from the ranks of the southern army a soldier who resembled the Prince, and dress him up as Tian Hu. The ministers and officials behind were Snake and Scorpion and their men in disguise. Now they all drew their swords, while Fleetfoot and some others with five hundred men marched Tian Bao and Tian Biao off to Xiangyuan. When those in the city saw their leaders arrested and marched away southward, they realized it was a plot. But they were prevented from charging out of the city and attacking because Arrowtip, determined to get the young Prince Regent, Tian Ding, boldly forced her way in with Snake and Scorpion. The first of the guard commanders to oppose her was knocked over by one of her stones. Six or seven of them suffered the same fate, while Snake and Scorpion fought alongside her. Outside the city Lungs and Yellow Dog ordered their men to remove the northern insignia and show themselves in their true colours, and then joined in the attack and seized the south gate. After scattering the northern resistance they raised the Song flag.

The city was in tumult. A number of the usurper's officers and ministers together with some of the royal family led a counter-attack. Jade Arrowtip and her four thousand had penetrated deep into the dragon's lair by now and were seriously exposed. But Hotshot arrived with eight thousand men and seeing Jade Arrowtip, Snake and Scorpion engaged in a desperate struggle attacked with his stones, putting out four northern commanders in quick succession and beating back their forces. "Don't go any further: we're too isolated," he told Jade Arrowtip.

"I've got to avenge my father," she replied. "They can tear me limb from limb, but I won't leave off!"

"I've captured Tian Hu already," Hotshot replied. "He's being held in Xiangyuan."

Only then was she satisfied.

They were about to retreat from the city when something happened that was truly a judgement of heaven on wrongdoers. The Unicorn arrived, having taken Qinyuan. Seeing the flag on the gate, he marched his army straight into the city and joined Hotshot in the attack. Thunderclap and his companions took the east gate, Golden Wings and some others the west gate, the Tamer and his men the north gate. Morbid and Madcap and others with the infantry hacked their way with swords and axes into the royal palace. Another group of infantry commanders entered through the back gate. Of the wives and concubines and the royal entourage countless numbers were killed. The Prince Regent, when he heard what was happening, killed himself. All the Song commanders on the spot now joined in the slaughter of the usurper's ministers and officials, his family members, and all the rest of the gang. For indeed:

On palace steps the bodies lie;
The blood streams out through royal gates.
War takes no account of low or high:
The soul its own outcome dictates.

The Song troops went on killing in Weisheng till the corpses littered the streets and blood ran in the gutters. Finally the Unicorn gave out an order that no one was to harm the people and sent someone to tell Song Jiang the news. Only near dawn did the fighting cease. Many enemy commanders surrendered.

At daybreak the Unicorn had a roll call taken. Leaving aside the Strategist, who had remained in charge of the garrison at Qinyuan, all his commanders had come through the battle unscathed. The only casualty was Geng Gong, the enemy commander who had come over to them previously — he was trampled to death in the mêlée. When the leaders came to report their successes, Nameless brought in the corpse of the Prince Regent. Snarling with hatred, Jade Arrowtip drew her sword and hacked off the head and dismembered the body. The Royal Brother-in-Law's wife was already dead but Arrowtip wanted to find Mrs. Ye, the Butler's wife, who had brought her up, so she took leave of the Unicorn and went with Hotshot to Xiangyuan to take Tian Hu to Song Jiang's camp. The Unicorn was just settling some military matters when a scout reported that Fang Xuedu had Hasty and Spots bottled up in Yushe. The Unicorn sent Scimitar and some others to rescue them.

Next day Song Jiang overcame minister Li Tianxi on Brass Key Mountain and sent someone with a report to Commissioner Chen: "The rebel's stronghold has been taken and the leader captured alive. Please come to Weisheng and take command." When Song Jiang arrived outside Weisheng with the main army, the Unicorn and his men went out to welcome him. Song Jiang issued a proclamation to calm the people. The Unicorn brought the prisoner Lucky Bian to him. Song Jiang was so impressed by his manly bearing that he loosed his bonds with his own hands and treated him courteously. Seeing Song Jiang was so honourable Lucky Bian was filled with gratitude and surrendered. Next day Jade Arrowtip, Hotshot and the Butler brought the three Tian brothers in prison carts and handed them over. Arrowtip and Hotshot paid their respects to Song Jiang side by side. Arrowtip apologized to Short-Arse and the others for the offence she had done them. Song Jiang ordered Tian Hu and his brothers to be locked up together until such time as the army withdrew, when they would take them to the Eastern Capital and hand them over. He ordered wine to be served in honour of Jade Arrowtip and Hotshot.

That same day the enemy commander of Wuxiang surrendered to them with all the personnel, military and civilian, under his command, handing over all the records and supplies. After recompensing him, Song Jiang reappointed him. When Song Jiang had been two days in Weisheng, scouts reported that Scimitar and his party had reached Yushe and together with Hasty and Spots caught the northern commander Fang Xuedu between two fires and killed him, as well as five thousand of his men. The rest had surrendered. Song Jiang said to them all delightedly: "Thanks to the efforts of all of you, we have successfully put down the uprising." Everyone's exploits were faithfully recorded as was Jade Arrowtip's and Hotshot's part in capturing the leader and attacking the rebel stronghold. After three or four days Scimitar returned and the arrival of Commissioner Chen was announced.

Song Jiang marched out of town with all his commanders to welcome the Commissioner, who praised him saying: "In only five months you have performed wonders. I hear that you have captured the rebel leader. I am forwarding the report of your victory to the capital immediately. The court is sure to reward you with high honours." Song Jiang thanked him again.

Next day Jade Arrowtip came to make a request. She wanted to go to Stonehouse Mountain in Taiyuan to find her mother's body and give it burial. Song Jiang told Hotshot and the Butler to accompany her.

Song Jiang asked the Commissioner to burn down Tian Hu's palace with all its ostentatious halls and luxurious apartments. He also proposed that the contents of the government granaries should be given out to assist the many whose homes had been burnt down by the soldiery. He then drafted a report for Marshal Su to present to the court and sent Magic Messenger off with it immediately.

Bearing this report, Magic Messenger caught up with the man sent by the Commissioner and they entered the Eastern Capital together. They went first to Marshal Su's palace and handed the report to Yang, his chamberlain. Marshal Su was delighted and next morning at the dawn court read out the Commissioner's report to the Emperor. His Majesty openly showed his pleasure and gave orders for Song Jiang and the others to make all necessary provisions and then march the army back to the capital, where high honours awaited them. With this news Magic Messenger set off again the same day, after bidding Marshal Su farewell. Shortly after noon next day he reached Weisheng and reported to the Commissioner and Song Jiang. These two ordered all members off the puppet government who had been captured alive, with the exception of the Tian Hu and his brothers who were to be sent separately to the capital, to be taken to the execution ground and beheaded.

A few villages in Jinning had remained uncaptured. Half of the rebels' henchmen and lackeys in these places disappeared when they heard that Tian Hu was taken, the rest gave themselves up. The Commissioner spared them all, reinstating them as loyal subjects. He had notices posted everywhere to calm and reassure the people. Others who had worked for the rebels but done nobody any harm and surrendered voluntarily were told to go back to their villages and take up their normal agricultural occupations. The work of pacification complete, garrisons were posted to protect the boundaries and maintain the peace. Of this no more.

The Emperor issued an edict and sent a special envoy to Hebei to deliver it. After that a full meeting of the Military Academy was called, which the Emperor was to attend, and the Grand Preceptor spoke beforehand on military affairs and they listened respectfully. But there was one official there who sat staring at a corner of the room and paid him no attention. The Grand Preceptor was highly indignant and demanded to know the man's name. It was indeed a case of "One person left out means trouble for all". For after the Grand Preceptor asked this man's name:

Heavenly stars and earth stars will spread their wings;
Brave leaders and fierce troops pacify Hubei.

The theft of a burial plot leads on to rebellion; A stroll on a fine spring day provokes dalliance

After some inquiries, the Grand Preceptor learnt that this official who had ignored his discourse on tactics, pointedly fixing his gaze on a corner of the room, was called Luo and was from a military family of Yunnan and a graduate of the Academy. But when the Grand Preceptor's indignation was on the point of exploding, the Emperor was announced. He was obliged to shelve the matter and lead the members out to welcome His Majesty. They escorted the Emperor inside and performed the ceremony of obeisance.

Well, after the Emperor had spoken of military affairs, this Luo, before the Grand Preceptor can even open his mouth, jumps up and launches into the following tirade: "As a humble member of Your Majesty's military academy I know I am risking my life by this, but I must speak to Your Majesty of the dangers of the bandit Wang Qing's insurrection west of the river Huai. The turmoil Wang Qing is provoking beyond the Huai has been going on for five years now and the government forces have proved incapable of ending it. Marshal Tong Guan and Cai the Younger, the Grand Preceptor's son, were entrusted with the campaign against these rebels but their whole army disappeared. They tried to cover up by lying to Your Majesty. They said they had ordered a ceasefire because the climate was unfavourable to the troops. They even said the army was affected by some epidemic. Meanwhile Wang Qing's viciousness grows ever more unbridled. Last month he defeated the forces of my home state of Yunnan. What do we see? Plunder and rapine, licentiousness, horrors that scarce bear repeating. Eight military commands have been seized and eighty-six districts. The Grand Preceptor is supposed to be the chief prop of your reign, yet his own son suffered ignominious defeat and betrayed the country's trust in him. Before Your Majesty entered just now he was trying to lecture us on military matters. This is presumption beyond endurance, this is madness, this is insanity. I beseech Your Majesty to reprimand the Grand Preceptor and his cronies, the whole pack of corrupt, cheating officials, and appoint commanders and an army to put down the rebels as soon as possible, in order to save the people from their devastation, in the interests of good government and for the people's welfare. The whole world will rejoice!"

The Emperor was moved to anger by what he heard and severely reprimanded the Grand Preceptor and the rest for the cover-up, but the latter, with their glib tongues, talked him round and he finally retired to the palace without having imposed any sanctions. Next day the governor of Bozhou, Hou Meng, arrived in the capital on official business and also gave a frank account of how Tong Guan and Cai the Younger had failed in their duty and disgraced their country. At the same time he extolled Song Jiang's strategic skill and multiple achievements, pointing out how he and his men had subdued the Tartars and settled Hebei and were now ready to withdraw and make a triumphant return to the capital. Now that Wang Qing was on the rampage, the Governor begged His Majesty to order Song Jiang's company first of all be given due honours and then sent beyond the river Huai where they would undoubtedly achieve great results. The Emperor gave his consent and the order was sent to the Military Council to bestow appropriate ranks on Song Jiang and his commanders.

The Grand Preceptor and his colleagues discussed the matter and made the following recommendation: "Wang Qing has taken Wanzhou. Recently three more districts, all close to the capital, have asked for help. We request Your Majesty to order Commissioner Chen and General Song Jiang not to return to the capital but to move their army rapidly to Yuzhou. We will appoint Marshal Hou Meng as Commander-in-Chief of this expeditionary force. Academician Luo too is a skilled tactician so we will send him along as well to serve in Commissioner Chen's force. Song Jiang and his followers will be fully occupied putting down the rebellion, there is no need to give them official rank until they have successfully dealt with the situation beyond the river Huai. It will be time enough then for celebrations and honours."

Of course the Grand Preceptor knew this Wang Qing was a force to be reckoned with, he had discussed it all with Marshals Tong and Yang and Gao the Ball. He knew what he was doing sending Hou Meng and Luo to Commissioner Chen. He was hoping Song Jiang and company would get themselves defeated — and if Hou and Luo should pass on as well, who cares? Would it not be killing two birds with one stone?

But enough of this. Suffice it to say that the Emperor consented to all the schemes of these four villains: the orders were written out, Marshal Hou and Academician Luo were instructed to leave immediately for Hebei and deliver them to Song Jiang and company, together with a reward of gold and silver, bales of silk, robes, armour, horses, imperial wine and suchlike. The new officials who were to fill all the vacant posts in the province were ordered to proceed there at once and take up their duties by a given date. This business concluded, the Emperor was carried off again by his friends Wang Fu and Cai the Younger to the Model Mountain Pleasure House.

Marshal Hou Meng led his party off on the road north with the Emperor's edict and the thirty-five carts fully loaded with the bounty for Song Jiang and his commanders. Nothing occurred on the journey and without losing any time they crossed Kettle Pass and Goodborough and were soon approaching Weisheng. Five or six miles from the city they ran into the Song detachment escorting the captive rebel leaders. The fact was that Song Jiang had received the order to withdraw just as Jade Arrowtip returned from burying her mother. He wrote a detailed report of events for the court, including an account of Jade Arrowtip's integrity and honour, her exploits in capturing the rebel leader, the surrender and return to the Emperor's service of the Wizard, the Chancellor and the rest and the good service they had done. He then sent Hotshot, Jade Arrowtip and the Butler off in advance with the captive rebels.

Hotshot, who was in the lead, first met Marshal Hou Meng and Academician Luo. When they had told him of their mission he sent a messenger back to inform Commissioner Chen and Song Jiang, who rode out to meet the imperial envoys. The embassy bearing the imperial edict entered the city and a special altar was set up to burn incense. Song Jiang and the Commissioner with all their commanders lined up in orderly ranks knelt with their faces to the north whilst Sterling called out the acclamation. Marshal Hou Meng facing south stood on the left of the imperial altar and read out the proclamation:

Hear our will: In accordance with the respect due to heaven and to the ancestors, in administering this great kingdom I have inherited, I am compelled to request the services of great men in the furtherance of affairs of state. Recently there have been many alarms on the frontier and disturbances in the country at large. General Song Jiang and his men, traversing much rough terrain and many dangerous regions, have successfully performed the task of pacification, secured the payment of tribute by the rebels and shown themselves to be fully worthy of our trust. I now send Marshal Hou bearing my edict, to reward Commissioner Chen, Song Jiang, the Unicorn and the rest with gold and silver, robes, horses, armour, imperial wine and the like in recognition of their services. But now once more, by reason of the insurgency of the bandit Wang Qing west of the river Huai, order is disturbed, injury inflicted on my people, my lands invaded and my western capital in tumult, and I must call again on the services of Commissioner Chen as civil governor, Song Jiang as Commander of the Pacification Expedition, the Unicorn as his deputy, with Marshal Hou Meng as Commander-in-Chief of the Expedition. On receipt of this edict, they are to lead the army out and march with all despatch to the relief of Wanzhou. If they work diligently to subdue the rebels and restore peace we guarantee that the army will be amply rewarded. Commissioner Chen will be instructed to draw on the rich treasury of Hebei and make out an official register and everyone can count on our favour. This is our decree.

Afterwards they gave three cheers for the Emperor and prostrated themselves again in thanks. Then the Marshal brought out the reward. Names were called out in due order and each received his portion. The Commissioner, Song Jiang and the Unicorn each got five hundred catties of pure gold, ten bales of silk brocade and a set of robes, a horse and two bottles of imperial wine. The Professor and the other thirty-four principal leaders got two hundred catties of silver, four bales of coloured silk and a bottle of imperial wine. The Strategist and the rest of the seventy-two secondary leaders got a hundred catties of silver and a bottle of imperial wine. The rest of the gold and silver the Commissioner had distributed among the men. When this was all done, Song Jiang repeated his orders to Hotshot, Jade Arrowtip and the Butler to proceed to the capital with the captives. Taoist Gongsun came and requested Song Jiang to set up five images in the Temple of the Dragon Lord on Five Dragon Mountain. Song Jiang agreed and sent craftsmen to carry out the work.

Song Jiang sent Magic Messenger and the Magic Steed to tell every garrison commander to muster his troops as soon as the new officials arrived to replace them and rejoin the main army for the campaign against Wang Qing. He spent several days making his own preparations, and by this time the new officials had all arrived at post and the garrison commanders and their troops were coming back one after the other. After handing out their rewards to them, Song Jiang told Hand and Craftsman to engrave a tablet commemorating all these things. At midday on the fifth day of the fifth month he told his brother Iron Fan to arrange a feast to celebrate the peace, with Commissioner Chen presiding and all the new civilian governors, together with Marshal Hou and Academician Luo and all the assistant magistrates and other officials according to their rank, and his own company of one hundred and seven commanders (Hotshot being absent in the capital), as well as the Hebei leaders who surrendered, viz, the Wizard, the Chancellor, Lucky Bian and others, a total of seventeen, all seated in two orderly rows. During the banquet, the Com-missioner, Hou and Luo praised the achievements of Song Jiang and his men. Song Jiang and the Professor thanked them. Conversation was about the court or about matters dear to their hearts, candles and torches burned brightly, and the party did not break up till after midnight.

Next day Song Jiang and the Professor conferred and organized their forces. They bade farewell to the other officials and with the Commissioner set off southward. They caused absolutely no trouble in the places they passed through, where the people lined their route with incense, candles and flowers and thanked them for having put down the bandits, and made it possible for them to enjoy heaven's mercy again.

We shall now leave Song Jiang to his southern campaign and turn to Hotshot who with Jade Arrowtip, the Butler and the prisoners confined in their carts had reached the capital. First he delivered Song Jiang's missive to Marshal Su with the money and presents. Marshal Su conveyed this to the Emperor, who was full of praise for Jade Arrowtip's virtue and filial piety and gave orders for a posthumous title to be conferred on her mother and a shrine dedicated to her in the local temple to celebrate her exemplary constancy, with offerings made in spring and autumn. Jade Arrowtip was also awarded a title, and Hotshot was promoted and a reward of fifty taels of pure silver was bestowed on them. Hotshot also got back his old post.

The three of them were commanded to go back and join Song Jiang in the march westward beyond the Huai and bid for further glory. The Emperor gave the order for the rebel King and his brothers to be taken to the execution ground and put to death by slow cuts. Jade Arrowtip handed small images of her parents to the executioner and asked him to hang them up at the execution and place an altar before them. At three minutes past midday when Tian Hu had been cut to pieces she laid the remains on the altar, offered the blood as a libation to the spirits of her mother and father and wept noisily. News of Jade Arrowtip's activities had spread and a crowd had turned out to watch. She wept so bitterly that there were none that were not moved to tears. After-wards with Hotshot and the Butler she gave thanks, kowtowing towards the capital. Then they set off for Wanzhou to join Song Jiang in the campaign against Wang Qing. Of this no more.

Now you must try to store this in your memory, friends, because here comes a digression about Wang Qing's life, from childhood to the time of his growing up, in order that all shall be clearly known. Wang Qing had been a humble police sergeant in the Kaifeng district of the capital. His father was a rich man of the capital addicted to litigation, who would stir up trouble and then sue, commit an outrage and bring trouble down on his own head, and set traps for honest citizens. For this reason people gave him a wide berth. On the word of a fengshui expert, he coveted a certain piece of land which was supposed to ensure him an illustrious son. This plot was the burial ground of a family to whom he was related. With the help of the fengshui merchant he plotted their downfall. He got his way forcibly by trumping up charges against the family and bribing the officials. The family lost their patrimony and, powerless to defend themselves against him, they left the capital and went to reside far away. Later after the rebellion, when all Wang Qing's clan were exterminated, this family alone were allowed to survive because it was found that Wang Qing's father had ruined them. After he had taken over the coveted plot and buried his own father and mother there, his wife was delivered of a son in the last month of the year. He dreamt that a tiger entered the house and squatted down west of the hall, but was driven out by a lion. When he woke up, Wang Qing was born.

From his earliest days Wang Qing was profligate. At sixteen he became very strong. He wouldn't study but spent his time at cockfights and the horses, or practising with spear and staff. He being an only son his parents loved him dearly and of course spoiled him. No wonder they had no control over him when he grew up! All he did was gamble, sleep with prostitutes and drink. When they admonished him he would blow up and swear at them, nothing they could do would stop him, he had to have his own way. After six or seven years the family fortune was exhausted and on the strength of his ability he got taken on as a sergeant in the constabulary. As soon as he had some money in his hand he was everyone's friend and would spend freely on food and drink. When hard times returned he would resort to his fists and look for a fight. People regarded him therefore with a mixture of fear and admiration.

One day, then, Wang Qing went to attend the roll call, and when it was over went to stroll south of the city in the Jade Ford Gardens. It was the sixth year of Huizong's reign, a beautiful late spring day. There were swarms of people strolling about and hordes of cavalry:

Flowers in the gardens, girls on the embankment;
Cavaliers a-canter, sweetness of fresh grass.

Wang Qing wandered about by himself for a while and then went and leant against a weeping willow that stood beside a lake in the garden, waiting for an acquaintance to turn up so they could go and have a few drinks together. Before long he saw on the north shore of the lake a group of a dozen or so young stewards or the like, gathered about a sedan chair inside which sat a young woman beautiful as a flower bud. She wanted to look at the scenery and she had dispensed with the bamboo screen. Wang Qing was a great admirer of feminine beauty and the sight of such a splendid girl had him with his tongue hanging out. He recognized that group of stewards as belonging to the household of Marshal Tong. He followed at a distance until they reached the Model Mountain which was in the northeast district of the capital. Here the Emperor Daojun had contrived an artificial landscape of dramatic peaks and weird stones, ancient trees and rare birds, innumerable pavilions, plants, lakes and rustic taverns. It was bounded by a red wall and gate, like that in the palace, and like the palace too there were guards inside so that ordinary strollers would not presume to set foot there. Here the bearers put down the sedan-chair, the serving maids helped the lady out and they passed through the gate, chattering merrily to each other.

The guards all made way for them and let them enter, for the lady was in fact the daughter of Tong Guan's younger brother, who was Marshal Yang's daughter's son. Marshal Tong had brought her up as his own daughter and destined her for the Grand Preceptor's grandson in marriage. She was called Jiaoxiu and she was just sixteen. Today she had persuaded Marshal Tong, taking advantage of the fact that the Emperor was spending two days of pleasure with Lily, to let her visit the Model Mountain. The Marshal had first given orders to guards, so of course they let her in. After four hours she still had not emerged. Wang Qing hung about outside watching for her. He was getting very hungry so he wandered off to a wine shop in East Street to get some wine and food. He hurriedly downed six or seven cups but he was afraid he might miss her, so without even asking for the bill he threw down a heavy piece of silver on the counter for the waiter, saying: "I'll be back in a minute to settle up." He returned to his former post and waited there a while. Suddenly the girl came out with her attendants, walking slowly. She did not get into the sedan. She began admiring the scene outside. As he strolled towards her, Wang Qing saw that she was truly lovely. In fact her beauty made such an impression on him that his heart seemed to hammer uncontrollably, his bones and flesh turn to jelly. He was melting like an ice lion in the fire, instantly he was overcome!

As for the girl, she too had noticed Wang Qing in the crowd. She looked and liked what she saw. Then one of the stewards got the people to move back, her nurse pushed her into the sedan chair which, with the attendants gathered about it threaded its way through the crowd to the Temple of the Sacred Peak outside the Gate of Wild Jujubes, where she stopped to light incense. Wang Qing followed her in. The temple was packed, it was impossible to move, but when the crowd saw it was Marshal Tong's people, they made way for them. When she got down from the chair to do the incense, Wang Qing pushed forward. But he could not get very near and besides was afraid the stewards would shout at him. So it occurred to him to pretend he was a familiar servant of the temple god, and help her light the candles and incense. Now their eyes met, he staring fixedly at her and she returning the gaze with equal urgency. Now, the Grand Preceptor's grandson had been born a simpleton and, since the girl had several times heard the matchmaker saying it was so, she was constantly bemoaning her fate. Now when she saw Wang Qing's elegance and good looks the little idiot's mind filled with romantic ideas. Then one of the stewards, who had been observ-ing, recognized Sergeant Wang Qing. He went straight up and smacked him one in the face! "This is not something for the likes of you!" he shouted. "You, a common Kaifeng policeman, you've got a nerve! Who told you to worm your way in here? If His Excellency gets to hear about this, that ass's head of yours won't be secure on its neck any longer!" Wang Qing dared not reply. He hung his head and sneaked off, sighing and cursing himself: "What a fool I am! How can a warty toad like me expect to dine on wild swan's flesh?"

Wang Qing returned home crestfallen that evening, hiding his anger and disappointment. But the amazing thing was that the girl, when she got home, went on thinking about him night and day. She bribed her maid to go and find out all about him from the Head Steward. The maid was friendly with the Head Steward's wife; they did a spot of pimping together. They got Wang Qing in secretly by a back door and in utter secrecy an affair started between Wang Qing and the Marshal's adopted daughter. Wang Qing was in seventh heaven and gave himself up to drinking every day. Time doesn't stand still however, and 3 months soon passed: extreme joy always gives way to sadness. One day when Wang Qing had got himself drunk as a lord he blurted it all out in front of his commanding officer. Subsequently the affair was bruited abroad and inevitably Marshal Tong came to hear of it. He was furious. That he wanted to punish the offender and get him cashiered goes without saying. So after this Wang Qing felt he dared not go back to Marshal Tong's residence. One day while he was sitting idly at home — it was near the end of the fifth month and a blazing hot day — he got a bench and placed it in the courtyard of his house to catch the breeze, then went back inside to get a fan. He suddenly saw the legs of the bench move and it followed him inside from the courtyard, "Good heavens!" he exclaimed and launched a kick at it with his right foot. "Ouch!" he screamed. Well if he hadn't kicked the bench, many things would have been different. As soon as he did kick it, he was in trouble. Truly, as the heavens have unpredictable storms, so is man ever threatened by catastrophe.

When the bench began behaving so strangely, Wang Qing went up and gave it a kick. Only he used too much force, because he pulled a muscle and could do nothing but squat there shouting: "Help, help!" He was quite unable to move. His wife heard the cries and rushed out to see what was happening. She saw the bench lying on its side and her husband in a heap on the ground so she went up and slapped his face, saying: "You useless thing, you! You spend all the day outside and never think of coming home. Now when you are here you have to play silly games!"

Wang said: "Don't laugh at me, dear. It's no joke. I've done my back in. It's very painful."

The woman helped him up. Leaning on her shoulder and shaking his head, he cried out through clenched teeth: "Aiya! It hurts like hell!"

"You profligate," she scolded. "You fucking good-for-nothing. When you're off on one of your sprees you're always ready to lash out with your feet and fists, and now look at you, the joke's on you!" Realizing what she had just said was not exactly appro-priate, she put her silk sleeve in front of her mouth and giggled. Wang Qing also, when he heard "the joke's on you" applied to such a painful situation, could not help laughing and let out a guffaw. She boxed his ears again for him, saying: "You crazy fucker, what've you been up to?"

When she finally got him onto the bed, she pounded a dish of walnuts for him and warmed a jug of wine. Then she went and bolted the door, spread the mosquito net and lowered the curtain for him to sleep. It goes without saying that with that pain in the ribs he could not stir. The night passed uneventfully. Early next morning the pain was still just as bad and he could see no way of getting to the roll call in front of the government offices. As midday was approaching his wife packed him off to see if he could get hold of some ointment and he hobbled as best he could to a place near the government offices where Old Qian, who was an expert in sprains and pulled muscles, had a shop. There he bought two medicinal patches to stick on his back. Old Qian said: "If you want it to heal quickly you should take a couple of doses of a healing potion to increase the blood flow." So saying, he mixed the potion and handed it to Wang Qing, who took out a piece of silver about two or three tenths of a catty in weight. He asked for a piece of paper to wrap the money in. The old fellow saw what he was doing and pretended to look away. Wang Qing handed him the packet, saying: "Please do not think I am disrespectful. You can buy some watermelon to eat."

The old man said: "One doesn't make money out of one's friends, sergeant. I can't allow it." Even as he spoke he took the packet in his right hand, opened his medicine cabinet and popped it inside.

Wang Qing picked up his medicine and was about to leave when a fortune-teller appeared round the corner of the street west of the Government offices. He wore a cap pulled down over his eyebrows and a robe of brown cloth and was carrying a sunshade from which was suspended a sign with big characters that read "Secrets of the Other World" and on either side of this some smaller letters that read: "Li Zhu of Jingnan, ten dollars a time, every word guaranteed, compares with the finest."

When Wang Qing saw it was a fortune teller, his mind being full of this business with the girl and the strange happenings of the day before, he shouted out: "Mr. Li, come in and sit down!"
"What can I do for you sir?" said the fortune teller. As he spoke his eyes slid over Wang Qing exploring him from head to foot.
"I'd like to hear my fortune," Wang Qing replied.
Mr. Li lowered his sunshade and entered the apothecary's. He greeted Old Qian with joined hands, saying "Please excuse the disturbance." Then from within his robe of rough brown cloth he produced a red sandalwood box. He took off the lid and took out a large copper coin which he presented to Wang Qing, saying: "Go and say a silent prayer to heaven, if you will sir."
Wang Qing tried to make a deep obeisance to the sun's flaming red disk, but it hurt so much he couldn't bend. He was stiff as an eighty- or ninety-year-old and all he could manage was a little bob, something between a bow and a nod, after which he raised his eyes to heaven and prayed. Observing this, the fortune-teller said quietly to Old Qian: "If he's using your medicine no doubt he'll be better soon. I assume he's injured himself in some way?"
"There was some funny business with a bench," the old man said. "He kicked it and strained his back. When he came in just now he couldn't even speak properly. He's used two of my patches and already he's able to bend his waist again."
The fortune-teller said: "Just what I thought."
After completing his prayers, Wang Qing gave the coin back to the fortune-teller. The latter asked him his name, then waved the divining tube in the air and intoned:
The day is auspicious the time is right, the Sage casts the sticks, let that which is hidden be revealed. The Tao is all-embracing and universal, it connects all things: it unites the virtues of heaven and earth, combines the brightness of sun and moon, gives motion to the cycle of the four seasons, relates the good and ill luck of gods and ghosts. This gentleman, Mr. Wang of the Kaifeng district of the Eastern Capital, would purchase from heaven his fortune. On this day in this place he entreats all the great Sages, every god and saint, by all that is most sacred, most holy, most blessed, most spiritual to point the way to the lost one, to make manifest his destiny.
The fortune-teller cast the sticks twice for a double divination, what he called a water and thunder divination. Observing the disposition of the six lines, he asked: "What exactly is it you want to know about?"
"Domestic matters," Wang Qing replied.
Li nodded and said: "Don't be upset if I speak frankly. It's hard, very hard. You will have many troubles, but things will improve later. There are some verses that you should remember." He began to wave about a pleated fan of oiled paper on a bamboo frame and recited: "Home's in a mess, strange events portend disaster, there is no peace to be had there. I see trouble with an old temple, a dangerous bridge, a malicious attack, an official injustice or a serious illness. When there is no proper order, how can one prosper? See honour fierce fright, litigation connected. When people are not at ease, accidents occur. When the limbs are weak, a man is insecure. A change can bring improvement. Meet tiger-dragon-chicken-dog day means more trouble."
Wang Qing was sitting facing Li. He couldn't abide the strong smell of lacquer from the fan so he held his silk sleeve across his nose as he listened. After his recital Li said: "I said I would be frank. There are yet more strange events lying in wait for you at home! You had better move house, if you want to be safe. Tomorrow is a dangerous day. Watch out!"
Wang Qing heard the warning but didn't know how to act on it. He took out some money to pay Li. Taking up his sunshade Li walked out of the shop and went east. At that moment half a dozen constables from the district office spotted Wang Qing and said: "What are you doing loafing about here?"
When Wang Qing explained about the strange happening and spraining his back they all had a good laugh. "Friends," he said, "if His Excellency asks for me just cover up for me, will you?"
"We'll take care of it," they said, and went away.
Wang Qing went home and got his wife to brew the medicine. He was determined to get better so he kept on taking the tonic and chased it down with several cups of wine. What he didn't realize was that this concoction was a heating potion, and when he went to bed that night and his wife snuggled up to him, his ardour was aroused. The trouble was, he was in such pain he couldn't move. But the woman had suffered weeks of neglect all the time Wang Qing had been involved with the Marshal's daughter and constantly away from home and her desires were burning like fire. She wasn't going to let him off, no way! So she climbed on top of him and they reversed the roles of pleasure.
They got up late next morning. After washing, Wang Qing was starving and he warmed some wine for himself. He was just in the middle of breakfast when a voice outside called out: "Is the sergeant at home?" His wife looked over the fence and said: "It's two policemen." Wang Qing was nonplussed, but he had to put down his rice bowl, wipe his mouth go and out to greet them. "What can I do for you gentlemen?" he asked.
"Nice work if you can get it, sergeant," they said. "Look at the colour on you — drinking at this hour of the morning! The guv called the roll this morning and when you weren't there he was right pissed off. We told him that stuff about seeing something strange and hurting yourself but he didn't buy it. He made out a warrant and told us not to come back empty-handed." They handed the warrant to Wang Qing.
"How can I go and see him when I'm flushed from drinking like this?" he said. "Just wait a bit, then I'll go."
"Nowt to do with us," they said. "But the guv is waiting for you. If you don't go at once, we'll be in trouble too. Come on, get a move on!" They started to pull him. When his wife came out to see what was happening he was already out of the door. The dragged him all the way to the government office where the magistrate was sitting on a leopard skin chair. "We brought Wang Qing, like you ordered, sir," they said.
Wang Qing made the obligatory four kowtows and the magistrate shouted: "Wang Qing, you're one of my officers. Why are you shirking, why didn't you report for duty?"
Wang Qing told his story again, adding: "I really am in pain, I can't sit or lie comfortably, I can't walk properly. I wouldn't dream of deceiving you, Your Excellency. Please be lenient."
But the magistrate saw his face was red and he yelled: "You idle bastard, getting drunk is all you're good at. You got involved in all that hanky-panky and now you're inventing a pack of lies, think you can fool your superior!" He shouted to the guards to take him out and beat him. Wang Qing didn't even have time to open his mouth. They beat him till the blood ran to make him confess his story was a fabrication, and that he was hoping to deceive the credulous with seditious intent. Wang Qing after being manhandled by his wife the night before and now tortured by the police was truly like a block of wood between two axes, or a corpse revived. Able to hold out no longer, he was obliged to make a false confession. The magistrate recorded his statement and ordered his officers to put him in irons and throw him in the death cells, whilst the death penalty was demanded for the fabrication of evil tales and seditious plots. He was taken down.
Of course Marshal Tong had sent a secret message to this magistrate with orders to this effect because he was determined to pay Wang Qing out and get rid of him; this mysterious event had cropped up most opportunely! Everyone in that government office knew about the liaison with the Marshal's daughter and they were all spreading it around that: "Wang Qing has been punished because of that affair. He won't get out of this alive." However, the Grand Preceptor and his son did not much like the sound of this: they felt that if Wang Qing were put to death the affair would gain in notoriety and the scandal would be even greater. So they quietly got some officials they could trust, who were also friends with the magistrate, to tell him he should quickly banish Wang Qing to a distant frontier where he would be lost to view. They also appointed a day for the girl to be betrothed, firstly in order to save Marshal Tong's face and secondly to put an end to the gossip. The Grand Preceptor's grandson was something of a simpleton and would not know whether the girl was a virgin or not, so that was no problem.
In deference to the Grand Preceptor's wishes confidentially imparted to him, the magistrate convened his court. Wang Qing was brought up from the cells, the cangue was removed and he was sentenced to twenty strokes of the cane. A tattooer was summoned to brand his cheeks, the distance of his banishment was calculated and he was assigned to the prison camp at Shanzhou. The court ordered a full ten catty cangue for him, which was fitted and sealed, a warrant was made out and two guards or escorts, Sun Lin and Ho Ji, assigned to deliver him. As the three of them left the court, Wang Qing's father-in-law approached and took them to a wine shop on South Street opposite the court room. He told the waiter to bring them wine and food, and after a few cups and some dishes, he took out a bundle of silver and offered it to Wang Qing, saying: "Here's thirty taels of silver for your travelling expenses."
Wang Qing reached out his hand, saying: "Most kind of you, father-in-law."
The other pushed away his hand, saying: "Not so fast. I'm not giving you the money for nothing. You're being sent off to Shanzhou, that's hundreds of miles, over rough roads and mountain passes, who knows when you'll be back. You've been fooling around with someone's daughter and you've had no time at all for your wife. Who's going to look after her for you now? You've no family, land or property to your name. You've got to sign a divorce certificate and let her marry again. It will avoid problems later. If you do this, you can have the money."
Wang Qing was always a spendthrift. He was thinking that he hadn't an ounce of silver in his pocket, how was he going to manage the journey to his place of banishment? Whatever way he looked at it, he needed that money. He took a deep breath and said: "All right, I'll sign the paper."
His father-in-law took the certificate with one hand as he handed over the money with the other. Then he left.
Wang Qing went home with his guards to pack his bags. His wife had already been taken away by her father and the door was locked. He went and borrowed an axe from a neighbour and broke the door down. He found all his wife's clothes were gone and all her jewellery. It made him half angry and half sad. He got a Mrs. Zhou who lived next door to come and prepare some food and wine for the policemen. He gave them ten taels of silver and said: "It still hurts a lot from the beating. I can't walk properly. I would like a few days to rest before we set off." They'd had the money, so of course they agreed. It was in vain that the Grand Preceptor's son sent friends round to urge the policemen to get going. Wang Qing sold off all his household possessions and rented his house to a Mr. Hu, a man of substance.
Wang Qing's father, who had gone blind as a result of his son's behaviour, lived somewhere else. When his son visited they always quarrelled. Now, hearing that his son had got into trouble with the authorities and been banished he found it surprisingly painful. He got a lad to lead him to his son's house. "You never listened to my warnings, my son," he said. "That's why you've ended up like this." The sightless eyes filled with tears as he spoke. Wang Qing, who from childhood had never been accustomed to use the word "father", now at the moment of final split-up felt a sudden pang and cried out: "Father, I've been so cruelly used by corrupt officials and so insulted by my father-in-law who made me sign a divorce before he would give me money."
His father said: "They'd never have treated you like that if you'd loved your wife and shown respect to your father-in-law."
This censoriousness infuriated him. He paid no further attention to his father but packed his bags and left town with the two policemen. His father tore his hair and beat his breast and said: "I should never have come to see the ungrateful wretch!" The boy led him back home and that was that.
After leaving the capital Wang Qing and his guards took lodgings in a lonely spot so he could recuperate for another ten days or so. When his wounds were better the policemen insisted he set off. Moving slowly they headed for Shanzhou. It was the beginning of August and the weather was blazing hot, so they could only do about fifteen miles a day. They suffered the usual discomforts of travel, sleeping in beds people had died in, eating suspect food. After more than a fortnight on the road they passed Mount Song. One day one of the guards pointed to a mountain range far off in the west and said: "That's the Northern Mang Mountain."
Talking as they went and making the most of the morning cool, they covered another twenty-six miles and then they came to a town on the eastern end of the mountain set in a rich country. Thither they directed their steps. East of the town, where dwellings were few, there was a T-shaped grove of tall poplars. Under the trees they found a crowd of people, jostling and craning their necks and there in the shade a fellow stripped to the waist and calling people to come and see his exhibition of staff play. They decided to take a rest under the trees. Wang Qing was soaked with sweat from the walking, his whole body dripping. With his cangue round his neck he pushed his way into the crowd and stood on tiptoe to see the fellow with the staff. After a moment he smiled involuntarily and said: "It's not serious stuff, what he's doing." The man was working himself up to a climax and when he heard this he put down his staff to see who had spoken. It was just a convict! He was outraged. "You bloody felon!" he shouted. "My staff play is renowned far and wide. What right have you to open your fucking mouth? Who said you can criticize me and talk such shit?" Throwing down his stick he squared up to Wang Qing and punched him in the face. Immediately two young men in the crowd stepped forward and separated them, saying: "Stop it!" They asked Wang Qing: "Are you an expert then?"
Wang Qing replied: "I spoke without thinking. I didn't mean to make this gentleman angry. I do have a little knowledge of staff play."
The other continued to rail against him: "You bloody convict, I bet you don't dare to take me on!"
The other two said to Wang Qing: "If you're willing to and can beat him, then these two strings of stolen cash are yours."
Wang Qing said with a grin: "It's no problem." He made his way through the crowd and borrowed a staff from one of the guards. He took off his shirt and rolled up his robe. Then he took a firm grip on the staff. The bystanders said: "You've got that cangue round your neck, how can you manage the staff?"
"That's the whole point." Wang Qing answered. "If I can beat him with this cangue on, there'll be no doubt about my skill."
"You'll certainly deserve the silver if you can beat him with the cangue on," they all cried. Everyone made way for him. His opponent was ready for him, staff in hand, and giving it a flourish shouted: "Come on, let's have you!"
Wang Qing said to the crowd: "Please don't be too critical. I only hope I won't disappoint you, gentlemen."
His opponent, hoping to take full advantage of the fact that Wang was hampered by the cangue, performed a move known as "the python swallows the elephant". Wang Qing countered with a move called "the dragonfly skims the water". The other gave a shout and lunged. Wang Qing took a step back. The other followed, raising his staff and aiming a hefty blow at Wang Qing's forehead. Wang Qing swayed to the left and his opponent's staff hit nothing but air. His recovery was too slow and as he tried to dodge Wang Qing struck him on the wrist and his staff fell to the ground. Luckily Wang had moderated the full force of the blow, but even so the wrist was broken. The crowd all laughed. But Wang Qing rushed forward and taking the other's hand in his said: "Forgive me for the blow!" The man made an attempt to scoop up the money with his left hand, the right hand being too painful. The crowd scolded him: "He's beaten you. It was just agreed this money was for the winner." Now the two young men who had come forward before grabbed the money and gave it to Wang Qing, saying: "Please, we would like to invite you to our house for a chat."
The staff play merchant could hardly dispute the matter with all those people so he had to pack up his things and head back to the city. After that the crowd dispersed.
The two young men led Wang Qing and his guards south past some woods, all of them wearing straw hats to keep off the sun, till they reached a village. Here among the trees was a manor house surrounded by a mud wall in a grove of willows. Outside the house the sound of cicadas filled the trees, inside the beams were alive with the twittering of swallows. They were led into the thatched hall and after formal courtesies had been exchanged they all took off their sweat shirts and hemp sandals and seated themselves. Their hosts said: "From your accent, you're from the capital, gentlemen?" Wang Qing told them his name and explained how he had been unjustly sentenced by a venal magistrate. He politely asked the other two their names. "I am Gong Duan," said the elder, "and this is my younger brother Gong Zheng. This is our ancestral home and the place is called Gong Village." He told a retainer to take away the visitors' wet shirts and dry them and then after drawing some cool water to relieve their thirst, take them up to bathe. Tables were laid first in the hall with freshly made dimsum, following which chickens and ducks were killed and some beans were boiled and peaches picked to offer them with the wine.
Then the retainers re-laid the tables: first a dish of peeled garlic and a dish of chopped chives. Then tea and vegetables were brought in, fruit and nuts, and fish, chicken, duck and so on. They seated Wang Qing in the place of honour with the two policemen next to him. The brothers took the host's place, while servants poured the wine. "I am a convicted criminal," Wang Qing said. "I am most grateful for your kindness, but I really do not deserve so much honour."
Gong Duan said: "Nonsense. Who can say he never gets into trouble? And who carries wine and food with him when he travels?"
They played guessing games and forfeits that evening and wine flowed till they were half tipsy. Gong Duan opened his mouth and said: "This little village of ours has about two hundred souls, all told. For some reason they insisted that we should be their leaders. It's true we're quite handy with fists and staves and can beat most people. Well, this spring in the second month at our local temple festival they put up a stage and had some performances and my brother and I went along to see. There was a quarrel over some betting and we got pretty badly beaten up by this chap from our village called Huang Da. We can't defeat him and he's been boasting to everyone about how he's the strongest. It's driving us crazy, but we've had to swallow our pride. Now we've seen how complete your technique is and we'd like you to be our teacher. If you would agree to train us we'd be extraordinarily grateful to you."
Wang Qing was only too happy to oblige and accordingly they prostrated themselves in the show of respect due to a teacher. They all got thoroughly drunk that evening, and then went to bed to get the benefit of the cool night air. Next morning Wang Qing was up betimes and took Gong Duan, the elder brother, down to the threshing floor to practise his footwork. As they were thus engaged a tall man strode in with his hands behind his back and shouted: "What's this bloody convict doing here trying to cheat us over his skill?" Now the appearance of this man was to have important results: further calamities would befall Wang Qing and Gong Duan would conceive an even greater hatred. Truly

Now while Wang Qing in the Gong brothers' compound was enjoying the start of a sunny day, cooled by a gentle breeze, training the elder brother in the art of attack and defence with the staff on their threshing floor shaded by the willow trees, a tall man marched in. The top of his head was shaved but he had no headgear and the remaining hair was tied back in a pigtail; he wore a short loose-fitting gown of brown cloth with plain silk trousers and open straw sandals, and he carried a triangular fan. As he marched in with his head held high, arms crossed behind his back, he saw this convict conducting the training session. He had heard the day before about a convict who defeated the expert performing in East Mang, and was afraid that the Gong brothers were learning some new moves, so he shouted to Wang Qing: "If you're a convict, what are you doing hanging around here to cheat people, instead of getting on with your journey?"
Wang Qing thought this must be some relative of the Gongs' so he didn't like to answer back. In fact it was Huang Da, their enemy. He too had come out to enjoy the morning freshness and was on his way to the house of Old Liu on the western end of the Gong village to collect a gambling debt, when he heard some noise up at the Gongs'. He was familiar with them, which is why he marched in uninvited.
An indescribable rage filled Gong Duan's breast when he saw who it was. The feeling rose towering and irrepressible, and he burst out: "You scoundrel! You piece of ass and ox shit! The other day you cheated me of my wager, how dare you walk in here and try to bully people!"
Huang Da equally annoyed riposted: "Go stuff your mother's arse!" He threw down his fan, raised his fists and rushed at Gong and punched him in the face. Wang Qing when he heard them giving vent to their feelings like this, guessed this must be Huang Da and rushed forward to help. He aimed a blow at Huang Da's ribs and Huang Da came crashing down. Before he could recover the Gong brothers and two of their retainers had pinned him down and began pounding him with their fists and feet in the back, chest, shoulders, ribs, flanks, cheeks, head and four limbs. There was nowhere their fists or feet did not reach except perhaps the tip of his tongue! He received an infinity of blows. His gown and trousers were in shreds. "That's enough, that's enough!" he kept shouting. He was now completely naked, not a scrap of clothing left to cover him. Only when the two guards of the prisoner's escort intervened did the Gongs at last stop.
After such a pounding Huang Da could only lie there gasping, there was no thought of resistance in him. Gong Duan told some of his farm workers to carry him half way to East Mang. They left him there on the grass where he lay naked in the sun for half the day. Eventually some neighbouring farmers came out to get fodder and found him. They carried him back home and he took to his bed. He got someone to write an accusation and take it to the local authorities. Of this no more.
Having fought all the first part of the morning, the Gongs told their retainers to bring some refreshments and invited Wang Qing and his guards to breakfast.
"That fellow will be back looking for revenge one of these days," said Wang Qing.
"If the lousy bastard wants to try something on, there's only his wife on his side, the neighbours were just scared of him, that's all. Now they've seen him beaten up, they won't back him. If he dies, we can pay a retainer to say he's responsible, take the beating and keep his mouth shut. If he doesn't die, then it's only a case of fighting. Anyway, I've had my revenge, entirely thanks to you, master, so please drink some wine and stop worrying. Once you've taught us fencing, we will have to repay you properly."
Gong Duan took out two silver ingots, each weighing five taels, and gave them to the guards, to persuade them to stay a little longer. With the money in their hands they could only say yes. They stayed more than ten days, in fact, and each day Wang Qing practised moves with spear and staff with the two brothers. The guards went on insisting they should leave, and when they heard that Huang Da had sent someone to the local government office to lodge a complaint, Gong Duan took out fifty taels of silver and gave them to Wang Qing for the journey to Shanzhou. They rose in the night and packed their things and left the house before daylight. The elder told his younger brother to carry the silver he had just given Wang Qing and accompany him on the journey.
The journey was uneventful and without any delay they reached Shanzhou. The two guards took Wang Qing to the government office and handed in the warrant from the Eastern Capital. Having acquainted himself with the facts, the magistrate accepted Wang Qing and signed the receipt which he gave to the escorts to take back. Of this no more. He then dispatched Wang Qing to the prison camp, while the guards returned to the capital with their receipt.
Gong Zheng then went off to see someone he knew there and gave him the money to give to the warden of the gaol for Wang Qing to buy some things he might need. This warden's name was Zhang Shikai. After receiving the money he had Wang Qing's cangue removed and excused him the serious flogging. Wang Qing was not given any work. He was given his own room and allowed to come and go as he pleased.
Gradually two months passed and it was late autumn. One day as Wang Qing was sitting idly in his cell, a guard came in and said: "The Warden wants to see you."

Wang Qing went with him to the reception room and kowtowed. The Warden said: "You've been here some time now, and I haven't yet asked you to do anything. I want to buy a good Chenzhou bow. Since you're from the capital and Chenzhou is in the same province, you ought to be able to tell whether the price is right." He took a package from his sleeve and handed it to Wang Qing saying: "Here's two taels of the best silver. Go and get me a bow."

"I'll take care of it," Wang replied. He took the package to his cell where he opened it and found it to be indeed pure silver. He weighed it and it was a fraction over the weight. He left the camp and headed for a shop that sold bows, where he bought a real Chenzhou bow for only one seventy. When he got back to the camp with it, the Warden was not in his office, so he gave it to one of the officials of his household to take it to him. Happily there were thirty cents left over. Next day the Warden called him in again and said: "You are very efficient. The bow you bought yesterday is excellent."

Wang Qing said: "You should apply heat in its box to season it, Your Excellency."

"You don't need to tell me that," the Warden said.

From then on the Warden sent Wang out every day to buy things, only it was not like before. He did not advance him any money, but gave him an account book and told him to note down in it what he bought each day. But of course the shopkeepers would never let him off paying. He was obliged to draw on his own capital so he could buy the things and deliver them to the Warden's office, and the Warden always found fault, so it was always curses and beatings. After ten days when he presented the accounts and asked to be paid not a cent was forthcoming. When it came to the monthly balance, all he received from the Warden would be ten strokes, or twenty, or thirty. All in all he must have received a good three hundred and his legs were black and blue. The fifty taels of silver Gong Duan had given him had all been used up on these expenses.

One day Wang Qing went to the shop of one Doctor Zhang, maker of pills and mixer of beverages for internal and external applications, concoctor of medicines and seller of ointments, by the eastern corner of the triumphal arch west of the camp, because he wanted a cream to rub on his sores. The doctor talked while he applied the ointment for him: "An uncle of that prison warden of yours was here the other day, buying an ointment for his wrist. He said he'd had a fall in East Mang. But it looked more to me as if it had been broken by a sharp blow."

"How come I've never seen him in the camp?" Wang Qing asked eagerly.

"He's the brother of the Warden's minor wife," the doctor said. "His name is Pang Yuan. This Mistress Pang is the Warden's favourite. Her brother is a dreadful gambler and is also fond of spear and staff play. He owes everything to his sister who looks after him."

When he heard this Wang Qing was practically certain it was this Pang Yuan whom he had beaten the other day in the shade of the poplars. Small wonder the Warden was out to get him. When he went back to the camp he secretly got some wine and food and invited one of the junior turnkeys and gave him money and slowly questioned him about Pang Yuan. What the man told him confirmed what Doctor Zhang had said. Two things in particular he said: "You injured this Pang Yuan the other day at East Mang and he has complained about you to the Warden. I'm afraid you can't escape the thrashings!"

Truly we can say:

Be not too keen to win the race;
Better to yield and know your place!
From a single blow the quarrel's made;
With interest it will be repaid!

Back in his room, Wang Qing sighed and said: "As they say, don't fear justice, fear those who hand it out! The other day instead of keeping my big mouth shut I told that bugger I could beat him with the staff. How was I to know he was the younger brother of the prison Warden's sweetheart! If he's so determined to get me I'd better start by keeping out of his way and think of a plan later." He went out surreptitiously and bought a sharp knife which he secreted on his person just in case. Ten days passed and luckily there was no trouble. His wounds had healed somewhat.

Then one day the Warden ordered him to buy two rolls of silk. This had to be taken seriously, he could not put it off. He went at once to the shop and made the purchase. When he got back the Warden was sitting in the reception room and he went straight there and reported. The Warden objected that the colour was wrong, that it was not long enough and the pattern was old-fashioned. "You cheeky beggar," he shouted. "You're a convict, you ought to be carrying water and shifting stone. Or maybe you should be locked up in solitary! This work I've given you is far too good for you. You just don't know when you're well off, you idle bastard."

Wang Qing bore it all in silence, kowtowing like someone laying out candles and asking for mercy.

"For the time being we'll postpone the beating. Go and get it changed quickly. If you don't bring it back by this evening, if you're a second late, then watch out for your life!"

Wang Qing had to take off his own clothes and pawn them for a couple of strings of cash in order to pay extra for changing the silk. This all took time and when he returned it was already after lighting up time and the camp gates were shut. The duty officer said: "How can I take it on myself to let you in after dark like this?"

Wang Qing said: "I'm on a mission for the Warden." But the duty officer didn't want to hear. Wang Qing had to give him all the money he had left before he would let him in and he still held him up a long time. Carrying his bundles of silk Wang Qing went to the door of the residence. The doorkeeper said: "His Excellency has had a big quarrel with his first wife. He's gone to the second wife's room, and the mistress is fuming. I daren't pass on your message, it's more than my life's worth!"

Wang Qing was thinking to himself: "He said I had to bring it back by tonight. Why put all these obstacles in my way? It's all meant to get me into trouble. How can I get out of the beating tomorrow? My life is really in that villain's hands. I've been beaten three hundred times. Isn't that enough to satisfy his taste for revenge? Previously he had all the money from Gong Zheng. Now he's changing his face and persecuting me like this!"

Now from his childhood Wang Qing had been an awkward cuss and even his own father and mother had been scared of upsetting him. When his rebellious spirit was aroused, he seemed proof of the saying "Gentlemen hate passionately, it's manly to express your anger". The thing was now, he could neither do it nor refrain from doing it. He had reached the limit. While everyone in the camp, convicts included, was asleep, he quietly crept round to the back of the residence, climbed a low wall, silently drew back the bolt on the rear door and hid on one side. By starlight he could see that inside the wall on the eastern end there was a stable and on the west end a very small shed which on closer inspection turned out to be a privy. Wang Qing picked up a set of wooden palings that were inside the stable and leant them against the wall by the two-leaved gate, climbed onto them and thence onto the wall, pulled up the palings after him and leant them inside, and carefully slipped down to the ground. First he drew back the bolts on the two doors and hid the wooden palings. There was another wall within and from behind it came the sound of laughter. He crept over to this wall and pressed his ear to it. Straining to hear, he recognized the Warden's voice and a woman's voice. There was also another man's voice. They were drinking and gossiping inside. After stealthily listening for some while, he heard the Warden say: "Brother-in-law, that villain will report back to me tomorrow and then his life will be forfeit to the cane."

"I reckon all the bugger has is used up by now," said the other man. "I hope you'll get on with it and finish the fucker off!"

The Warden said: "The day after tomorrow you'll have what you want!"

The woman said: "That's enough, now! Don't you two ever stop?"

The man said: "Who asked your opinion, sister? It's none of your business!"

Wang Qing listening outside the wall could get about one word in three, but the meaning was clear. A vast anger arose in his soul, an indescribable fire, towering into the sky, impossible to restrain, and he was involuntarily filled with the strength of a door god, till he was ready to throw down that plastered wall and charge in and kill the scoundrels. Indeed so far as they were concerned it was a case of

Till autumn's winds the grasshopper plays.

Just when he could bear it no longer, he heard the Warden say: "Boy, bring a lamp to light me to the privy." Immediately Wang Qing pulled out his knife and crouched down in the corner behind a plum tree. Then with a creak the door swung open, and casting a glow like the setting sun the boy emerged with a travelling lantern, the Warden following. They proceeded, unaware because of the dark that there was someone hiding there, watching only where they set their feet, till they reached the double doors and a curse resounded: "The incompetent oafs, not one of them pays attention. Why can they never remember to bolt the doors?"

The boy held the doors open and watched while the Warden exited through them. Wang Qing quietly crept up behind. The Warden heard steps behind him and turned just in time to see Wang bearing down on him with the knife in one hand and the fingers of the other splayed out. The Warden's heart and other organs flew heavenward as he cried out: "A thief!" It's slow in the telling but happens in a flash. Wang Qing's knife descended, carving a gash from ear to collarbone, and his victim crashed to the floor. The boy, though in the normal way of things he got on well enough with Wang Qing, when he saw him with the knife glinting in his hand, in the process of performing the dreadful deed, was naturally terrified. He would have fled, but his legs were as if nailed to the ground. He tried to scream, but he had been struck dumb and no sound came out. He was literally scared out of his wits. As the Warden lay writhing on the ground Wang Qing threw himself on him and finished him off with a stab in the back.

Pang Yuan, drinking in his sister's room, heard muffled noises outside and without waiting to light a lamp ran out to look. When he saw someone coming, Wang Qing delivered a kick to the boy with the lantern and both boy and lantern disappeared. Pang Yuan thought it was the Warden beating the boy so he called out: "Why are you beating him, brother-in-law?" As he came forward, Wang Qing charged and stabbed at him in the dark, catching him in the ribs. Pang Yuan let out a screech like a stuck pig and fell to the floor. Holding the head up by the hair, Wang Qing cut it off.

The woman had heard the screams outside: she told one of the maids to light a lantern and they rushed out to see what was going on. Wang Qing thought to kill her too. What a scene that was! Words are not adequate to describe it! Anyway, Wang Qing saw in a flash that there were a dozen maids behind, all carrying makeshift weapons and screaming. Springing into action, he fled the scene. He opened the back door, scrambled over the wall of the prison compound, removed his bloodstained clothing, and wiped his knife and put it away. The watchman's drum sounded the third watch. Taking advantage of the fact that the streets were empty he approached the city wall. Shanzhou had an earthen wall and it was not very high nor was the moat very deep. He was able to cross both.

We shall leave him to make his escape, and describe how the Warden's wife Mistress Pang with two of her maids came out with a lantern to investigate. None of the others came with them. First she came upon her brother's bleeding head, lying on the ground in one place and the body in another. The women stared at each other in utter terror, feeling as if their skulls had been split open in eight places and a bucket of ice-cold water poured over the top. For a long time they stood and no words came out. Then stumbling and shaking with fear they ran back in again. They shouted to the other servants inside and to the guards on duty outside. Torches were lit, weapons grasped, and everyone went to the back to see. Outside the double doors they found the Warden's body and the boy lying on the ground gasping for breath and spitting blood. It was obvious he was not long for this world. Seeing the back door open they assumed it was a thief who had got in at the back. They rushed out to look and found the two bundles of silk thrown down on the ground and with one voice they all said: "Wang Qing!" They hurriedly called a roll of the convicts and found that Wang Qing alone was missing. The whole camp was in an uproar, and also the people who lived around it on every side. Outside the back wall the blood-stained clothing was found and careful examination showed it to be all Wang Qing's. They discussed what to do and agreed that the matter must be reported to the magistrate before the opening of the city gates. Someone was sent at once. By now it was the fifth watch. The magistrate was shocked and sent the district police chief immediately to obtain details of the victims and ascertain the whereabouts of the murderer. It was ordered that the gates remain closed for two days and a state of emergency be maintained while a thorough house-to-house search was conducted, but no trace was found of the murderer. The magistrate published a notice and had it distributed to all the villages in his jurisdiction, requiring village elders to carry out searches and apprehend the murderer. The notice gave details of Wang Qing's place of origin and age; it contained a description of his appearance and build, together with a picture, and announced a reward of a thousand strings of cash. Anyone who knew anything of his whereabouts was obliged to report it and would receive the reward. Anyone harbouring the criminal or giving him food and lodging would be prosecuted as an accomplice and suffer the same fate as the criminal. Neighbouring districts for miles around were put on the alert.

After climbing the city wall that night, Wang Qing had made a bundle of his clothes and waded across the moat. He was thinking: "I've got out of it with my life, but where can I go now?" Winter was approaching. The leaves had fallen the grass withered, and he had to find his way with only the stars to light him. He followed several small paths and finally came to a main road. He moved along at a smart pace and by the time dawn was showing red in the east he had done a good twenty miles, but he continued on, heading south, till he came to a populated area. He remembered he still had a little money on him and decided to approach and find something to eat and drink and give himself time to think where he was going to go. In a little while he came to a market. It was still early and the wine shops and eating house were not open yet. There was just one eastward facing house under whose eaves hung a battered lamp, announcing it to be a rest house for travelling merchants. The place had not been properly closed up the night before and the door was half open. Wang Qing advanced and pushed the door, which swung open with a creak. The man who appeared from inside was still unwashed. Wang Qing recognized him. It was his first cousin, Fan Quan. In his youth he had been a successful broker with his father in Fangzhou, and had been made superintendant of the district's two prisons. This spring in the third month he went to the capital on official business and stayed several days in Wang Qing's house. "Cousin, how've you been keeping?" Wang Qing called out.

"Can it be cousin Wang Qing?" the other replied. Startled by his appearance and by the two golden seals tattooed on his cheeks, he did not at first know what to say. Wang Qing looked around to make sure no one was near and then knelt before him and said: "Cousin, save me I beg you!" Fan Quan hurriedly raised him up and said: "You really are Wang Qing then?"

Wang Qing waved a hand and said: "Keep your voice down!"

Fan Quan caught on at once and taking him by the sleeve pulled him inside. Luckily the night before he had chosen a single room. Quietly but urgently he asked: "Why are you looking like this?" In a whisper Wang Qing told him all about the injustice he had suffered and the banishing to Shanzhou, after which he told of Warden Zhang's cruel treatment and what had happened just the day before. Fan Quan was so shocked he could not at first think what to do. Then he quickly washed and shaved, had breakfast, and paid the bill for food and lodging. Having decided that Wang Qing must pretend to be a gaoler's assistant, they left the inn and headed for Fangzhou. As they went Wang Qing asked his cousin how he came to be there. "My governor sent me to deliver some papers to the governor of Shanzhou," he said. "Yesterday I received the reply and set off. But it was getting late so I stopped here for the night. I had no idea you were in Shanzhou or that all this had happened."

They continued their journey all night till they arrived in Fangzhou. Two days had passed and in Shanzhou the notices were out for the arrest of the murderer Wang Qing. Fan Quan returned home anxiously and told Wang Qing: "You're not safe here in the city. I've got some cottages out in the country, east of Mount Ding, on a piece of land I bought for myself last year. I've settled a few farm hands there to cultivate it. You'd better go and hide there for a few days. Later you can decide what to do."

He waited till dark and then took Wang Qing to the cottage at Mount Ding. They decided to change his name to Li De. Fan Quan thought the tattoos on Wang Qing's cheeks didn't look too solid. Luckily he had previously been in Jiankang and having heard a lot of Doctor An, had gained his confidence by means of generous gifts. Doctor An had shown him a way of removing tattoos. He used an acid on Wang Qing's cheeks and afterwards an ointment to heal them. At first the treatment raised a red welt but the tattoos disappeared. In two months even the scar was gone. Since time is ever fleeting, a hundred days soon passed and it was the spring festival of the first year of the reign. The Government pursuit of Wang Qing had come to nothing. His face now bore no trace of the tattoos and gradually he began to go about more confidently, wearing the clothes that had been donated to him by his cousin. One day as he was sitting bored in the cottage, he heard a certain commotion in the distance. He asked some of the peasants what the excitement was all about. "There's some people called Duan, Mr. Li, lives just west of us here. Well these Duan brothers have a singer to come from the capital. They've put up a stage and all. There's going to be a performance, with all kinds of music. They say she's the latest thing, a top-notch artist. She's expected to pull in a huge audience. You ought to go along and take a look." After this build-up, Wang Qing was never likely to resist. But because he went there, certain things would happen. A young lady of the district was going to marry a convict, the people would suffer a load of misfortune at the hands of a fierce beast.

At the Duans' a bridegroom is welcomed; The chief on House Mountain fights 2 opponents

When Wang Qing rushed over to the next village, Mount Ding, he found a crowd of five or six hundred gathered there. The stage was set up on the threshing floor outside the village. The artist had not yet made her entrance, but around the stage there were some thirty or forty tables. People were crowding around, throwing dice and placing bets. Others, a group of twenty or so, were squatting on the ground tossing coins.

That's how it was: some shaking the dice and shouting out the combinations — pairs, straight, flush, full house, and so on, others tossing coins and calling heads or tails. There was laughter and curses and even serious fights. The losers took off their shirts and pawned their clothes, ready to lose all they had and ruin their business, forgetting to eat and sleep. This was losing indeed, going the whole hog! Those who were winning were in expansive mood, strutting and swaggering about, marching this way and that in search of drinkers willing to continue the game, their purses, bags, and sleeves overflowing with money. But when the final reckoning came, they would find they had really won very little. They gambled their winnings away or had them eaten up by the gaming master's rake-off.

Besides the gambling scene there were also all the countrywomen who had abandoned the hoeing and watering of their crops and come flocking in droves, and who stood there, brown faces upturned and gold teeth glinting, waiting expectantly for the actress to appear. There were also mothers and fathers and their offspring. She was really smart and fashionable and many people had come to see her. Not only the locals from the village were there; people from the city had come to gaze too. A huge area of that green countryside had been trampled bare.

Well, to cut a long story short, Wang Qing became restless after watching this scene for a while. As he glanced round the throng beside the stage his eye was taken by a large bewhiskered gent sitting on a bench and leaning his arms on the table. He had round eyes and a big head, broad shoulders and narrow waist. Five strings of cash were piled on the table, a dice cup and six dice, but he had no takers. "It's about ten months since I fell foul of the law," Wang Qing was thinking. "In all these months I haven't had a go at this. I've got that money Fan Quan gave me the other day for my living expenses. Why don't I test my luck, try a few throws with this fellow? I'll just make enough to buy myself something special to eat." He took out his money and threw it down on the table, saying: "Let's give it a go."

The other man took a good look at him and said: "Come on then." As he spoke another man emerged from the crowd around the table in front. He had a long thin face and bore a distinct resemblance to the one who was sitting. He said to Wang Qing: "Is that all you've got? You won't get far with that. Have some money from me. I'll only charge you two percent on your winnings."

"Fair enough!" Wang Qing said. He took two strings of cash from the man, who set aside twenty cents from each. "That'll do," said Wang Qing, and announced he was going to try for a full house. After the first few throws, another man approached and put down a stake. Now Wang Qing was accustomed to gambling in the style of the Eastern Capital: he believed in his luck, but he also knew a trick or two and was a master of bluff and deception. The man who had lent him the money took the opportunity to slip round to the other side of the table, while the newcomer encouraged him to give the dice a "good whirl".

Straight off Wang Qing won two strings of cash. Having won, he went on throwing and his luck held. He was about ready to leave off, but the other man impatiently renewed his stake, seemingly determined to go on to the bitter end. When Wang Qing threw a nine, the other man only threw eight. In not much more than an hour he had lost five strings of cash and was cleaned out. From his winnings Wang Qing made up two strings of cash with a piece of twine and put them on one side. He strung together the rest of the money to his satisfaction and was about to lift it onto his shoulder when the man who had lost cried out: "Where are you taking that money? I reckon that's still too hot from the stove — you're going to burn your hands!"

"You lost to me," Wang Qing replied angrily. "Cut it out!"

The other man glared at him and said: "You son of a bitch. Can't you see I'm your superior?"

Wang Qing replied in kind: "You motherfucking peasant! If you hit me in the stomach you'll never get your fist out! How can you stop me taking the money?"

The other put up his fists and aimed a blow at Wang Qing's face. The latter swayed to one side and caught the other's arm, thrust his right elbow into the pit of his stomach and tripped him with his right leg. The man's strength availed him nothing, he could not break the hold and he crashed over backwards and lay flat on his back, face to the sky. The onlookers all began to laugh. The man struggled to rise but Wang Qing pressed him down and subjected him to a regular going over. Now the one who had first put down the money came and without a word of either reproof or encouragement scooped up all the money on the table. Furious, Wang Qing left the man on the ground and raced after the other. Suddenly a woman appeared from the crowd and began shouting: "He won't get away with it, the blighter, he's got me to reckon with!"

This is what she was like:

There's a ferocious glint in her eye, a malignant expression on her face. Her waist and limbs are thick and coarse; she lacks all feminine charms. Her skin is rough; she relies on thick make-up to cover the blemishes. She boasts a headful of weird hairpins, and offers glimpses of two arms covered in most ordinary looking bangles. When it comes to moving the stone mortar, she laughs at the way others pant and strain; picking up the rail of the well she is proud that it costs her no effort. If it's needlework you're after, she hasn't a clue; but for kicking and fisticuffs she's a real artist.

She was around twenty four or five, this woman. She removed her outer garment rolled it up and threw it down on the table. Inside she wore a tight short-sleeved robe of parrot green silk and underneath wide breeches of padded silk. She strode forward, raised her fists and shaped up to Wang Qing. Well, since she was a woman and he could see a weakness in her guard, Wang Qing thought he was going to have some fun. He deliberately refrained from using fast kicks, and instead took up a wrestler's stance, adopting an open posture and waiting for her to attack.

By now the actors had come on stage to perform their comic sketch, but the people had all gone off to watch this fight between a man and a woman and were crowding around them in a tight circle. The woman saw that the man was going to confine himself to blocking and parrying, but she hadn't enough strength to force the issue. So she waited for an opening and then performed a "black tiger", aiming one fist at his heart. He swayed to one side and she struck only the air. Before she could recover her balance he grabbed her and upended her with a twist. As soon as she hit the ground he lightly picked her up in a move called "the tiger grabs a head". "Be careful," he said, "you'll get your clothes dirty. Forgive me for being a bit rough, but you did start it." She was not the least bit put out. "You're pretty nifty," she said. "That's a good hold."

Now the man who had lost money and been beaten, together with the one who had first put up money and then grabbed the winnings, pushed through the crowd and began shouting: "You lecherous bastard, you've got a nerve! How dare you interfere with our little sister!"

Wang Qing shouted back: "You're a fucking bad loser. You stole my money, and now you're making filthy insinuations." He rushed at them with his fists flying. Then another man came out of the crowd and got between all three of them. "Mr. Li, enough of this!" he shouted. " Duan brothers, stop it! We're all neighbours. If you've got something to say to each other, then say it nicely!" It was Wang Qing's cousin, Fan Quan. The three men stopped fighting. Cousin Fan Quan hurriedly said to the girl: "Please forgive him."

The girl bowed and said: "Is Mr. Li a relative of yours?"

"He is my cousin."

"He's a terrific fighter!"

Wang Qing said to Fan Quan: "I couldn't bear to see that villain lose and then call in his accomplices to steal the money!"

Fan Quan said pleasantly: "To them it's a business, why did you have to come and make trouble?"

The Duan brothers were watching their sister expectantly. She said: "Out of respect for Mr. Fan you mustn't fight with him any more. Give us the money."

In deference to his sister, who was evidently something special, Duan the Fifth was obliged to admit that he had lost the money fairly and hand it over to her. She gave it to Fan Quan, saying: "Here is the original sum. Please take it." With that she hustled her brothers away, while Fan Quan likewise took Wang Qing back home.

Fan Quan made no secret of his annoyance: "For my mother's sake I lay my life on the line, letting you stay here. If an amnesty comes up we can do some business together. Why the devil do you have to be so restless? Those Duan brothers are real troublemakers. And the girl is even worse. They've nicknamed her 'Big Beast'. I don't know how many young gentlemen she's ruined. When she was fifteen she was married to a squire who was an old idiot and before a year was out she'd burnt him to death. Relying on their strength she and her two brothers earn themselves a dishonest living by going around creating disputes like that. In all the villages round about they're afraid of them. Their speciality is getting people to gamble. That gaming table is the bait, don't you see? It was just asking for trouble to go there and stir things up, my friend! If you've been noticed, we're going to be in a real mess!"

Wang Qing kept his mouth shut during all this.

Fan Quan stood up and said: "I've got to go and report for duty at the government office. I'll come back and see you tomorrow."

We shall leave Fan Quan to go off to Fangzhou, and tell of Wang Qing, who went to bed quite late and passed an uneventful night. Next morning when he had just completed his toilet, one of the farm workers entered and said: "Squire Duan has come to see you."

Wang Qing went out to receive the guest who turned out to be a wrinkled silver haired old gentleman. After the exchange of courtesies Squire Duan took the place of honour. He looked Wang Qing up and down from head to foot and muttered to himself: "What a giant!" He asked Wang Qing about his family background and what brought him to the neighbourhood, what was the relationship between him and Fan Quan and whether he was married or not. Wang Qing responded to this interrogation by telling him a pack of lies to throw him off the scent: "I'm from the Western Capital, my parents are both dead, and my wife also, Fan Quan and I are first cousins. Last year he came to the Western Capital on business and saw I was all alone with no one to look after me so he invited me back here. I know a bit about fighting and I'm watching out for an opportunity here to advance my fortunes."

Squire Duan seemed satisfied with this. After asking Wang Qing what his sign was, he said goodbye and left. After a certain while as Wang Qing was wondering about all this he had another caller. "Is Mr. Fan at home?" he asked. "And is this Mr. Li I'm speaking to?" They stared at each other in amazement, both thinking: "We've met before." They exchanged courtesies and were just about to start a conversation when Fan Quan turned up. When the three of them were seated, Fan Quan said: "What brings you here, Mr. Li?"

When Wang Qing heard that name, he suddenly remembered: "It's Mr. Li the fortune-teller!"

For his part the fortune-teller was thinking: "It's that chap from the Eastern Capital, name of Wang, who wanted me to tell his fortune." He said to Fan Quan: "I have never been to your home before, sir. May I ask you, is it true that you have a relative called Li?"

Fan Quan pointed to Wang Qing and said: "But this is my relative, Mr. Li."

Wang Qing leant towards him and said cannily: "Li is my original name. Wang is the name of the family I married into."

The fortune-teller smiled and said with a wave of the hand: "I was right then. I thought it was Wang. We met before in the Eastern Capital, didn't we?"

Wang Qing could see that he remembered exactly. He lowered his head and said nothing. The fortune-teller said: "After I left you, when I went back to Jingnan I met a stranger who taught me the ancient secrets of swordplay. Recently in Fangzhou I heard there was something going on here and came here in the hope of earning some money. The Duans know how I can handle a sword and wanted me to teach them so they invited me to stay in their house. Just now Squire Duan came home and gave me your sign to do your horoscope. When did I ever see such a good fortune? Some day you'll be rich beyond words! Right now a great marriage is in the offing, a most fortunate affair. Miss Duan and her father have much pleasure in inviting you to bcome part of the family. Since it is an auspicious day I took the liberty of calling as their representa-tive. Miss Duan's fortune is splendid. It is really suitable that you should get together. Like steel bowl and iron broom, it's a union made in heaven. May I look forward to drinking the betrothal wine?"

After listening to this long speech, Fan Quan sighed to himself and thought: "Those Duans are a troublesome lot. If I stand in the way of this alliance or try to prevaricate, there's going to be no end of trouble. I'd best go along with it." To the fortune-teller he said: "So that's how it is! I'm most grateful to the Squire and Miss Duan for their kind thoughts. The only thing is, this cousin of mine is not much of a catch. Are you sure he's good enough?

"Aiya!" exclaimed the other. "Don't be so modest. Miss Duan never stops talking about him!"

Fan Quan said: "That's excellent then! I can be his guarantor." He took out a five tael silver ingot and gave it to the fortune-teller saying: "Here in the country we haven't got the means to entertain you properly. This is just a little something to prepare some refreshments, in token of my gratitude."

The fortune-teller said: "There's no need."

Fan Quan said: "It's nothing! There is just one condition. You must not mention that he has two names. I hope everything will go well."

Li Zhu was like any other fortune-teller: once he had the money in his hand he left with many professions of gratitude and went back to the Duans. What did it matter to him whether the man had one name or two, or what kind of person he was? His business was to secure the match, get the wine flowing, earn himself some money. Especially since the girl herself had set her sights on the other party and they were all afraid of her, even the Squire himself wouldn't want to cross her. The affair was as good as settled.

As the fortune-teller went to and fro he was hoping to talk up the betrothal money, to the greater benefit of the go-between. But Fan Quan was afraid the question of money would arouse difficulties and urged that both sides should minimize the costs. This was pleasing to Squire Duan, who was a thrifty man, and no time was lost fixing the day. They settled on the twenty-second of the same month. Sheep and pigs were slaughtered, fish and frogs caught, there would be big bowls for the wine and big dishes for the meat. A few relatives were invited to the wedding banquet, musicians were hired and the bridal chamber decked with flowers, all at minimum cost. Fan Quan had a new set of clothes made for Wang Qing. Because of his official duties he himself had to leave early. Wang Qing and the girl went through the official introductions and drinking from the betrothal cup and so on, all as quickly as possible. The Squire had the banquet laid in the main hall, and together with twenty or so relatives, his own children, the groom and the matchmaker, they feasted all day long and the party did not break up until nightfall. Then the relatives who lived nearby said thank you and left. The ones remaining because they lived too far away were the girl's uncle and aunt, the Fangs, the family of her cousin Qiu, and Duan the Second's brother- and sister-in-law, the Shis. The three men were to sleep over in the east wing. The three ladies, who were all bright young things, prepared some food and wine for the newly weds to warm up the bridal chamber. With much giggling they continued drinking for a while, then everyone prepared for bed. At this point an old servant came to make up the beds and turn down the covers in the bridal chamber and invite the new master and his wife to go to rest. She then bolted the door of the chamber on the outside and took herself off.

Miss Duan had been domineering and headstrong even as a child. She was in no way inexperienced and knew the ways of the world. Nor was she troubled by shyness. She had already taken her hair pins out and removed her outer garment. Wang Qing was a man of the world and since his sentencing, which was ten months now, he had known no woman. Miss Duan had beetling brows and big eyes, it is true, and had nothing like the sweet allure of his former lover the Marshal's daughter or his wife, but seen now by lamplight her swelling form, her red stomacher unlaced to reveal the soft white breasts naturally aroused his lust and he rushed forward to embrace her. She boxed his ears roundly and said: "No hanky-panky, let's get that clear!" But when they embraced on the bed and slipped between the covers, then they shared the bliss of the common pillow:

One a country girl of easy virtue, the other a rough convict; both have skin a foot thick and great clodhopper feet! One is panting urgently like an ox resting under a willow; the other sweetly utters coarse words, like the oriole among flowers. There are no momentous oaths and treaties here, yet there is a great fluttering of flags; no trembling or reluctance greets the clouds and rain, for here compacted lie ten thousand bewitchments.

Outside the bedchamber that night there was a deal of lewd talk and laughter. The ladies, Mistresses Fang, Qiu and Shi, were all youthful and they had all drunk enough to turn their cheeks bright red, so instead of going to sleep they enlisted the wives of the two Duan brothers and all together crept up to the bridal chamber and put their ears to the wall to listen. They could hear every sound plainly. Wang Qing was an experienced lover well versed in the arts of the bedchamber. When he saw his new wife was more than willing, he did all he knew how to satisfy her. The group of young women outside, hearing all the sounds, found that their silk knickers were soaked through.

There, then, was this bevy of females outside the room, engaged in sniggering and lewd commentary, nudging and pinching each other, when Duan the Second burst upon them, shouting: "This is a fine thing! Are you senseless, all of you, fooling around like this?" This stopped them in their tracks. They had nothing to say for themselves. "Sister, sister, get up!" Duan the Second shouted. "You've invited calamity into your bed!"

The woman, in the midst of her pleasure, reacted furiously: "What're you doing, kicking up such a row in the middle of the night?"

"You're in for a bloody shock!" he shouted back "You're in deep trouble!"

Now Wang Qing was no fool. He told his wife to get dressed and they both came out to find out what was going on. The other women had fled. The moment Wang Qing appeared Duan the Second grabbed him and dragged him off to the main hall where they found Fan Quan cursing fate, frantic as an ant on a hot plate with nowhere to go. Soon the Squire joined them, with his other son and his daughter. Apparently back in the Gong village their enemy Huang Da had recovered from his beating and after inquiries had traced Wang Qing to his present whereabouts. The previous day he had arrived in Fangzhou and informed the Governor. The latter had issued a warrant and sent a captain with troops of the local militia to arrest the murderer Wang Qing, together with Fan Quan, guilty of harbouring him, and the Duan family. Because he worked in the government office Fan Quan was friendly with the registrar of cases, who had leaked the news to him. He abandoned everything and raced back to say government troops would be there any minute, they were all for it! There was a general stamping of feet and beating of breasts, as if a henhouse had been overturned, a great deal of commotion, and everyone began to accuse Wang Qing of ruining Miss Duan. In the midst of all this the fortune-teller turned up. He stepped forward and said: "Ladies and gentlemen, if you want to get out of this, you'd better listen to me!"

They all crowded forward to hear what he had to say. "The damage is done," he said. "There are thirty-six things you can do in a crisis, but the best is always running away."

"But where can we go?" they clamoured.

"Mount Fang, House Mountain, is only a few mile west of here," he said.

"But that's the robbers' hideout," they said.

"Are you stupid, or what?" he said scathingly. "Do you really think you can go on as respectable citizens, as if nothing had happened?"

"Then what are we to do?" they said.

"I know Liao Li, the leader of the band there, quite well," he said. "He's got five or six hundred troops and the government forces can't catch him. You'll have to act fast. Pack up all your valuables and go there to join the band. It's the only way out."

Mr. Fang and the others were also afraid they'd eventually be implicated and were persuaded by Wang Qing and his wife to join them. All of them saw no other solution but to follow this path. Everything of any value on the estate was collected and packed up. Thirty or forty torches were lit. Then having completed their preparations nine of them — Wang Qing and his wife, her two brothers, Messers Fang. Qiu and Shi her relatives, the fortune-teller and Fan Quan the government official — buckled on swords and took up spears and halberds. The retainers were summoned and over forty of them said they wanted to go too, so they packed their things. The party would proceed with Wang Qing, Fortune-teller Li and Fan Quan in the lead, the ladies in the middle and Fang, Qiu and Shi bringing up the rear. Luckily the ladies had sturdy farmer's legs and could keep up with the men. The Duans were the last to leave and went round setting fire to their farm. With much cheering they shouldered their weapons and set off westwards. The people round about regarded these Duans with as much dread as a tiger so when they saw them passing with torches and cudgels and didn't know what was going on they simply bolted their doors. No one thought of interfering.

They had only gone a mile or so when they ran into the captain of militia and Huang Da who had joined forces to arrest them. The captain who was leading soon fell: Wang Qing's sword cut him in two and the rest of the party surged forward and scattered the militia men. Wang Qing also killed Huang Da.

They reached House Mountain a little before dawn. The fortune-teller proposed to go up the mountain first alone in order to explain what they wanted, before taking the rest of them up to join the band. Scouts in the stronghold saw the lights down below and reported it to their chief, who assumed it was government troops. Accustomed to think of them as useless, he rose quickly, armed himself and went down with some of his men to deal with them. Wang Qing saw lights coming down the mountain and then a body of men, and made preparations. When the robber chief got to the bottom and saw the people he realized they were not government troops. He levelled his spear and shouted: "What the fuck are you buggers doing disturbing my fortress? Don't you know you're tempting fate?"

The fortune-teller stepped forward and bowed. "Great prince, it is I, your friend Li Zhu," he said. He proceeded to explain about Wang Qing's crime and the killing of the governor and government troops. But when the chief heard him describe Wang Qing's qualities and saw he had all the Duans in support, it occurred to him that he was on his own and he began to fear that later on they might oppose him. So he turned to the fortune-teller and said: "There isn't room for all of you in this place of ours."

This in turn gave Wang Qing an idea, "They've only this one chief. If we get rid of him, what alternative will his troops have?" He raised his halberd and attacked. The bandit came angrily to meet him, twirling his lance. Fearing for her husband's safety Miss Duan joined in with her halberd. These 3 fought 10 bouts before one of them fell. What they say is true, it's near the well that the pot gets broken, the strong man dies by the sword!

The robber chief had only fought half a dozen bouts with Wang Qing and his wife when Wang Qing spotted an opening and ran him through with his halberd. Miss Duan rushed in and finished him off. This man had ruled his little world like a king, but now it was all a vain dream! Wang Qing put up his weapon and announced: "If there is anyone who objects, the same fate will be his!" None of the troops, seeing their leader dead, was prepared to argue. They switched their allegiance forthwith.

Wang Qing led the way up the mountain. By this time light was beginning to show in the east. All around the mountain were natural rock formations shaped like houses, whence its name of Mount Fang or House Mountain. Wang Qing made arrangements for everyone, organized the troops and inspected the camp's provisions and assets of cash and valuables. Oxen and horses were slaughtered, the troops rewarded, and wine was laid on for a general celebration. Wang Qing was elected leader. Thereafter arms were manufactured and the troops received training to prepare them for taking on the government forces. Of this no more.

Now some of the militia men and officers sent to arrest Wang Qing and defeated that same evening had managed to escape with their lives and went back to report to the governor of Fangzhou. "Wang Qing had been forewarned," they said. "They attacked us and killed the captain as well as the accuser Huang Da. They made off to the west."

The Governor was greatly disturbed. Next day a count was made of the militia and it was found that over thirty had been killed and another forty wounded. The Governor held a meeting with the officers of his garrison and ordered the bandit suppression force and troops of the garrison to pursue and capture the miscreants. The resistance was fierce and more government troops were killed. The bandits of House Mountain, with Wang Qing and his friends, began making regular forays down the mountain to pillage and burn. In the face of the bandits' unbridled savagery the Governor issued a proclamation ordering all districts to contribute troops from their own defence forces to aid in suppressing them. He also planned a campaign against them with his own defence chief, General Hu, who selected troops from the garrison, chose an auspicious day and set out on the campaign. But there was a sudden disturbance among the troops of both camps. The reason for this was that for two months they had not had any rations or pay and were half-starved. In this condition, how could they be expected to catch bandits? When news of the mutiny reached the Governor he was obliged for a start to supply a month's pay and rations. However this handout only made things worse! Why so? Well, the authorities were normally very stingy. Now that the troops found they only had to make a fuss and they were generously rewarded, they became quite overbearing. There was also a more trivial aspect. The forms of respect for authority had been neglected, becoming weaker and weaker until they dwindled to nothing. With the breakdown of discipline mutiny suddenly flared among the troops and they killed their general. The Governor decided things looked bad and, pausing only to rescue the official seal, fled the scene.

There was now no authority in the city. All the local vagabonds joined forces with the rebellious army and began looting and burning the houses of loyal citizens. The bandit Wang Qing, seeing the city in revolt, took the opportunity of marching his troops down to capture it. The rebellious troops and the malefactors in the city enlisted with the bandits. Thus Wang Qing gained advantage and was now able to make Fangzhou his base. In the end the Governor did not escape either — they killed him too.

Wang Qing seized all the contents of the Fangzhou stores and treasury and ordered Li the fortune-teller and the two Duans to muster troops on House Mountain and elsewhere, and lay in stores of fodder and grain. Villages were plundered far and wide. Vagabonds and disaffected folk poured into the city. The two Gong brothers, Wang Qing's former pupils in swordsmanship, who had been denounced by Huang Da and had all their property confiscated, heard that Wang Qing was raising an army and came to join up. Neighbouring cities were only concerned to defend themselves. No one there had a thought of coming after the rebels. Within two months the rebels had enlisted twenty thousand men and captured three more cities.

Nearby cities reported all this to the court and the court ordered the arrest of the rebels. But the Song army was short of supplies and the troops ill-trained; the men did not respect their commanders and the commanders did not know their men. Whenever the alarm was sounded, reports of the rebel strength grew to alarming proportions: the troops were paralysed with fear and the people's morale was shattered. The eve of a battle found the officers quaking in their boots and their forces weak and irresolute. Then of course Wang Qing and his lot threw everything into the attack and the government troops were bound to lose. So the disturbance caused by Wang Qing grew ever greater and he captured Nanfeng as well. When the court appointed a general, he had to present gifts to the Grand Preceptor and Marshal Tong and bribe Marshals Gao and Yang and even when they all had their bribes nothing got done. The general, having spent his own money and got power into his own hands, would act shamelessly, hanging on to the stores, discriminating against men of integrity, allowing the soldiers to rape and loot, antagonizing the local population and driving honest citizens into the arms of the rebels.

Thus the power of the rebels grew continuously and their territory began to expand. Fortune-teller Li, being originally from Jingnan, came up with a plan whereby he resumed his fortune-teller's garb, entered that city and secretly organized the riff raff into a resistance which, coordinated with the attack from outside, handed them the city. He was duly appointed military adviser and styled himself Prince Chu. Subsequently the rebels were joined by some important pirates and bandits.

Within three or four years the rebels had overrun six Song commands. Wang Qing built himself a great palace in Nanfeng, complete with courts and towers, and assumed a false imperial title. He copied the Song administrative system with its civil and military officials, its burocracy, palace ministers and generals. He gave important posts to all the founder members of his movement, including Fortune-teller Li, his in-laws the Duans, his relative Fan Quan and those former pupils in the art of the sword the Gong brothers. The former Miss Duan was now the imperial consort. In the spring of the fifth year of the Emperor's reign — during the time Song Jiang was in Hebei dealing with Tian Hu and on the day of the battle at Kettle Pass — Wang Qing's forces captured Yun'an and Wanzhou. They had now overrun eight military commands.

But once Wang Qing attacked Wanzhou, which was very close to the Eastern Capital, the Grand Preceptor and his cronies could no longer conceal everything from the Emperor. They requested him to order Cai the Younger, the Grand Preceptor's son, and Marshal Tong to attack Wang Qing and relieve Wanzhou. These two maintained no proper discipline: the ordinary soldiers were treated with the utmost harshness and their morale was at rock bottom. Therefore Wang Qing's forces were able to inflict a great defeat on them: Wanzhou was lost and the Eastern Capital came under serious threat. The two government generals were afraid they would be held accountable and withheld the truth from the Emperor. The rebels, followed up their success by besieging two more cities.

Song Jiang's army, having just pacified Hebei, now had to go and deal with the situation west of the river Huai. It was truly a case of "no time to enjoy the feast, the horse's hooves don't stop". With this great army of more than two hundred thousand they were moving south. They had crossed the Yellow River when a directive arrived from the War Council urging Commissioner Chen and Song Jiang to rush to relieve the two cities under siege. They urged their sweating mounts on through the summer heat, taking great care not to harm the local population in any way. The rebels heard of their approach and lifted their siege.

At this time Hotshot, Arrowtip and the Butler, after witnessing the execution of Tian Hu, had received the imperial favour and were hurrying to rejoin Song Jiang in the campaign against Wang Qing. A fortnight after they left the capital they met up with him. After the greetings they gave a full account of the Emperor's gracious treatment. Everyone was greatly impressed. Song Jiang told them to be ready for service.

Song Jiang requested Commissioner Chen, Marshal Hou and Academician Luo to set up their headquarters in the nearby town, which was unsuitable for quartering the army. He ordered the army to make camp at Mount Fangcheng, where the cool shade of the forest would provide protection from the heat. Because they had travelled hundreds of miles many of the men were suffering from sunstroke and he ordered Doctor An to prepare medicines for them. He also ordered them to erect awnings for the horses and instructed Redbeard to treat the horses and trim their manes.

The Professor said: "If the army camps in the forest there is a danger that the enemy might use fire."

Song Jiang said: "We'll have to take the risk." High up on the mountain he had them construct a small mountain refuge with shelters made of bamboo matting in a cool place under the trees. Then Qiao the Wizard, who had surrendered in Hebei, came to him and said: "I owe you a great debt for your magnanimity. I would like to suggest a way to protect the camp."

Song Jiang was pleased and when he had heard the plan in secret he sent the Wizard off to the mountain refuge. He selected thirty thousand strong men and told Hotshot and Arrowtip to take ten thousand cavalry to the foot of the east mountain to lay an ambush. The Chancellor and Lucky Bian were to lay an ambush with ten thousand cavalry under the west peak. When they heard the main force fire the big gun they were to attack. All the stores and fodder were to be piled up on the south, guarded by Skyhawk and Mr. Chai with five thousand men.

After these orders had been given Taoist Gongsun suddenly came and said: "It's a good plan, brother, but with the weather as hot as this the men always get sick and if the enemy made a sudden and determined attack our troops would have a hard time of it, even if they were ten times better than normal. Let me practise my art a little to get us all some respite and refresh the troops so they can regain their strength." He began to wave his sword and tread out the pattern of the Dipper, in his left hand the thunder seal, in his right hand the magic sword. Concentrating his mind and thinking deeply, he turned toward the southeast aspect and taking a deep breath, intoned a spell. In a moment a cool breeze began to blow, and clouds filled the sky and released their load on the mountain. The whole of Mount Fangcheng was streaming with water. Two hundred thousand men and horses breathed in the freshness with joyous relief. Everywhere else except just here on the mountain it was hot as a furnace, the cicadas whirring and birds and animals all hiding away. All of Song Jiang's men were delighted and exceedingly grateful for Taoist Gongsun's special powers. In less than a week Doctor An had put everyone back on their feet and Redbeard had got the horses back into shape; men and horses were all restored to full strength. Of this no more.

Now the rebel commander of Wanzhou was one of their best tacticians. They had dubbed him Uncle Know-all. When he learnt that Song Jiang's army were camped in the forests on the mountain to avoid the heat, he said: "That lot are all bandits from the marshes, they know nothing about military tactics. They don't amount to anything. Let me just put a little plan of mine into action. I'll make sure that of the two hundred thousand not half survive!" He gave his orders, selecting five thousand of his best troops equipped with fire arrows, rockets and torches. Two thousand carts were also marshalled and loaded with dry reeds and firewood, together with gunpowder and other incendiary materials, with four men to propel each cart. It was the seventh month, the beginning of autumn, when Uncle Know-all with his four commanders led out this force, taking ten thousand armoured cavalry in support, the riders in light armour and the horses without bells, and leaving two of his deputies to defend the city.

It was towards evening that they rode out and a strong breeze happened to get up. "It's a sign! Song Jiang is destined to lose this battle," Uncle Know-all exclaimed delightedly. By the third watch they were close to the southern slopes of Mount Fangcheng. Suddenly the valley was filled with mist. "Heaven is definitely on our side," said Uncle Know-all. He ordered the troops in the rear to assist by drumming and shouting. Then he ordered five thousand men to bombard the forests on the mountain with their fire arrows, rockets and torches and set fire to them. He ordered two of his commanders to roll the carts forward and set them on fire and then propel them towards the stores on the mountain. Everyone now charged forward. Then suddenly there came a cry: "Watch out!" It was extraordinary! The south wind that had been blowing strongly suddenly veered round to the north. Reports like thunder began to roll down from the mountain. Under the influence of the Wizard's power over wind and fire, the fire arrows and such all began to fly south into the ranks of the rebels. Like a million golden snakes and fire dragons twisting and turning, their own weapons flew towards them. There was no hope of dodging. The Song army celebrated this occasion with a verse making fun of Uncle Know-all:

A military scheme is hard to assess;
The rebels have landed themselves in a mess.
The fire that they used becomes their own pall.
Uncle Know-all, you see, does not know it all!

Song Jiang had told Thunderer to fire a signal shell: the shell climbed high into the sky and burst with a shattering roar. Then from the east Hotshot and Arrowtip, from the west the Chancellor and Lucky Bian, came charging out with their troops and the rebels were routed. One of their commanders was cut in half by the Chancellor, another was knocked from his horse by one of Jade Arrowtip's stones and finished off by Hotshot with his spear. A third was transfixed by Lucky Bian and a fourth was killed by his own troops. Most of the twenty-three thousand rebel troops were burnt to death. The remainder scattered and melted away. All the two thousand fire carts were destroyed by fire. Only Uncle Know-all and three or four hundred men got back alive to Wanzhou. The Song army lost nothing to the fire, not even its firewood. Not a soldier was injured. They took huge quantities of horses, uniforms, gongs and drums. After their victory Hotshot, the Chancellor and the rest returned to the camp to report their success. They presented the heads of the defeated rebel commanders, and Song Jiang rewarded them all for their efforts and mentioned the Wizard's contribution and the achievements of the others in his report.

The Professor said: "Your excellent plan, brother, has done for the rebels' morale, but the Wanzhou region is awkward terrain for us. It is an eminently fertile plateau, and if the rebels throw in more troops and defend it in force, we won't get control of it in a hurry. Now that the cool breezes and dews of autumn bring respite from the summer and the troops have recovered their strength, we should make the most of the fact that our strength is increasing while they are weak, and strike while the iron is hot. I am sure we can win."

Song Jiang approved and ordered Scimitar with nine others and thirty thousand cavalry to take up a position east of Wanzhou and prevent the rebel forces from the south reinforcing it. Leopard's Head also with nine others and thirty thousand cavalry were to take up a position west of Wanzhou and block the enemy forces from the north. The commanders went off to carry out these orders. Then the Chancellor with the seventeen others who had surrendered in Hebei came and said: "We are all very grateful to you for choosing us. As a small repayment of our debt of gratitude we would like to lead the attack on the city." Song Jiang accepted this proposal and ordered Hotshot and Jade Arrowtip to join them with fifty thousand cavalry. These commanders marched on Wanzhou.

Song Jiang, the Unicorn and the Professor, in command of the main contingent, struck camp and headed south from Mount Fangchen. They made camp a few miles from Wanzhou. Green-Eyes, Spots and the Nine-Tailed Turtle were put in charge of building defences and manufacturing arms. Hotshot and his friends were sent ahead on reconnaissance. They were stopped by the water around Wanzhou. Uncle Know-all, who had escaped, remember, from the Song trap, the moment he reached Wanzhou had sent a messenger to Wang Qing at Nanfeng and also requested reinforcements from all the neighbouring provinces. Now the city was surrounded by the Song army and he ordered his troops to defend the city strongly and make no attempt to counter-attack until the reinforcements came.

The Song army strove for nearly a week to take the city but its defences were solid and not to be broken down in a hurry. The rebel commander of Yuzhou to the north sent set out with a relieving force of twenty thousand but he was killed by Leopard's Head and all his troops scattered. The same day reinforcements approached from the south and were defeated by Scimitar. Their commanders were sent to Song Jiang to deal with. Many from both armies were executed.

At this time Green-Eyes was put to producing siege equipment, while the Chancellor, Magic Steed and their men laboured to fill sandbags and pile them up on all sides, pushing them up to the walls of the city. Daring and agile solders were chosen to cross the moat by means of flying bridges and windlasses. The troops fearlessly scaled the walls and took the city, capturing the commander Uncle Know-all alive. More than twenty of his officers were killed in the fighting and over five thousand troops. Ten thousand surrendered.

Song Jiang and the army entered Wanzhou. Uncle Know-all was executed and his head exposed as a lesson to the people. The deeds of Scimitar, Leopard's Head, Hotshot, the Chancellor and others were recorded. A report was sent to Commissioner Chen and a request that he come and take charge of the city.

The Commissioner was delighted with the news and soon arrived, together with Marshal Hou and Academician Luo. Song Jiang and the army welcomed them and the Commissioner of course was full of praise for their achievements.

Ten days passed while Song Jiang reviewed the military situation. It was already the beginning of the eighth month and the heat of summer had retreated. Song Jiang said to the Professor: "Which city should we attack first?"

The Professor said: "If we go south from here we come to Shannan, which gives access to their southernmost limit and also commands another city to the north. It is of great strategic importance to the region. If we take it, we have cut the enemy forces in two."

Song Jiang said: "Exactly what I was thinking." He left Colonel Hua and some others with fifty thousand troops to assist the Commissioner in defending Wanzhou. The Commissioner also retained the services of Magic Hand. The White-Water Dragon and the other boat commanders were told to take their boats and men and sail down the river, meeting up with them north of Shannan. The land army was divided into three. They bade the Commissioner farewell and with 150000 men marched on Shannan. Truly it was an example of

A great host on the march affrighting heaven and earth;
Battalions of warriors to make gods and ghosts quake.

A scholar fools a superior force; The sailors overwhelm the city's defences

Song Jiang has given orders for a combined land and water attack on Shannan, boats and cavalry working in conjunction. The land forces have been divided into the usual three columns. Scouts of the vanguard report that Wang Qing already has intelligence of their advance and has sent another twenty thousand troops under four commanders to oppose them. On hearing this Twin Spears orders the Chancellor and Lucky Bian to set up an ambush with five thousand men on his left flank and Magic Steed and Tang Bin to do likewise on his right flank and to attack when the signal is fired.

By the time these arrangements have been completed, the enemy are already advancing with flags and drums and a great deal of shouting. The two armies face each other, in full battle array, drawn up north and south. Each side keeps up a heavy fire of arrows and crossbow bolts. First of the rebel commanders is Mi Sheng, wearing a bronze helm, his bow painted with magpies and his arrows flighted with eagle's feathers, his face puce and his eyes fixed in a brazen stare. He carries a long-handled mountain-splitter of an axe and is seated on a tall chestnut with a curly mane.

"You bunch of robbers from the marshes, why have you joined forces with the unjust and despotic Song emperor, and why do you come here to die?" Mi Sheng shouted out.

On the Song side the drums thundered in response and out rode Hasty and yelled: "Watch your language, you rebel bandit! I'm going to give you a hundred blows of my axe!" Brandishing his gilt axe, he slapped his horse and charged.

A continuous roar arose from both armies as the two leaders met in the middle. Horses clashed, axes rose and fell, they fought fifty bouts and neither had the advantage. This enemy commander, Mi Sheng, was truly brave!

In the Song ranks Thunderclap saw that Hasty could not prevail and rode forward to join the fight, waving his wolf's-tooth mace. Another enemy leader met him with his halberd. These four fought it out in a cloud of dust and just as the fight was at its most furious a report sounded and the Chancellor and Lucky Bian attacked. They were met by another of the enemy com-manders, while Magic Steed and Tang Bin charged from the right flank and also encountered an enemy commander. Jade Arrowtip now came forward on the Song side and surreptitiously took out a stone and threw it. It caught Thunderclap's antagonist on the nose and knocked him from his horse. Thunderclap rode up and with a blow of his mace smashed both helmet and skull. On the left flank the Chancellor fought ten bouts with his opponent before his sword chopped the man from his horse. On the right Tang Bin also ran his opponent through. The rebel leader Mi Sheng, seeing his companions thus disadvantaged, thrust aside Hasty's gilt axe, slapped his horse and galloped off.

Hasty, the Chancellor and Magic Steed urged their followers to give chase and the rebels were routed. They pursued the enemy commander round the side of the hill, but there the enemy had laid an ambush of ten thousand cavalry, concealed in a dense wood, and two enemy leaders led this force out in support of the fleeing Mi Sheng, who now turned about and led the charge. Among the Song ranks Wen Zhongrong, one of the two robber chiefs of Mount Calf who had defected from Tian Hu's forces in Hebei, was eager for glory and charged to meet him. After ten bouts Mi's axe cut him in two. Maddened by the sight, his comrade Cui Ye galloped into the attack. When they had fought six or seven bouts Tang Bin slapped his horse and rode to his friend's assistance. Preferring not to face two at once, Mi Sheng gave a great cry and chopped Cui down before riding at Tang Bin.

At this point the husband and wife pair of Hotshot and Jade Arrowtip decided to intervene. Hotshot took a stone and launched it at Mi Sheng. The latter had a good eye and quick hands. He parried with his axe. Sparks flew and the stone clattered to the ground. Seeing her husband had missed, Arrowtip hurled a stone. Mi Sheng saw the second stone and ducked. It clanged on his bronze helmet. Now Spearsman and Twin Spears came out from the Song ranks in a furious charge. Faced by such a throng of enemy commanders, Mi Sheng blocked Tang Bin's lance, turned his horse and fled once more. Tang Bin gave chase, but the other two enemy commanders stood in his path and unfortunately Mi Sheng got away. They had to content themselves with killing the other two enemy commandeers and scattering their troops. Vast quantities of horses, drums and gongs, armour and uniforms were taken. Twin Spears ordered his men to retrieve the bodies of Wen Zhongrong and Cui Ye for burial. Tang Bin wept bitterly for his two companions and personally supervised the interment. Twin Spears and the others made camp with their men somewhere south of the mountain.

Next day Song Jiang and the other two columns arrived and joined up with Twin Spears and his men. Song Jiang was saddened by the loss of two allied commanders. Libations were poured and then he conferred with the Professor over their plans to take the city. The Professor and the Strategist mounted a siege tower to observe the city's defences. When they came down they told Song Jiang: "There is nothing to be gained by attacking such solid defences directly. We should let them think that we intend to attack, but just await developments." Song Jiang ordered the siege equipment to be withdrawn and sent out sharp-witted scouts to listen for news.

We shall leave Song Jiang there and tell how Mi Sheng with a mere two or three hundred horsemen had fled to Shannan. The garrison commander was Wang Qing's brother-in-law, Duan the Second. When Wang Qing heard that the court was sending Song Jiang there he had made Duan Commander-in-Chief of the eastern plain and sent him here to strengthen the city's defences. Mi Sheng now told him that Song Jiang's forces were redoubtable and that they had lost five of their own commanders and the army was no more. He begged him to provide troops so they could retaliate. Now Mi Sheng had been sent out by Wang Qing himself, that is why he dared to ask for troops. Duan was outraged: "Although you are not under my command, I will have you executed for suffering defeat and losing leaders!" He called his aides to come and carry out the sentence. At this point someone popped up and said: "Calm yourself, Marshal, and leave him alone!" The speaker was Wang Qing's special envoy, Zuo Mou. Duan said: "Why should I pardon him?"

"I have heard that he is very brave, and has killed two of the Song generals," said Zuo. "Song Jiang's forces are truly very strong. It will take reasoning to defeat them, not just brute force."

"What do you mean by reasoning?" Duan asked.

"All of Song Jiang's supplies are stored in Wanzhou, and have to be brought from there. I have heard that Wanzhou is weakly defended. You must send some of your people secretly to the commanders of the neighbouring towns and fix a date for them to attack Wanzhou from the south. I will select some crack troops here and put them under Mi Sheng's command. He will attack Wanzhou from the north and have a chance to redeem his fault. When Song Jiang hears about it he will withdraw his forces to protect Wanzhou. We will take advantage of this to attack from here and catch him between two fires. We will be able to capture him!"

Duan was a countryman, what did he know of military strategy? He accepted Zuo's plan without demur and sent people off immediately to the neighbouring towns of Jun and Gong to secure their cooperation. Then he put twenty thousand troops under the command of Mi Sheng and two others. They left by the west gate under cover of darkness with banners furled and drums silent and headed for Wanzhou.

Song Jiang at this moment was engaged in thinking about how to capture Shannan when his boat captain, White-Water Dragon, arrived and said: "The boats are all now tied up on the Han River or Xiang Water. I have come to know your wishes."

Song Jiang invited him to his tent and they were drinking a few cups of wine, when a scout came in with a report on something that was happening in the city and how the enemy had sent troops to attack Wanzhou. Somewhat alarmed, Song Jiang called in the Professor to discuss this.

The Professor said: "Commissioner Chen and Colonel Hua are brave and resourceful men, there is no need to be concerned about this development in Wanzhou; on the contrary it provides us here with the opportunity to take the city." He went on for a long time, expounding his secret plan to Song Jiang. Song Jiang was satisfied with it and passed on secret instructions to White-Water Dragon, also ordering the infantry commander Pluto with twenty other leaders and two thousand men to go with him that night under cover of darkness.

Meanwhile Mi Sheng and the other rebels were marching on Wanzhou. A scout reported the fact in Wanzhou and the Commissioner ordered Colonel Hua and Leopard's Head out with twenty thousand men to repulse them. As they were leaving the city a scout came in with an urgent report. "The rebel general Mi Sheng has arranged for reinforcements from Jun. There's thirty thousand of them just a few miles north of here." The Commissioner ordered Little Duke and the Halberdier to take twenty thousand troops out to counter this new threat. In less than two hours further urgent news arrived: "Two enemy commanders from Gong with thirty thousand men are approaching our west gate!"

They all looked at each other in horror. "We've only two military commanders left in the city, the Son-in-Law and Hound," they were thinking: "We've ten thousand troops, but half of them are old and infirm. How can they defend us?"

Then Magic Hand spoke: "No need to worry, Commissioner. I have a plan." Folding two fingers together, he proceeded: "We do thus and thus and thus … and we've got them!" Everyone from the Commissioner down nodded approval. The Commissioner gave the necessary orders and told the Son-in-Law and Hound to choose five thousand strong men and lay an ambush at the west gate to attack the enemy when they were retreating. They left to carry out his instructions. He also told the old and infirm soldiers that they were not needed to defend the city. Their job was to hide all the flags and banners until a shot was fired from the west gate tower, when they should raise them all at once. They were to remain under cover and not leave the city. He next had wine and pots of food carried to the west gate tower and a banquet laid out there. Then with Marshal Hou and Academician Luo he went up into the gate tower where they put on a show of drinking, with much laughter and animated talk, after telling their men to open the gates wide for the enemy. After quite a while, the two enemy commanders with ten of their lieutenants arrived in a tumultuous throng. They saw the gates wide open and the three officials and a scholar up in the gate tower drinking amid sounds of merriment and loud music. Not a flag did they see flying on any of the walls. General Ji from Jun hesitated. He was afraid to advance. The second commander said: "They must be ready for us. We'd better withdraw at once, or we'll be caught in their trap." Ji gave the order, and as he did so a gun went off in the tower with a thunderous report and drums shattered the silence, while countless banners rose on the walls. The rebel troops had heard what their commanders were saying and it had made them nervous. Now they saw what was happening in the city they panicked, without a blow having been struck. When the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound charged out of the city the rebels fled, abandoning countless drums and trumpets, uniforms, arms, horses and armour. More than ten thousand were killed. The two generals were killed by their own troops in the stampede and the remaining officers fled for their lives. The Son-in-Law and Hound recalled their troops and returned victorious to the city. To the north Colonel Hua and Leopard's Head had already killed the other two rebel generals and scattered their troops. Only Mi Sheng got away.

Just as this contingent were returning victorious to the city, it was reported that two more rebel columns were approaching. The western force had already been broken up by Magic Hand's cunning plan. To the south, where Little Duke and Halberdier were fighting, the issue remained in the balance. Colonel Hua's force were ordered south immediately to assist Little Duke and the Halberdier, who were involved in fierce fighting. They knocked the rebels for six, scattering them to the four winds, killing and capturing many. More than thirty thousand died that day from the three rebel columns and countless numbers were wounded: the fields were littered with corpses, the ditches running with blood.

Leopard's Head and his companions called in their troops and entered the city. Along with the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound they went to the government office to report their success. Commissioner Chen and the other officials were delighted and Magic Hand's clever plan came in for special praise as well as the bravery of Colonel Hua and his comrades. These heroes modestly kept quiet.

The Commissioner ordered a celebration feast for the commanders, while their troops were rewarded. The exploits were recorded in despatches and the city's defences put in order. Of this no more.

As for Duan the Second, the night after he had sent his troops out of the city, he climbed the watchtower to have a look at the besieging Song army. It was getting on for the middle of the eighth month and the moon nearly at the full, illuminating the scene as brightly as daylight. He saw a flurry of flags and banners hurriedly retreating north. He said to his aide: "Song Jiang must have heard about the threat to Wanzhou so he is withdrawing."

"You're right," said the aide. "We can send out a force of armoured cavalry to attack them."

Looking westward from the city, Duan noticed flood water reflecting the moonlight and shining light everywhere. Over this expanse Song supply ships were slowly being poled northward. Now Duan was a robber at heart and when he saw so many loaded boats sailing past, with no sign of a military guard, just a crew of six or seven to each boat, he quickly ordered his men to open the west watergate and told his boat commander to take five hundred warships and attack the transports. The Song troops on the boats responded by hurriedly lining them up alongside the shore and jumping out. As the rebel commander bore down on them, some kind of loud signal was emitted from the boats and hundreds of little fishing boats began pulling away, each with two men rowing and three or four bearing shields and javelins or short halberds. As these came flying towards them, the rebel commander ordered his men to fire rockets and fire arrows at them. Apparently deterred by this, the crews of the fishing boats leapt into the water with loud cries and disappeared.

Having apparently won the contest, the rebels seized the boats and their commander told the sailors to row them into the city. The first boat was just in when the order came that all boats were to be searched before they entered. The commander told them to begin by searching the boat that was already inside, and about half a dozen men went on board. But when they tried to remove the decking, it seemed to be made of solid timber and they couldn't shift it. The commander began to smell a rat: "It must be some trick!" he said. He ordered axemen to break the deck open and see what was inside. "Don't take any of these boats into the city," he was saying, when three or four of the rearmost transports outside the city began to move forward, without human agency, as if drifting with the current or propelled by the wind. Now he knew it was a trap and he tried to jump ashore, but a dozen men with cutlasses in their mouths emerged from the water.

It was White-Water Dragon and his seven companions White Eel, the Pilot, the Ruans, Cave Dragon and River Rider. The rebels tried to draw their weapons but White-Water Dragon blew a whistle and the infantry commanders and their men concealed on the hindmost boats broke open the decking and sprang out with a shout. They were armed with short spears and there were twenty leaders and a thousand infantrymen. They went to work at once, leaping out onto the bank and slaughtering rebels. The latter offered no serious resistance but fled in disorder. Their commander was killed by Cave Dragon. The greater part of the sailors were killed by White-Water Dragon's men outside or inside the city and the water ran red. They seized the watergate. Pluto and his savage company guarded Thunderer as he let off the signal shell with a shattering roar and then went off killing and burning on their own account. The city was in a frenzy all this time, brother calling to brother, sons searching for fathers, lamentations rising to heaven. Duan heard and rushed with his troops to the rescue but he ran into Pilgrim and company. He was wounded in the leg by a blow from Fleetfoot's halberd and taken alive. Monk, Iron Ox and ten others raced to the north gate, scattered the guards there, and opened it and lowered the drawbridge. Hearing the uproar and the shells Song Jiang's army attacked. They met the other two rebel commanders and a fierce battle ensued. Lucky Bian killed one of the rebels and the other was knocked down by the Wizard and trampled into the mud. The best part of the thirty thousand armoured cavalry were killed. The Chancellor, Lucky and Magic Steed led their forces into the city through the north gate. The rebels were routed, the city taken, and Song Jiang was invited to enter with the main army.

It was now the fifth watch. Song Jiang gave orders for the fires to be put out and no harm done to the people. As soon as it was light a proclamation was issued to restore peace and the commanders presented their trophies. Fleetfoot brought in Duan the Second, bound hand and foot. Song Jiang sent him under escort to the Commissioner to be dealt with. The commander of the city garrison had already been killed by his own men. Many others were killed and over ten thousand of the rebel garrison sur-rendered. Song Jiang had oxen and horses slaughtered to reward his army and recorded the exploits of White-Water Dragon and his comrades. Magic Steed was sent off to report the victory to the Commissioner and to obtain news of the rebel movements. Not many hours later he was back and reported: "The Commissioner is delighted and has sent off a report of his own to the court." He went on to tell them about Magic Hand's scheme and Song Jiang was alarmed. "What if the enemy had seen through it? That's typical of a scholar!"

He ordered the grain stores to be opened up to relieve the people whose property had been burnt by the soldiers. When all the military affairs had been settled, he conferred with the Professor about how to attack Jingnan. Suddenly word came from the Commissioner that rebel bands from the Western Capital were running amok, infringing on districts of the Eastern Capital, and that Song Jiang was to pacify the Western Capital first before attacking Wang Qing's base. He had also appended a note of his own critical of the Military Council. Song Jiang and the Professor now discussed how to divide their forces so they could simultaneously attack Jingnan and the Western Capital. Then the Deputy Commander-in-Chief, the Unicorn, with the generals who had come over to them in Hebei, volunteered for the attack on the Western Capital. Song Jiang approved this and appointed twenty-four leaders and 50000 troops under the Unicorn for the job. The Unicorn and his force set off the same day. Song Jiang left Tattooed Dragon and some others in charge at Shannan. He told him: "If the enemy comes, just concentrate on defence." He himself led 80000 troops to attack Jingnan. Then this great force swept forward like a river in flood, men and horses swift as the wind. Truly you could say

A host of banners and pennants paint the sky red;

Song Jiang wins a great victory at Mount Ji; The Strategist smashes the 6 flower formation

So Song Jiang and his army advanced on Jingnan. They covered twenty miles a day before stopping for the night. In the places they passed the people suffered not the slightest aggravation. The cavalry finally made camp in the region of Mount Ji.

Mount Ji, north of Jingnan, had great strategic importance. It was guarded by a bandit named Li Rang with thirty thousand troops under his command. He was a relative of Li the fortune-teller and Wang Qing had appointed him District Commander. When he heard that Song Jiang had taken Shannan and captured Duan the Second, he sent an urgent messenger to Nanfeng informing Wang Qing and his relative the fortune-teller as follows: "The Song army is very strong. They have already taken two main cities. Now they're advancing on Jingnan and a detachment under the Unicorn is headed for the Western Capital." Greatly disturbed by this news, Fortune-teller Li entered the palace to tell Wang Qing. A palace attendant went in and reappeared a moment later to say: "Please wait, General. His Majesty will be out in a moment." Fortune-teller Li waited and waited and nothing happened. He made inquiries of one of the palace officials who was a friend of his and was told: "The King and his consort have just had a big fight!"

"What about?" he asked.

The official whispered in his ear: "The King hasn't been to her apartments for ages, because she's ugly. She's mad at him!"

He waited a while longer. The attendant came out again and said: "His Majesty asked me to come and see if you're still here."

"I've been waiting hours!" he said. The attendant went back inside and in a little while, closely surrounded by a bevy of ladies-in-waiting, Wang Qing came out and ascended his throne in the outer chamber. Fortune-teller Li bowed low and said: "Sire, my cousin Li Rang reports that Song Jiang with a strong army has captured Wanzhou and Shannan and is now advancing in two columns, one to attack the Western Capital and the other to attack Jingnan. I entreat Your Majesty to send a relief force."

Wang Qing was outraged. "What, that bunch of robbers from the marshes!" he exclaimed. "What's so terrible about them?" He gave orders for General Du Bo with twelve officers and twenty thousand men to relieve the Western Capital and Marshal Xie Yu with a force of equal size to relieve Jingnan. These two took their warrants, picked their troops and prepared their arms. The bogus military council made out the appointments and put Quarter-Master General Gong Zheng, elder of the two Gong brothers, with two assistants in charge of supplies. They all took leave of Wang Qing and set off on their separate routes. Of this no more.

Meanwhile Song Jiang's army had halted and made camp a few miles north of Mount Ji and were preparing for the attack, when scouts returned with news of the enemy's movements. Song Jiang discussed things with the Professor and then told the others: "We have heard that Li Rang has brave men under his command and Mount Ji is of great strategic importance to Jingnan. Although we outnumber them, their position is strong, whereas ours is overlooked by the mountain and is dominated by them. This Li Rang, what's more, is a cunning bastard. If you get into a fight with him you will have to watch out. Don't take anything for granted."

Then he gave the order: "Go back into camp, secure the gates and clear the decks. Any unauthorized moving about or shouting will be punished. Failure to carry out an order immediately will be punished." From then on discipline was strictly maintained. Song Jiang sent Magic Messenger with orders for White-Water Dragon and his company to guard the transports closely and bring them up gradually to supply the army. He sent an envoy to challenge Li Rang to a showdown the following day. He appointed eight leaders with twenty thousand men to lead the assault. To another four leaders and two thousand men he gave the task of cutting down trees to clear a route for their advance and form a battlefield. The rest would remain with him to defend the camp.

Next day they breakfasted before dawn. By the time men and horses had all had their fill it was daylight and they were ready for action. Li Rang with his five lieutenants and twenty thousand troops came charging down from the mountain. These five were the boldest among the rebels and Wang Qing had made them his special strike force. They now came face to face with Thunderclap and his colleagues. They lined up at the foot of the northern slope, with reinforcements above them on the mountain. There was much waving of signal flags now among both armies as they formed up for battle. Both loosed volleys of arrows at the opposing ranks, while the drums thundered and many-coloured standards dazzled the eye. An opening appeared among the rebel ranks and Commander Yuan Lang rode out. He had a helmet of weathered bronze, and black chainmail. He rode a black charger with a curly mane. His face was red and his hair brown. He carried two hammers of polished, hardened steel, the one in his left hand weighing fifteen catties, the one in his right hand sixteen. He shouted out: "Which of you bog-dwelling outlaws dares step forward and face death?"

From the Song ranks two of the commanders who had come over to them in Hebei, Huang and Jin, wanting to have some achievement to their names, galloped forward and hurled abuse: "You traitorous villain, how do you dare show your face?" One of them whirled his windsplitter of a sword, the other twirled a spear of pure steel, as they charged. The rebel commandeer came to meet them. The three horses and riders fought in a T-shape. After thirty bouts Yuan Lang parried and then turned his horse and galloped off. As the Song commanders rode in pursuit, he suddenly turned his horse. Jin, who was in front, struck out with his sword, but the rebel raised his left arm to block the blow and Jin's sword missed its mark. Before he could recover, the hammer in Yuan Lang's right hand struck right through the helmet and shattered his skull. He fell from his horse. His companion Huang now arrived and thrust with his spear at Yuan Lang's heart. The latter was sharp-eyed and quick of hand and swayed aside so that Huang's spear met only air and slipped harmlessly past his ribs. Yuan Lang tucked the hammer under his left arm and with the right hand grasped the shaft of his opponent's spear. He gave it a tug and Huang started to fall towards him. Catching him with his right hand round the waist and holding onto his horse, he threw him to the ground. The troops applauded and rushed forward to take Huang prisoner, while the horse galloped back riderless to the Song ranks.

Now Thunderclap, seeing these two commanders lost, was moved to anger. Forcing his horse forward and whirling his wolf's tooth mace, he attacked the rebel. The latter advanced to meet him, spinning his hammers. When they had fought more than fifty bouts, Jade Arrowtip galloped out to join Thunderclap, on her silver grey charger, square halberd at the ready. On her head was set a purple and gold winged cap; she wore a war robe of finely embroidered red silk and was encased in armour of silver chainmail interlaced with gold.

Another of the rebel leaders, seeing it was a woman attacking them, laughed and said: "You can see Song Jiang and his friends have no breeding! How can they let a woman ride into battle?" So saying he went to meet Arrowtip's attack brandishing his three-pointed double-bladed sword. After ten bouts Arrowtip knocked aside his blade with her halberd and galloped back towards her own ranks. With a shout he urged his horse after her. Reaching into her embroidered saddle bag she surreptitiously took out a stone and bending her willow waist took aim at the rebel and let fly. It hit him square in the face causing terrible lacerations. Blood poured out and he fell headlong from his mount. She abruptly turned her horse and finished him off with a blow of her halberd.

When the brother of Arrowtip's victim saw him die at the hands of the woman warrior, a great anger rose in his breast. He slapped his horse and rode at her, whirling a jointed tiger's eye chain. Twin Rods galloped to intercept him. Everyone stopped to watch them go at it. There was really nothing to choose between them, it was six of one to half a dozen of the other! Twin Rods had a steel helmet with a towering crest, a yellow silk headband shot with gold, a black silk robe with seven stars and oiled black chainmail. He rode a black charger with white socks. The other also had a crested helmet, a red silk headband, a black silk robe patterned with blue flowers, oiled black chainmail threaded with gold and he rode a fiery chestnut. Twin Rods also had his octagonal rods of burnished steel. The pair of them traded blows in front of the armies, coming and going, this way, that way, and after fifty bouts there was still no victor.

Thunderclap and his opponent by now had fought a hundred and fifty bouts. Watching from the top of a knoll the rebel bandit leader Li Rang had seen the woman warrior with her deadly stone throwing knock out one of theirs and ordered a retreat. Thunderclap and Twin Rods did not give chase. Their two opponents carefully guarding their backs returned to their own ranks and the rebel force withdrew up the mountain.

Thunderclap called in his troops and returned to camp. He reported that the enemy commanders were very brave, that they had taken the lives of two of his commanders and that but for Hotshot's wife his troops would have been completely demoral-ized. Song Jiang was exceedingly disturbed. "How are we ever going to capture Jingnan then?" he said to the Professor. The latter, crossing two fingers, expounded a plan. "The only way is to do thus ... and thus ... and thus."

Song Jiang accepted the plan and ordered the Monk and thirteen others together with Thunderer and five thousand brave infantrymen to go by night with the moon dark, wearing light armour and carrying short weapons, bucklers, throwing knives and javelins, and make their way by the small trails to the other side of the mountain. They set off.

Next morning Li Rang sent down his war declaration. Song Jiang and the Professor discussed it. The Professor said: "They must have something up their sleeve. Monk and his party should have got themselves into position by now. We must prepare for battle at once."

Song Jiang accepted Li Rang's challenge immediately and a soldier was sent up the mountain with his reply. Thunderclap and company were instructed to lead the attack as previously. They would attack with twenty thousand troops, with bows and crossbows in the outer ranks and halberds and shields on the inside, war carts going in front and cavalry behind in support. Tamer and three others were to wait in the camp with ten thousand men; Skyhawk with a similar force was also stationed inside the camp. "When you hear our signal from the front line, bring your men up on the east and west flanks." Scimitar and six others with twenty thousand cavalry and infantry were stationed behind the camp to prevent reinforcements reaching the rebels. The whole operation was directed by Song Jiang himself, the Professor and Taoist Gongsun. The rest of them would guard the camp. Early in the morning the Professor mounted a siege tower to observe. The terrain was rough and difficult and he hurriedly ordered the army to pull back a little way to allow the relief columns room for manoeuvre.

They were just completing this operation when the rebel leader Li Rang with his four lieutenants and twenty-five thousand troops appeared on the slopes of Mount Ji. One of these lieutenants had told his men to display the remains of Huang on bamboo poles. There were five thousand armoured cavalry. The riders all wore full helmets and chainmail so that only their eyes showed. The horses also had full armour and only their hooves were exposed. This was because Li Rang had seen the day before how the woman warrior wounded one of his commanders with a stone. Like this even if stones were thrown the armour would give protection. The cavalry were in threes, two archers supporting a spearsman. They charged and the main force followed behind in two columns. The onslaught was too fierce for the Song forces who were pushed back. Song Jiang hurriedly ordered the signal to be fired. Already a hundred or so soldiers pushing the carts had been wounded, but it was as well the carts were there because they prevented the armoured cavalry from getting through. On the other hand, the cavalry behind the carts were unable to charge.

At this critical moment a string of reports sounded from the mountain. It was Monk and his party who had scaled the ridge and now launched their attack. The enemy camp was only defended by five thousand superannuated soldiers and a deputy commander. Monk and his men killed them all and the camp was in their hands. When Li Rang saw his camp had fallen to the enemy, he tried to retreat, but he ran into Tamer and Skyhawk, advancing in two columns. Song Jiang also ordered the artillery to fire on the armoured cavalry and the rebels were routed. Monk, Iron Ox and their companions now poured down the mountain-side and set on the enemy, scattering them to the four winds. The unfortunate Yuan Lang, a brave leader, was killed by a shell; Li Rang was killed by Monk; two others died in the mêlée and only one escaped. Vast quantities of helmets and armour, gongs and drums and horses were taken. Most of the thirty thousand troops were killed. Corpses littered the mountainside. When Song Jiang recalled his troops and they were counted, they were found to have suffered over a thousand dead. As night was now approaching they made camp there north of the mountain.

Next morning Song Jiang marched up the mountain. After appropriating all the gold and silver and stores, they set fire to the camp. The commanders were rewarded and the exploits of Monk and his companions and of Jade Arrowtip were recorded. Then the army was ordered to march. They next made camp five miles outside Jingnan. The Professor was consulted about how to attack the city. Of this no more.

Here our story divides. We must go back to the Unicorn's column, which we left advancing on the Western Capital. They forged ahead, surmounting all obstacles. One of the places they passed through was Baofeng, where the rebel commander Wu Shun and his men came out with incense and candles and surrendered the city to them, expressing their desire to renew their allegiance to the Emperor. The Unicorn proclaimed peace and reappointed Wu Shun as governor of the city. All the rebel leaders were grateful and gave evidence of their gratitude by abandoning their wicked ways and returning to the path of righteous-ness. After this, for the Unicorn and his men the troubles seemed to be over. They moved rapidly and without wasting a day reached a point ten miles south of the Western Capital, a hill known as the Watchtower, and made camp. They learnt that the city was under the command of Gong Duan, second of the Gong brothers, and his deputy Xi Sheng and a crowd of brave officers. This Xi Sheng was a good tactician and also versed in magic arts. When the Unicorn conferred with the Strategist to devise a plan for taking the city, the latter said: "I have heard that Xi Sheng is a passable soldier and he will certainly attack us. Let our army take up a position and then wait till the enemy attack. We will not rush into it."

"Excellent advice!" said the Unicorn and ordered his army to take up a position on the plain south of the mountains in the revolving ring formation.

As they waited the enemy were seen advancing in three columns, red banners in the centre, blue banners on the left and red banners on the right. When they came within range of the Song formation the rebel commander split off the blue and red banners on the left and right and had them take up positions on either flank. He mounted a siege platform to observe the enemy and when he saw they were drawn up in the revolving ring, he came down and said: "That formation is old hat. I'll show them a formation that'll put the wind up them!" He mounted the platform again, ordered the drums to beat and with two signal flags directed the deployment of his army. When the left and right flanks were properly lined up, he came down again, mounted his horse and with his commanders rode out in front to parley with the Unicorn. Reining in his horse in front of his troops, he shouted: "Who do you think you can fool with that revolving ring formation of yours? Do you know what my formation is?"

Realizing it was a competition in strategy, the Unicorn went up onto a siege platform with the Strategist to look. The enemy formation was based on threes — three men to a squad, three squads to a platoon and five platoons to a company, forming a square on the outside and a circle on the inside, with the bigger units enclosing the smaller, making it all continuous and interdependent.

The Strategist said: "This is Doctor Li's 'Six-lobed formation'. The good doctor cut Zhuge Liang's original eight lines to six. The rebel leader thinks he can scare us with a formation we don't know. He doesn't realize that this eight line formation of ours can turn into eight by eight, giving sixty-four, in other words Zhuge Liang's eight line formation, which can smash his six-lobed one."

The Unicorn rode out in front and called out with a laugh: "Do you really believe this paltry six-lobed formation of yours can cause us any surprises?" He returned to the army and the Strategist went up onto the dais and began waving the signal flags this way and that and the eight line formation began to change. Then he told the Unicorn to give the order for the Blue-Faced Beast, the Chancellor and Lucky Bian to lead two thousand armoured cavalry into battle. The sign for the day was metal so the troops that were thrown into the attack had to be brought up from positions on the south, the direction of fire. When Blue-Faced Beast received the command, he ordered three rolls of the drum and then advanced against the enemy's western position. At this point, the Unicorn led Magic Steed and others in a charge on the left flank. They raced forward and routed the enemy. In their advance, Blue-Faced Beast and company clashed with Xi Sheng. The latter fled north, protected by a group of brave commanders. The Chancellor and Lucky Bian were eager to acquire merit and rushed after them, not realizing they were riding into a trap. Suddenly there were thunderous reports from the mountain and a troop of horsemen raced out. The Blue-Faced Beast's company tried to turn back but it was too late. Truly, it was a case of

The Wizard raises a fog & captures the city; Mr. Chai stores up ammunition to fight the enemy

Racing towards Watchtower Mountain in pursuit of Gong Duan's general Xi Sheng, the Blue-Faced Beast and company fail to observe an enemy ambush behind the shoulder of the hill. Ten thousand rebel cavalry rush out and engage them in a fierce fight, while the troops they are pursuing escape to the safety of the city. The Chancellor did his utmost and two of the rebel commanders were killed, but with only a thousand men the Song detachment were totally outnumbered and got driven deep into a ravine. Surrounded on all sides by sheer cliffs they had no way out. The enemy closed off the entrance with tree trunks and rocks and reported back to the city's governor, Gong Duan, who stationed two thousand troops at the mouth of the ravine. Unless they grew wings there was no way they could escape.

We shall leave Blue-Faced Beast bottled up in there and return to the Unicorn who defeated Xi Sheng's six-lobed formation — largely thanks to Magic Steed's skill with the metal block, which he employed to knock down a considerable number of the enemy, as well as to the bravery of the others — and secured a great victory, killing three of the rebel leaders. He pressed home the advantage by taking Dragon Gate Pass, with the loss of over ten thousand of the enemy, capturing besides vast quantities of horses, helmets and armour, gongs and drums as the enemy retreated into the Western Capital.

When the Unicorn's forces were counted, only the Blue-Faced Beast and his companions were missing, with their one thousand cavalry. The Unicorn ordered Snake, Scorpion, the Forester and Rhinoceros, with a thousand men each, to spread out and search in every direction. But by nightfall they had still found nothing.

Next day the Unicorn stayed put and ordered the search to be continued. Snake and his party scaled cliffs and conquered heights, scrambling up through the undergrowth till they reached the highest peak of Watchtower Mountain on the east. Looking west from the summit, they thought they could make out a group of men and horses deep within a hidden valley, but so thick were the trees and vegetation they could see nothing clearly and they were so high above that no sound would carry. Snake ordered them to descend, looking out on the way for locals whom they could question. They saw no one. The inhabitants had all been forced out of their homes by the fighting. Eventually they came to a level area in a very remote corner of the mountain where there were a few houses belonging to some impoverished peasants, who huddled together in terror when they saw troops. Snake said to them: "We are soldiers of the imperial army, sent here to arrest bandits." This only increased their consternation. Snake said soothingly: "We serve under General Song Jiang."

"Would that be the one as killed the savages, captured Tian Hu and never did no harm to the locals?"

"That's him!" said Snake.

They knelt and said: "You're not come here to take our chickens and steal our dogs, then? Last year when government troops come to catch bandits they behaved worse nor bandits theirselves. That's why we come here, to get away. Uncommon glad to see you we be sir!"

Snake told them about the disappearance of the Blue-Faced Beast and his thousand troops and that hidden valley west of the peak.

"Windy Valley, that's what it be called," they said. "There be only one way in." They took Snake and his men to the mouth of the valley. As luck would have it, Forester and Rhinoceros got there at the same moment. They joined forces and attacked the rebel guards, putting them to flight. They set about clearing the logs and rocks together and then Snake and Forester advanced into the valley. The season was autumn so you can just imagine what the valley was like!

A gloom is cast over cliffs and vales,
The trees are chilled by autumn's breath;
Above, the vapour smokes and swirls,

Blue-Faced Beast and his forces, men and horses, were lying about exhausted under the trees, but when they saw the search party they leapt to their feet. After Snake had distributed the dry rations he had brought, to allay the pangs of hunger, they made their way out of the valley. Snake took the villagers with them to meet the Unicorn. The latter gratefully gave them silver and grain to relieve their wants. They kowtowed in thanks and departed calling down blessings on his head. Later Scorpion also returned to camp. By then it was late and they went to bed and passed an uneventful night.

Next morning the Unicorn was discussing with the Strategist the disposition of troops for attacking the city. Suddenly a messenger arrived to say that Wang Qing was sending a relief force under general Du Bo, with twelve officers and twenty thousand troops and they were only ten miles away. The Unicorn told the Strategist and six others to take twenty thousand men and position themselves in front of the camp to prevent any sortie from the city. Snake and three others were given five thousand troops to defend the mountain stronghold on Mount Ji. He himself would take the rest, thirty-five thousand troops, to meet the enemy.

Then the Prodigy spoke up. "You should not get involved in this battle yourself, sir."

"Why do you say that?" said the Unicorn.

"Last night I had an unlucky dream," he said.

"The things that come to you in sleep are not to be trusted. Danger is of no concern when one serves one's country."

"If you are determined to go, please give me five hundred infantrymen to do something."

The Unicorn laughed. "What do you plan to do, lad?"

"You needn't worry about that. Just give me the men."

"All right then, I will. I can't wait to see what you do with them!" said the Unicorn. He went on laughing at the Prodigy after the latter led his command away.

The Unicorn now set out with the main army. When they crossed the bridge over the river Ping, where there were many strange stones that had been there since the days of the Tang, they saw the Prodigy and his men cutting down trees. Although the Unicorn thought this was pretty odd he was impatient to start the battle so there was no time to stop and ask questions. He marched to a few miles west of Dragon Gate and drew his troops up in line to the west and waited for the enemy. Two hours later they appeared. Drums thundered and shouts rose to the sky as the two armies faced each other. On the west the rebel second-in-command, Wei Ho flourished his long-handled sword, slapped his horse and rode out in front. On the Song side Shan Shiqi, one of Lucky's comrades, received his attack without a word, seated on his prancing steed, his lance at the ready. They fought it out for thirty bouts and then Shan's lance caught Wei's horse in the hind leg. The animal lashed out with its hind legs and threw its rider. With another thrust of his spear Shan killed him.

Among the rebel ranks Feng Tai was enraged and whirling a pair of steel rods he slapped his horse and charged Shan. They had fought ten bouts or more when Lucky Bian, seeing his companion could not get the better of his adversary, readied his lance and joined in. Feng gave a great roar and thrust with his lance knocking Shan from his horse and putting an end to him with a second thrust. Then he turned on his new assailant. But Lucky was a tougher proposition. As Feng's horse drew level he gave a shout and thrust his spear into Feng's chest, killing him in the saddle. A cry went up from both sides. The rebel commander Du Bo, seeing he had now lost two of his commanders, felt a fire in his breast, he was smoking with anger. He levelled his long lance and rode into battle himself. From the other side the Unicorn also advanced and fought fifty bouts with him and neither had the advantage. That long serpent lance of Du Bo's was enough to scare a ghost. The Chancellor saw the Unicorn could not win this fight and galloped to assist him. The rebel leader Zhuo Mao rode at him whirling a wolf's-tooth mace. Before they had completed five bouts the Chancellor's greater experience took effect and he knocked his opponent from his horse. Then he turned and rode at Du Bo. Du saw him kill Zhuo and before he could strike a blow himself the Chancellor's sword fell on him too, cutting off his right arm and hurling him to the ground. The Unicorn finished him off. Now the Unicorn and his companions pushed the enemy back, inflicting a great defeat on them.

Suddenly a troop of horsemen appeared from a small path to the southwest. At the head of them was a rider of swarthy complexion and uncouth appearance, with flourishing whiskers and short hair, wearing a Taoist's cap of iron and a travelling robe and mounted on a fiery chestnut. Grasping his sword and waving his troops on, he made his horse caper and bounded forward. The Unicorn and his men could see his rebel insignia and they urged their men to charge. He made no attempt to engage them but began to mutter the words of a spell. Then he slashed with his sword to the south and instantly fire spurted from his mouth. Moments later the whole waste ground between the armies was on fire and the flames were racing towards the Song side. The battle was lost before the Unicorn could do anything about it. Abandoning drums, gongs and horses, his men fled in disarray. Those who were too slow had their heads and foreheads seared. More than five thousand died like this. Surrounded by his commanders the Unicorn raced back to the River Ping Bridge.

Just as the first of the men set foot on the bridge to cross, it collapsed in ruins. It was indeed fortunate that the Prodigy had cut down trees on either side and constructed a pontoon bridge so they were still able to make the crossing and twenty thousand survived. The Unicorn and Lucky Bian fell behind in the race for the crossing and just as they reached it the enemy commander caught up with them and spat fire at Lucky, whose whole body was engulfed in flames. He fell flaming from his horse and was killed by the enemy troops. The Unicorn was fortunate to make it to the floating bridge and escape.

As the pursuing enemy were coming up, the foremost troops informed the Wizard. The latter rode out alone sword in hand to meet the enemy leader. When the enemy leader saw him, he again shaped a blow with his sword toward the south and the fire he breathed this time was fiercer than before. The Wizard composed a secret formula and pointed with his sword to one side to summon the three water spirits. In an instant flocks of black clouds streamed across and disgorged foaming cascades of water which fell in a billion, billion drops like tiny pearls or specks of jade dust, drenching the rebel leader and dowsing his fire. When he saw his magic had failed, he turned his horse and galloped away, but the horse trod on a wet stone and stumbled, throwing its rider to the ground. The Wizard raced after him and cut him in two with his sword. Of the five thousand cavalry more than five hundred were trampled down. The Wizard waved his sword and shouted out: "Surrender at once or you'll all lose your asses' heads!"

It was too much for the rebels! They dismounted and sur-rendered their weapons, begging for mercy. The Wizard reassured them with kind words and had the head of the rebel leader exposed. He presented the prisoners to the Unicorn, who was profuse in his thanks and also praised the Prodigy's contribution. On questioning the prisoners they learnt the name of the rebel leader. He was known as a practitioner of fire magic and was exceedingly ugly: people called him Scorcher. He had helped during the original uprising but had disappeared for two years. Recently he had come to Wang Qing and said: "The Song army is powerful. Let me get rid of them for you." Wang Qing sent him off immediately to the Western Capital.

The two enemy commanders had seen the relief force destroyed and dared not come out. They simply reinforced the guard on the city walls.

The Wizard said now: "This place is strongly fortified. We will not be able to break down the defences. You must let me practise a little of my magic tonight to help you succeed. I want to repay your kindness."

"Tell me what you propose," said the Unicorn.

The Wizard whispered in his ear: "We will do this and this and this.... We will do it thus and thus and thus...." The Unicorn was delighted and made certain appointments and the commanders went off to prepare for the attack. Instructions were also given concerning the burial of Shan Shiqi and Lucky Bian, the former Hebei commanders. The Unicorn himself made the libation.

That night in the second watch the Wizard drew his sword and made magic. Soon a fog arose, cloaking the whole city in darkness. The guards could see not an inch in front of their noses, could not even see each other. Screened by this darkness the Song troops hauled themselves up by means of windlasses and climbed onto the battlements. A sudden report and the fog immediately lifted. On all the walls now stood Song soldiers, every man carrying a lighted brand, spreading a glow that lit everything below clearly, revealing all. The troops of the garrison were struck dumb with fear and stood rooted to the spot. Then the Song troops drew their swords and the massacre began. Multitudes of rebels were cut down. The two rebel commanders saw the sudden change and rushed with their troops to the rescue. But the Song army now held all four gates. The Unicorn's main army poured inside and the two rebel commanders were killed by their mutinous troops. The other officers of all ranks surrendered, along with thirty thousand men. The ordinary people were exonerated.

At dawn the Unicorn issued a proclamation restoring peace, recording the Wizard's achievement and rewarding the army. He sent Magic Steed to tell Song Jiang the news. At evening Magic Steed returned and said: "Song Jiang has fought with the enemy for several days at Jingnan and defeated Nanfeng's relief force and taken the leader Xie Zhu prisoner. Because of the strain he has become ill and is confined to the camp. For some time now the Professor has been in charge of military affairs."

Disturbed by this news the Unicorn immediately made all necessary military arrangements and handed over the defence of the Western Capital to the Wizard and Magic Steed. Next day he bade them farewell and with the Strategist and twenty others set off with all haste for Jingnan. They wasted no time on the way and soon reached the main camp north of the city. They were relieved to learn that, thanks to the treatment of Doctor An, Song Jiang was sixty or seventy percent recovered from his illness. They were just talking about the question of the rebels when a fugitive soldier burst in and said: "I were with Tang Bin escorting Magic Hand and his party. We'd only got ten miles when two of them generals from Jingnan, Generals Mi and Ma, come at us with ten thousand troops out of a small mountain trail. They'd heard the commander-in-chief were ill like and were 'oping to attack our camp from the rear, but they ran into us. We was out-numbered and couldn't do nothing against two of them at once, especially seeing as that General Mi is particular brave. Tang Bin got hisself killed and Magic Hand, Craftsman and Sterling got taken. Them two enemy leaders were going to continue on here and attack us when they heard as how the Unicorn and his army had arrived. So they cleared off with their prisoners."

Song Jiang involuntarily let out a cry. "I fear for their lives!" he lamented and immediately suffered a relapse. The others tried to animate him. The Unicorn asked him: "Where was Magic Hand going?"

"When he heard I was ill, Magic Hand left Commissioner Chen to come and see me. He also brought instructions from the Commissioner for the Craftsman and Sterling to go to Wanzhou where they were needed to inscribe a tablet and examine a scroll. I sent them all off today with Tang Bin and an escort of a thousand men. I did not mean them to be captured by the enemy. I fear they will be killed!"

Song Jiang now told the Unicorn to help the Professor to take the city, capture Mi and Ma and exact revenge on them. They joined the army north of the city. After exchanging courtesies with the Professor, the Unicorn immediately told him about Magic Hand. The Professor said: "Alas! They're done for!" He ordered the troops to surround the city and attack it fiercely. The commanders acted accordingly. The Professor also ordered men up onto the siege towers to shout out towards the city: "Send out Magic Hand, Sterling and the Craftsman to us at once! If you're not quick about it your city will be destroyed and all of you, civilian or military, are dead men!"

The garrison commander in the city, also appointed governor by the rebel administration, merely strengthened the defences. The two generals, Mi and Ma, who had shunned an engagement with the Unicorn, had taken refuge within. After capturing Magic Hand and his companions they had been able to call for the gates to be opened because at that point the Song army had not yet tightened its grip on the city. They presented their three captives to the Governor. The latter had heard of the fabulous Magic Hand and he ordered the men to release him from his bonds, thinking that he would declare his submission. All three captives simply glared back and abused them roundly: "You stupid rebels, what sort of men do you take us for? Quickly, give us a couple of chops and be done with it! Don't imagine these knees will ever get anywhere near the ground! Another day when Song Jiang comes and takes your city the whole pack of you will be sliced to pieces, you rats!"

"Beat the dogs into submission!" cried the Governor, beside himself with rage.

The guards took up cudgels and battered the prisoners to the ground, but not one of them would consent to kneel. Rather they continued to shout imprecations. The Governor said: "You want to be finished off with just one cut, but I shall settle your hash infinitely slowly!" He shouted to the guards: "Take these dogs and fix them up at the gate and beat their legs for them. When their legs are smashed they'll have to be kneeling." They guards took them away, fitted them with cangues and beat them black and blue.

Now among the members of the public, soldiers and civilians, who came to see the Song captives, was one who became exceedingly angry. This was a manly looking fellow with beetling brows. He was called Bountiful and he had lived for years next door to the stationer's in South Street opposite the government office. An ancestor of his had been governor of Jingnan during the Northern and Southern Dynasties, and when the river broke its banks had personally led his officials in a rescue operation. It rained heavily and the current was strong and the officials asked him to take a rest. He said: "Wang Zun stopped the flow with his own body. How can I do less?" He persevered and the waters retreated. That year there was a bumper harvest, producing grain six-fold, and it was in memory of this that Bountiful had been given his nickname. When he happened to come to Jingnan, the people honoured him greatly because of his ancestor. He was noble, far-seeing, wise and exceedingly strong, skilled in martial arts and thoroughly brave. When he met a brave man, whatever his rank or station, he would make friends with him. When Wang Qing started his rebellion and attacked the city, Bountiful had presented a plan for defeating the rebels but the authorities rejected it, and that is why the city fell. Under the rebels, the people were ordered into the city and no one was permitted to leave. Bountiful lived there thinking and planning night and day, but you can't make cloth from a single thread. Now he saw the rebel soldiers beating up the three prisoners and heard that the Song army was attacking fiercely on their account and that both the people and the military were in a state of complete panic. After thinking about it for a while, he said to himself: "Now is the time. It's the only chance of rescue for the city." He rushed home. It was late afternoon. He quickly had a servant grind some ink and at the stationer's next door bought a quantity of strong paper. Then by the light of the lamp, carefully loading his brush, he wrote with a flourish in big characters:

You citizens are all loyal subjects of the Song. It cannot be with willing hearts that you aid the rebels. General Song is the court's loyal commander, who killed the Tartars and caught Tian Hu; no one dares to take him on. Under his command are one hundred and seven bold leaders, all of one heart and mind. From those three men you saw being beaten outside the gates of Government House you can tell the calibre of Song Jiang's commanders. The rebels have tortured those three, but the troops in the city are weak and their commanders incompetent; sooner or later the city will fall, and then even the stones will burn. Any of you who want to save your skins, join with me in fighting the rebels!

After he had written out these broadsheets, Bountiful made some discreet inquiries. When he learnt that people were staying in their homes lamenting, he said to himself: "If that is how the people feel, my plan will work." He waited till just before dawn and then went out and dropped his broadsheets in all the town's busy places.

Soon it was light and people began picking them up and reading them, one after another. A crowd quickly gathered. Before long the members of a patrol confiscated one of the broadsheets and rushed to inform the Governor. The latter had a shock and immediately sent an official with orders for the guards to watch the doors of Government House closely as well as the barracks. He also instigated strict measures to catch the enemy agents. As for Bountiful, he equipped himself with a sword, which he kept hidden, and mingled with the crowd. He also picked up the broadsheet and read it out in ringing tones for all to hear. The public looked on uncertainly as the Governor's official bearing the government order galloped up to the barracks with four or five soldiers in attendance. Bountiful stepped forward and with a great shout slashed at the horse's legs. The official was thrown from his horse and Bountiful cut off his head with one blow. With the head in his left hand and the sword in his right he shouted out: "All who want to save their lives follow me and we'll kill the rebels!"

Bountiful was well known to the guards in front of Government House and they knew him to be a man of iron. In a moment he was the centre of a mob of five or six hundred. Seeing the soldiers had joined him, he cried out with redoubled vigour to the people: "Come and join us if you've got the guts!" His voice carried many hundreds of yards. All around people responded by grabbing sticks and cudgels, tearing up palings, breaking off chairlegs. In a twinkling they were five or six thousand. They set up a continuous roar and led by Bountiful burst into the govern-ment office. The Governor was accustomed to bully his officers and persecute the men of his personal guard and they all nourished an intense hatred of him. When they heard of the uprising they joined the mob. Charging inside they slaughtered the Governor and all his family. By the time Bountiful led them out again, the mob had grown to twenty thousand. They released Magic Hand, Sterling and Craftsman from the stocks and removed the cangues. Bountiful told three men with strong backs to carry them. Led by Bountiful and bearing the Governor's head, they rushed to the north gate, killed the guard commander and scattered his troops, opened the gate and let down the drawbridge.

The Professor had just reached the north gate to personally direct the attack when he heard the uproar in the city. When he saw the gate being opened he thought the enemy were about to make a sortie. He hurriedly ordered his troops to pull back three or four bowshots and form a defensive line. Then he saw Bountiful, bearing the head, with three soldiers behind him carrying Magic Hand and his companions. As soon as the drawbridge was lowered they rushed out. Magic Hand shouted to the startled Professor: "Professor, we have to thank this brave man who has incited the people to kill the rebels and save our lives!"

The Professor was as delighted as he was amazed. Bountiful said to him: "The situation is urgent, there is no time for ceremony. Please move your army into the city immediately!"

Beside the drawbridge there was already a crowd of soldiers who all shouted in unison "Let General Song Jiang enter the city!"

Seeing such a variety of people all gathered there, the Professor ordered his commanders to march their men into the city, with instructions that if any man killed someone the whole platoon was to be executed. When they heard this the rebel guards on the north all laid down their arms and came down from the walls. The news also reached the guards on the south, east and west and they tied up their officers and opened the gates, welcoming Song Jiang's army with open arms. Only General Mi was courageous enough not to give in and escaped through the west gate, breaking through the encirclement and getting away.

The Professor sent an urgent despatch to Song Jiang, whose gloom and despondency were almost entirely dispelled by the news. Briskly he gave the marching orders. When the army reached Jingnan, Song Jiang took over the government office and issued a proclamation restoring peace and rewarding his commanders. He summoned Bountiful, asked him his name and assisted him to a seat. He greeted him most courteously and said: "You, sir, have eliminated the rebels and made life secure for the people, subdued the city without bloodshed and rescued my three brothers, I bow down before you."

Bountiful likewise bowed repeatedly, saying: "It is not through my efforts but through the power of the ordinary soldiers and people." His words impressed Song Jiang even more. The other leaders then paid their respects to Bountiful. The rebel commanders in the city were brought in and Song Jiang offered an amnesty to all who surrendered. There was great rejoicing in the city and ten thousand or more gave themselves up.

Now the water-borne forces under White-Water Dragon arrived in the river Han and came to report. Song Jiang ordered a banquet in honour of Bountiful. He offered him the cup with his own hands saying: "When I return to the court I shall tell the Emperor of your great talents and virtue and you will certainly be promoted."

Bountiful said: "That is not what I would wish. I did not act out of desire for fame or riches. I have always had an undisciplined nature and the people at home do not have a high opinion of me. I have little talent and no real experience. Nowadays we see that calumny reigns in high places and good men have no credit. Besides, though a man's nature be forbearing and his conduct amenable, yet will it not enable him to obtain enlightenment. I observe that there are many driven by ambition to bear the insults of office whose activity is not beneficial. And those who strive to maintain a family find their virtue is sapped and they have delivered themselves into the power of evil men. As for me, having no burden of office, am I not like the crane that rides the clouds, enviably free to fly where I will?"

Neither Song Jiang nor any who served under him could resist a sigh on hearing this long speech. Taoist Gongsun, Monk, Pilgrim and all the rest who were present sat there nodding appreciatively at Bountiful's words. That evening when the party broke up Bountiful bade farewell and left the government office. Next morning Song Jiang after sending Magic Messenger to tell the news to Commissioner Chen, went himself to Bountiful's house to pay his respects. He found it empty. Pinned to the wall was a note which said: "This morning before dawn I packed my belongings, bade my family farewell and set off, I know not whither."

When Song Jiang went back and told the others how Bountiful had slipped away in the night, every one of them breathed a sigh. That evening Magic Messenger returned and told them that the as yet unpacified districts of Shannan and Wanzhou facing the campaign organized by Commissioner Chen and Marshal Hou with Leopard's Head and his companions had all sued for peace. The court had sent a good many new officials and all had taken over. The Commissioner was on his way with all his commanders and would arrive soon.

Song Jiang decided with the Professor that as soon as the Commissioner arrived to take charge they would start their campaign against the leadership of the rebellion. Song Jiang rested at Jingnan five or six days more till he was fully recovered. Then one day it was announced that the Commissioner had arrived and they went out to welcome him.

The Commissioner rewarded the army commanders handsomely. After that the acting governor of Shannan, Tattooed Dragon, arrived with his men, having handed over to the new officials. Song Jiang requested the Commissioner to take over the city, bade farewell and set off with his land and water-borne forces to seize the rebel's stronghold at Nanfeng. Now all one hundred and eight leaders were together again, plus those who had surrendered in Hebei, viz the Chancellor and eleven others with two hundred thousand troops. They had fought and won countless battles, their strength kept on growing and everywhere they went the rebels surrendered at the mere sight of them. Song Jiang was able to report the recovery of many districts to Commissioner Chen, and the Commissioner sent Academician Luo with troops to take control of them.

Song Jiang and his water-borne forces advanced as far as the borders of Nanfeng. Scouts came in with the intelligence that Wang Qing had made Fortune-teller Li his Commander-in-Chief and had raised a water-borne force of fifty thousand, while there were another three columns of local troops, twenty thousand in each, under some local commanders. A dozen brave officers, then, with hundreds of thousands of troops were advancing on them, and Wang Qing himself was directing the operation.

Song Jiang consulted the Professor about all this: "The enemy have turned out in full strength; it seems they have decided on a showdown. How can we get the better of them?"

The Professor said: "In battle as they say numbers aren't everything. We're all of us here now. Let us divide our forces and attack before they have a chance to settle down." Song Jiang gave orders accordingly.

On the first day Skyhawk and Mr. Chai led six others and five thousand men to escort the supply carts and carts filled with silk and ammunition in the army's rear. At a place called Dragon Heights at the foot of the mountain they found a village surrounded by cliffs like earthen ramparts with three access roads. The people lived in a hundred or so rough huts but they had all fled because of the fighting. That evening a strong wind blew from the northeast and black clouds piled up. Because the sky was so menacing, Skyhawk and Mr. Chai were afraid rain might damage the supplies and ordered their men to open up the huts and drag the carts inside. They were about to start preparing a meal for themselves when a patrol led by Pill Monger arrested a spy and came to report to Mr. Chai: "Under interrogation this spy told us that General Mi with ten thousand picked troops plans to burn our supplies tonight in the second watch. At present they are concealed on the mountain."

This place Dragon Heights, you see, had two cliffs that faced each other forming a kind of gate barely wide enough for a boat to be rowed through; the sides were clad in impenetrable scrub. Skyhawk immediately said to Mr. Chai: "I'll go to the village and wait for the bastards and give them such a drubbing not a scrap of their armour will survive whole."

Mr. Chai said: "That General Mi is a true soldier. You won't beat him just by strength. Besides we haven't enough troops. Let me try a little plan of mine first. We'll need five or six gun carts with explosives and a hundred or so carts of firewood. We'll avenge Tang Bin and company and annihilate the treacherous swine." He had his men bring the supplies, ammunition and carts and ordered Skyhawk to guard the stores with three thousand troops equipped with fire arrows. At dusk they all left the narrows and headed south, leaving behind hundreds of carts loaded with firewood, lined up on the lower ground southwest of the village. Among the hundred or so empty carts, drawn up in a number of different places, they deliberately placed some supplies so that they were visible. Explosives were hidden everywhere underneath together with firewood primed with gunpowder. He told the Young Master and three others to take two thousand men and set up an ambush along the East Peak road and Water General to do likewise along the road south from the village, in preparation for the enemy attack. All was done thus and thus and thus, according to plan. Mr. Chai himself with the Fire General and three hundred infantrymen equipped with incendiary materials, concealed themselves among the trees and scrub on the mountainside.

At nine o'clock General Mi with his two lieutenants and more than ten thousand troops in light armour, the horses with muffled hooves and harness bells, with banners furled and drums silent, approached the southern pass. The Water General ordered his men to light their torches and attack. After four or five bouts with Mi, he slapped his horse and led his troops in retreat. General Mi, who was a brave and unsuspecting soul, raced after them. The Young Master and the Pill Monger seeing fire on the south road left a thousand troops to their two companions and galloped toward the village to close off the road. By now the rebels were streaming into the village. They attacked the higher ground on the northeast and found nothing but empty houses, no supplies anywhere. They searched about and found that on the lower ground there were several hundred carts of supplies with only five or six hundred soldiers to guard them. The latter saw them coming and with shouts of alarm scattered and ran for it. General Mi said: "They can't have much in the way of supplies!" He ordered his men to light torches so they could see. At intervals among the supply carts there would be a couple loaded with silk brocade. When the rebels saw this they fell to plundering them. General Mi was trying to put a stop to this when from above them on the mountainside fire arrows and firebrands began raining down, setting the carts with firewood ablaze. A shout rose from the rebels as they tried to take cover but the fuses were already lit to fire the charges and with a roar like thunder they went off. Before the rebels could take evasive action they were mown down by the shells. Well, the fires blazed and the cannon roared as though the heavens were falling in or earth splitting. In a moment all the thatched huts were hidden in clouds of smoke or converted into balls of fire. General Mi was killed by a shell, as were most of his men. Many suffered terrible burns. Then the Water General and the Young Master attacked with their three columns killing the other two enemy generals. Of the 10000 rebel troops, only 1000 or so escaped with their lives. When daylight came Mr. Chai's unit joined up with Skyhawk's and brought the supply train up to the camp. Song Jiang was in the headquarters tent making the dispositions for his troops, cavalrymen were saddling their horses, the infantry putting their weapons in order. Indeed,

Flags and banners painted the sky red;

Wang Qing crosses the river & is captured; Song Jiang completes his defeat of the rebels

So Song Jiang sat in his tent that day and his commanders paraded to receive their orders. A gun was fired, music played and the flag was raised. At the signal the guard commanders fell in outside the tent, standing to attention, to hear the orders. A fanfare and the orders were read out, after which they kowtowed and went to stand on either side.

Next the platoon leaders knelt to hear the disciplinary arrangements: all insolence or disorder in the ranks, all insubordination or questioning of orders, all wavering in the face of the enemy were to be stamped out.

For every twenty or so men there was an ensign. To them Song Jiang spoke personally: "Discipline is your responsibility: if any man fails to advance or is neglectful of his orders you are to punish him." The ensigns stood down, the music sounded again and everyone returned to their companies to proceed as commanded. Finally Song Jiang gave out the orders for the boat commanders.

The drummer was to give the orders with a handclap: one, form up; two, raise banners; three, forward march! Next to the band the five directions flag was raised and a gun fired. The signal was given to strike camp and all was ready for battle:

Wang Qing meanwhile was planning his battle formation. He appointed the leaders of the vanguard and the left and right flanks. He himself would command the main army with a number of his aides and police chiefs to protect him. Fortune-teller Li was head of the army. The troops were drawn up in perfect order with Wang Qing in overall command of the operation. The horses had protective armour, the men chainmail. The bows were strung. Three beats of the drum and all stood to. Forward march!

They had not gone more than a few miles when a cloud of dust announced the approach of a Song patrol. Thirty riders appeared, all wearing blue scarves and green battle robes, and there was a great jingling of harness bells as they rode forward. Their horses were decked with scarlet tassels, their harness hung with dozens of bells; they sported pheasants' feathers, the hafts of their spears were bound with silver rings and they carried light bows and short arrows. The leader of this band, bearer of the Emperor's commission after winning back his honour, was that paragon of warriors Hotshot. He wore a gold-embroidered blue turban and a special war robe of blue brocade. His waist bound with a crimson sash, slippers of soft leather on his feet, he bestrode a horse with a silver saddle. On his left was another imperial appointee, the chaste and filial Jade Arrowtip. She wore a crimson cap with a golden pattern and a war robe of crimson silk brocade. About her waist was a sash of many colours and on her feet small winged slippers. Her mount was a grey thoroughbred. On the right, a little lower down, bearing the flag, was that worthy servant the Butler, also a recipient of the Emperor's favour. This party rode on till they were quite close to Fortune-teller Li's company, not more than a few hundred paces separating the two forces, before they turned their horses and rode back.

The two leading rebel commanders urged their horses forward in a charge. Hotshot slapped his horse, levelled his spear of seasoned wood and rode at them, Jade Arrowtip following behind, square halberd at the ready. When these four had fought a dozen bouts, Hotshot and Arrowtip knocked aside their opponents' weapons, turned and galloped off. The rebels gave chase, but there were shouts from their companions on either side: "Don't follow them. Those two have got masses of stones in their saddlebags and when they throw they don't miss!"

The rebel leaders reined in their horses at once. Then on Dragon Heights a drum thundered and a company of five hundred infantry appeared, with four marching in front: Iron Ox, Demon King, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost. As they came on their men spread out in a long line under the mountain, with the shield bearers thickly clustered on either side. The rebel commanders urged their men forward and Iron Ox and Demon King split their force into two columns, which turned and using the shields to cover their backs retreated towards the mountain again.

By now the main rebel army with Wang Qing and Fortune-teller Li had come up and they all advanced together. Iron Ox and Demon King had raced up the mountain and disappeared over a ridge into the forest. They were nowhere to be seen. Fortune-teller Li ordered the rebel troops to form up on the level wasteland. Suddenly a loud report from the mountain and a column of men was seen racing forward on the south with three leaders in their midst: Short-Arse, in the centre, Colonel Sun on the left and the Gardener on the right. They rolled forward with five thousand cavalry and infantry. Wang Qing was just about to deploy troops to oppose them when the gun on the mountain fired again and another column of troops raced out on the north with the three women warriors: Steelbright in the centre, Auntie Gu on the left and the Ogress on the right, also with five thousand cavalry and infantry. The rebel commanders on the right received this charge, while Short-Arse and company clashed with the rebels on the left. They fought a dozen bouts before the Song commanders turned their horses and galloped off to the east, Steelbright and company following suit.

When Wang Qing saw them retreat he said with a sneer: "If these fuckers are all Song Jiang's got, how can we go on losing to them?" He led the main army in pursuit. They had not gone more than a couple of miles when the crash of a gong rang out and the four infantry commanders who had previously retreated began to advance from the thickets on the left flank of the mountain. Four more had now joined them: Monk, Pilgrim, the Red-Haired Devil and Nameless, with five hundred infantry, all armed with round shields and short swords. The rebel second-in-command immediately detached two thousand troops to engage them. After a few bouts Iron Ox and company feigned defeat and retreated in two separate columns, covering their backs with their shields as they fled into the forest and disappeared. The rebels gave chase, but Iron Ox and company were too fast for them and in an instant they had vanished. Fortune-teller Li hurriedly told Wang Qing: "Do not follow them, Sire. It's a trick. We should form up and wait for them to attack."

To the southwest: troops with red banners and white armour led by Hasty, with the Dandy on his left and Flautist on his right.

To the northeast: troops with black banners and blue armour, led by the Tattooed Dragon with River-Jumper and White-Spotted Snake.

These forces offer protection on eight sides like an iron bucket. They are all in their proper units, cavalry with cavalry, infantry with infantry, all armed and provided with their banners, an awe-inspiring sight. In the centre of the octagon is a cluster of yellow banners, among them sixty-four depicting all the figures of the Book of Changes outlined in gold, in four groups. South of the central section are cavalry, with two senior leaders: Whiskers and his subordinate Sergeant Lei, their forces all in yellow. On the east of the central section is the Little Master, on the west Whitey, on the south Door-God and on the north Pill Monger. Grouped behind the yellow flags, the artillery, with its commander, Thunderer, and twenty of his gunners standing around their guns. Behind these a contingent with hooks and ropes, and behind them some banners of various colours with the twenty-eight heavenly mansions represented on all sides.

Among the gold embroidered banners is the goose yellow command banner, worked in felt and bordered with real pearls, with gold bells along the bottom edge and surmounted by a pheasant's feather. Guardian of this is an impressive giant of a man with a cap secured by a fishtail pin, and dragon scale armour. This is Perilous. Beside the banner are two ensigns, both mounted, dressed identically and holding steel lances: the two brothers, Comet and Red Star. In front of and behind their horses twenty-four armoured guards with wolf's-tooth maces. Behind, two signal flags and on either side twenty-four halberdiers. Two riders in the midst of them: Little Duke and Halberdier. In the midst of the halberds a thicket of tridents with two powerful commanders, identically dressed: Snake and Scorpion, both with three-pronged forks, protecting the central army. Behind them two horsemen with silver saddles: Magic Hand and Sterling. Behind them soldiers dressed in red with hemp-bound swords and in their midst the two executioners, Strongarm and Blossom.

At the very back are ranks of spearsmen with gold spears and silver spears, one lot under Spearsman, the other under Colonel Hua. Behind these row upon row of padded uniforms, coloured turbans, crimson robes, padded jackets, then two shimmering, glittering walls of green streamers and blue screens, crimson pennants and yellow-shafted halberds with white animal tails hanging from them, preceding three ranks of halberds, axes, whips and hammers.

Many the troops are, the battle plan mighty;
Like tigers the men, their horses pure dragon.
Bent on their task of subduing the West,

And so this hedge king, this upstart Wang Qing stood on the observation platform with Li the fortune-teller and surveyed the opposing force, which before his eyes took on this formation based on the nine mansions of the Book of Changes. The troops were fierce enough, the leaders brave enough, the expressions grim and the weapons sharp-edged enough to frighten his soul out of its body, to cause his spirits to plunge. Despite himself he had to say: "No wonder we keep losing to them. Who'd have thought an army could be so imposing!"

The drums on the Song side kept up an incessant thunder. Wang Qing and the fortune-teller descended from the platform, mounted their horses and rode out with the security chiefs on either side and a crowd of palace attendants behind. Wang Qing gave the order for his vanguard to attack. The opposing armies were lined up facing east and west, and wood was the sign for the day. The Song ranks on the west opened and Leopard's Head sped forward. Both armies cheered. He reined his horse in, rested his eight-pointed serpent lance and shouted at the top of his voice: "You rebellious fool, you mad dog conspirator, the imperial army is here, why have you not surrendered? If you wait till I've ground you to dust, it'll be too late then for regrets!"

In the rebel ranks Fortune-teller Li, who knew the laws of cause and effect, hurriedly gave the order for the two commanders on the left flank to take the red-banner troops into action. This order was carried out, to much shouting from the armies and thundering music. Leopard's Head took on one of them and four arms rose and fell while four horse's hooves clattered on the ground. The antagonists, hidden in a cloud of dust, surrounded by the chill of death, went this way and that, swooping to the left and spinning to the right. They fought fifty bouts and neither had the advantage. This rebel leader was one of their bravest. When his comrade saw he was not winning, he raised his sword and charged to the rescue. Faced by two opponents, Leopard's Head gave a great shout and making a supreme effort thrust the first of them through with his lance, flinging him from his horse. His deputies, Tamer and Colonel Sun, galloped forward. Tamer dealt the second leader a great blow with his deadly sword: the blood gushed and there was the helmet rolling under the horse's legs.

When the second rebel leader died, his troops scattered and the enemy ranks were broken. Wang Qing heard he had lost two of his commanders and immediately ordered a retreat. But just then a gun going off in the Song army was the signal for frenzied activity as, white leading black, black leading blue, blue leading red, they changed their formation into a long snake and then a winnowing basket, effecting a complete encirclement. Wang Qing and Fortune-teller Li moved their troops this way and that, attacking in different places, but they were just running their heads against a brick wall; they simply couldn't break out. What a battle that was, between the government forces and the rebels!

Weapons clash, horses and riders dash against each other. Spear foiling sword: the sword aims to split the skull, the spear darts like a swordfish to meet it; the sword strikes from below, the spear bears down like an earth-borer; the sword sweeps along the ground, the spear blocks it like the fringe of a corselet. Sword countering spear: the spear lunges at the heart, the sword makes a five-flower defence; the spear seeks to prick the eye, the sword parries. Halberd defeating shield: the shield advances like a spinning top, the halberd sweeps it aside like the wind; the shield bores in from the side, the halberd stands athwart; the shield comes crowding forward, the halberd draws back and jabs defensively. Shield countering halberd: the halberd closes, the shield ducks and weaves; the halberd presses hard, the shield responds with a block. The naked blade hidden in silk feigns defeat, pretends surrender; the steel trident thrusting upward, sweeping downward, feints and ripostes. The sniper on horseback watches his opportunity; in front of carts men with billhooks wait for the horses. Rods, darts, maces, hammers, broadswords, halberds, lances, bucklers: here the conflict raging unabated, there the fortunes ever in the balance. Blood soon runs in rivers, corpses are piled in mountains.

Fierce fighting continued for a long time, but eventually the rebels were routed and the government forces prevailed. Wang Qing gave the order to withdraw into Nanfeng, hoping to make new plans. But then a gun went off in their rear and a messenger galloped up and reported: "Sire, there are more enemy troops behind us!" The hero leading this contingent was none other than the Unicorn, armed with his lance of hardened steel, with Morbid on his left and Madcap on his right and ten thousand battle-ready troops. They charged furiously at the rebels' rearguard. Morbid knocked one of the commanders off his horse, Madcap ran the other one through, as the impetus carried them on through the rebel ranks.

In the midst of this crisis, Wang Qing heard another loud report and the Monk marched out from the left with seven other leaders and a thousand infantry, equipped with cudgels, cutlasses, axes, pikes, swords, javelins and round shields; they cut through the enemy like someone slicing a melon or chopping vegetables. On the right the Gardener, Short-Arse, Blackface and Hotshot and their respective wives, with a thousand cavalry, armed with spears and lances of weathered wood and bronze, square halberds, double-edged swords and daggers attacked the rebels' left flank, bowling them over, going through them like a knife through rotten wood, scattering them to the four winds.

The Unicorn, supported by Morbid and Madcap, took on the main army, killing the commander, routing the flanking troops and pressing on with the intention of capturing Wang Qing. Instead he found the fortune-teller, who was an excellent swordsman and came at him with his sword darting at the speed of lightning. The Unicorn was unable to cope with this and retreated into the lee of Song Jiang's main army. The commander on the right was Taoist Gongsun, who advanced muttering a spell. He cried out "Chrrr!" and the sword flew out of Li's hand and dropped to the ground. The Unicorn galloped up to him and stretching out his long arms and twisting his supple waist wrenched him off his horse and handed him over to be tied up. Then he slapped his horse and readied his lance and charged off again in search of Wang Qing, like an eagle stooping on a swallow or a tiger devouring a lamb. The rebels abandoned drums and gongs and threw down their halberds and spears. There was complete havoc; it was one of those days when fathers mourn sons, sons search for fathers and brothers lose each other. The greater part of a hundred thousand troops were killed. The field was littered with corpses, blood ran in rivers. Thirty thousand gave themselves up. Apart from a few who managed to run away, the rest ended up more dead than alive, trampled underfoot by men and horses, battered to pieces, rendered into mincemeat. Two fearsome rebel commanders had their horses killed under them by Nameless, who dragged the riders off and killed them too. Arrowtip knocked the rebel Li Xiong down with one of her stones and finished him off with her halberd. Another rebel commander was accounted for by Fleetfoot, the latter's halberd knocking him from his mount and spitting him as he attempted to flee. Many of the upstart's officials, ministers, security chiefs and officers of all kinds never made it to safety. Apart from the fact that the chief rebel himself was missing it was a complete victory for the Song forces.

Song Jiang had the gong sounded to recall his troops and they made for Nanfeng. He sent Hotshot and Jade Arrowtip off on reconnaissance with five thousand cavalry. He also sent Magic Messenger ahead to gather news of the Chancellor's attack on Nanfeng. The Magic Messenger used his magic amulets, so he overtook Hotshot and Arrowtip. The journey took him all morning and when he returned he gave this account: "When he got your orders, the Chancellor dressed himself as one of the western army to try and deceive the city, but they saw through it. They dug a pit just inside the gates. Then they opened the east gate and let his troops in. Seven of the officers under the Chancellor's command, and five hundred men with their horses charged through the gate and all, men and horses, plunged into the pit. There were troops hidden on either side who with long spears and pikes stabbed all five hundred or more of them to death. Luckily the Chancellor was at the back. He waited his moment and then charged through and got his men to fill in the pit. They continued on into the city and the guards fled. He seized the east gate, but later the enemy counter-attacked on all sides and got them surrounded in there. As soon as I heard this I raced back here. On the way I met Hotshot and Jade Arrowtip and told them and they are rushing there with their troops."

Song Jiang immediately mobilized the main army and marched them with all speed to surround Nanfeng. Hotshot and Arrowtip by now had reached the East Gate and reinforced the Chancellor. They were engaged in fierce fighting. Song Jiang and his army also entered by the East Gate and captured the city, putting the rebels to flight. They raised the Song banner on all the gates. Many of the usurper's officials in the city, civil and military, were executed, including Fan Quan — Wang Qing's cousin and erstwhile government official. The usurper's consort, formerly Miss Duan, when she heard the government troops were in the city, having been always strong and an accomplished horsewoman, girded herself and rode forth at the head of a hundred or so of her bravest attendants. They left the palace through the rear court, heading for the west gate with the intention of joining the rebel forces at Yun'an. But they ran into Jade Arrowtip, who at that moment was attacking the palace from the back. Miss Duan brandished her sword and urged her horse forward in one last desperate charge. One of Jade Arrowtip's stones caught her in the face. Bleeding profusely she fell from her horse. Troops rushed up to tie her up and make her prisoner. Her maids were all killed. Jade Arrowtip pressed on into the palace garden. All the palace maids, when they heard the Song army had entered the city, either hanged themselves or threw themselves down wells or stabbed themselves to death or threw themselves down steps, almost all dying by their own hand. The remainder were tied up by Arrowtip's troops and taken before Song Jiang in his tent. He was well pleased and ordered Miss Duan and her attendants to be locked up until Wang Qing was captured and then sent off to the capital. He again sent out detachments in all directions to hunt for Wang Qing.

Wang Qing with only a few hundred armoured cavalry left to him had broken out of the encirclement and fled to the east of Nanfeng. When he saw fighting in the city he was frightened half out of his wits. The main Song army was at his back and there was no chance of fleeing northwards. Looking about he found he had barely a hundred men. The remainder, even those he trusted most, had fled in the face of defeat. With those remaining he headed for Yun'an. On the way he spoke with those nearest him: "I still have Yun'an, Dongchuan and Ande. This region east of the river is not large, but surely it will suffice for a kingdom? What hurts me is that those courtiers who were happy to take my salary, have deserted me now in my time of need. As soon as we have driven off the Song troops, I will arrest those ungrateful traitors and have them sliced into little pieces."

There was no rest for horses or men as they galloped on till dawn. They were relieved when they saw Yun'an before them. Wang Qing said happily: "They are well prepared. See how bravely the banners are flying and how well camouflaged the guns." He spoke as they were hastening towards the city.

But one of his followers who could read and write said: "Sire, something is wrong. Why is the city full of Song flags and ensignia?" Wang Qing looked again and it was true: on the east gate was a banner, visible from afar, which had large gold embroidered characters: "General Song's Commander of Water-borne Forces in the West, White-Water…". Below were three lines which could not be made out because of the way the wind was blowing the flag. When he saw this Wang Qing's heart went heavy as lead, his whole body numb, and for a long time he was quite unable to move. Indeed it was as if the Song forces had fallen from the sky. Finally one of his close aides, who was an astute fellow, said: "Sire, there is no time to lose. I beg you to remove your royal insignia and flee to Dongchuan. I fear this city has changed hands."

Wang Qing said: "You are right, my friend." He took off his towering crown and divested himself of his imperial dragon robe embroidered with figures of the sun and moon, removed his jewel-encrusted belt and his slippers and changed into a simple turban, ordinary clothes and soft leather shoes. His followers also removed their outer clothing and then, like dogs kicked out of the house or fish escaped from the net, they fled away by small paths, passing Yun'an by and heading for Dongchuan. They travelled till men and horses were exhausted and every stomach empty. The people had suffered so long at the hands of the rebels that when they heard of great battles, they had all taken to the road and there was no sign of human habitation at any of the important places along the route. All was silent: no cock crowed, no dog barked. You could not even get a drop of water, let alone find a place to buy wine and food.

By now some sixty or seventy of Wang Qing's personal attendants had absented themselves, saying they had to go to the toilet or needed a pee. The party, now consisting of thirty, rode on till evening when they came to Kaizhou, still in Yun'an province, where a river blocked their path. This was the river Clearwater, which rose in a lake in Dazhou. The water was indeed especially clear, hence the name. Wang Qing said: "If only we could find a boat to take us across!" One of his retinue pointed and said: "Over there, Sire, look, where the reeds are thinner and the geese are landing, there are some fishing boats."

They all went down to the river bank. It was the depths of winter but the day was bright and clear. There were about a dozen fishing boats: some of the men were fishing and others were drying their nets. Out in midstream there were some boats where the fishermen were playing the guessing fingers game and drinking from large bowls. Wang Qing sighed and said: "Look at those fellows, how happy they are! How different from my lot. They are my subjects, but they know nothing of the hardships their prince must suffer!"

One of the attendants shouted: "Ahoy there, fishermen! Bring some of your boats over here to ferry us across. You'll be handsomely paid for it."

Two of the men set down their bowls and the boat came creaking across the water. A fisherman in the bows poled the boat in to the bank. He looked Wang Qing up and down from head to toe and said: "Look lively about it then. We've still got more drinking to do. Get in, get in!"

Wang Qing's attendants helped him aboard. The fisherman was a big fellow with shaggy eyebrows, big eyes, iron-grey whiskers and a voice like a gong. He held the pole in one hand and with the other helped Wang Qing aboard. Then he gave one shove with his pole and the boat shot away from the bank a metre or more. This caused a great commotion among the attendants left on the bank. "Hey, bring the boat back here at once," they cried out in unison. "We all want to go across!"

The fisherman glared at them and said: "And where do you plan to go to then?" Then he put down his pole, planted a hand on Wang Qing's chest, pulled on his arms and threw him to the deck with a crash. Wang Qing tried to struggle but the man with the oars put them down and leapt up to help pin him down. The fishermen who were drying their nets jumped ashore and fell on the attendants, making them prisoner one after another.

The big fisherman with the pole was of course the White-Water Dragon, and the one rowing was Cave Dragon. The fishermen were all members of the Song water-borne force. White-Water Dragon had received orders from Song Jiang to sail his fleet to engage the rebel fleet. They had fought a big battle at Gautama Narrows where they'd killed the rebel commander and taken his deputy, Hu Jun, prisoner, inflicting a heavy defeat on the enemy. Recognizing him from his bearing as exceptional, White-Water Dragon had courteously released his prisoner. In gratitude the latter had contrived to open the water gates of Yun'an for him and he had captured it, killing the garrison commander. Anticipating that the rebels after being defeated and scattered by the main army would attempt to flee back to their base, he left White Eel and the Pilot in charge of the city and went with Cave Dragon, River Rider and their men disguised as fishermen, to set a watch for the returning enemy. He posted the three Ruan brothers also at three other river crossings to keep watch. When he saw Wang Qing approaching, riding at the head of a crowd, he assumed he was an enemy leader, though he did not know it was the chief villain of all. After interrogating his followers he learnt that it was Wang Qing and he clapped his hands with joy. He recalled the Ruan brothers and the Tong brothers to help guard the city and with the former enemy commander, Hu Jun, took Wang Qing and his followers to Song Jiang. They learnt on the way that Song Jiang had taken Nanfeng. On entering the city they took Wang Qing to the government office. Song Jiang was somewhat downhearted at the time, because of their failure to capture Wang Qing, and he could scarce contain his joy when he heard the news. When White-Water Dragon entered, he was loud in his praises: "Dear Brother, this is a major achievement," he said. White-Water Dragon presented Hu Jun to him and said: "This is the man who deserves the credit."

Song Jiang asked him his name and enquired about his part in the taking of Yun'an. After Song Jiang had distributed rewards and compensation, he conferred with them all about how to capture the two cities still in rebel hands, Dongchuan and Ande.

The newly surrendered Hu Jun said: "Don't worry about it, General. I can tell you something which'll take care of both places, it's a cinch!" Song Jiang was delighted to hear this. He took Hu aside and respectfully asked him what his plan was. Hu bowed and said a few words that were to have important consequences: without a shot fired the cities were recaptured, the army subdued and the rebels forced to surrender.

The Prodigy Yan Qing shoots geese at Autumn Double Woods Crossing; Song Jiang brings his captives to the Eastern Capital

Now when Song Jiang asked General Hu Jun what was his plan for capturing Dongchuan and Ande, the latter replied: "The garrison commander at Dongchuan is my younger brother Hu Xian. Out of gratitude to Commander Li for sparing my life, let me go to Dongchuan and order my brother to surrender. When the garrison at Ande find they are alone, they will have no alternative but to give themselves up."

Song Jiang was pleased and ordered the White-Water Dragon to go too. He now made his dispositions, deploying troops to pacify the districts that had not yet surrendered, and sent Magic Messenger to request the court to declare the campaign successfully concluded, and to deliver a report to the Commissioner for forwarding to Marshal Su. With the army he went to Wang Qing's imperial palace to impound all valuables in the treasury and burn down and destroy all the topless towers and splendid halls, all the weapons of war and uniforms. He likewise sent word to Pilot in Yun'an ordering him to burn and destroy all the armaments in the palace there.

Magic Messenger went first to the Commissioner in Jingnan. The latter added a report of his own. Magic Messenger went next to the capital and handed the reports in to Marshal Su together with some gifts. Marshal Su presented the report to the Emperor for his scrutiny. The Emperor expressed great satisfaction and immediately ordered the drafting of an edict for the Western region whereby the rebel Wang Qing was to be sent to the capital for sentencing, and the usurper's concubines, officials and hangers-on executed in the local market-places and their heads exhibited. The people had suffered cruelly at the hands of Wang Qing and there was to be an indemnity of cash and rations, distributed to each needy household to relieve poverty. The surrendered Hebei commanders who had died in battle were rewarded posthumously by gifts to their followers. The temporary administrations were to hand over to new officials as soon as possible. Where local officials had first sided with the rebels and later returned to their allegiance, their conduct was to be judged by Commissioner Chen and dealt with on merit. All who had contributed to the putting down of the rebellion would be rewarded with official posts on the army's return to the capital. Magic Messenger went on ahead in order to tell them about the edict. Commissioner Chen and company were all in Nanfeng. Hu Jun had by now got his brother to surrender and the people of Dongchuan had handed over all the local registers and treasury accounts and come to await their sentence. The rebels of Ande in trepidation followed suit. Thanks to the efforts of White-Water Dragon these three places, Yun'an, Dongchuan and Ande, had all been pacified without the farmers having to leave their work in the fields or the merchants their shops. All of the eight cities and eighty-six districts seized by Wang Qing had now been recovered.

Some ten days after Magic Messenger returned to Nanfeng from the capital, the Emperor's envoy arrived bearing the decree. Commissioner Chen and his officials received it and one by one all the instructions were carried out. The envoy returned to the capital early next morning. The Commissioner had the Duans, Li the fortune-teller, and all their accomplices brought out of the gaol and after sentencing they were beheaded and the heads exposed on the gates as a lesson. Miss Duan, who had been rebellious from childhood, had insisted on arranging her own marriage and had committed a capital crime, had not only lost her own life in the process but implicated many of her relatives. Her father had died earlier in the camp on House Mountain.

Anyway, to be brief, after recording the exploits of the White-Water Dragon and the rest, Commissioner Chen and Song Jiang had notices posted in every district to reassure the people. Eighty-six districts had been returned to the Emperor's control and their inhabitants' loyalty could be counted on again. All the other followers of the insurgency were left unharmed and told to return to their former trades or to farming. In due course the Wizard and Magic Steed came from the Western Capital, new officials having arrived to take over the administration there. Other leaders who had been seconded to local administrations began to arrive from all over. After White-Water Dragon and his comrades handed over their administrative duties and came to Nanfeng, the Commissioner with all the officials and Song Jiang's one hundred and seven commanders and the surrendered commanders from Hebei, celebrated the peace with a banquet, in honour of all the military commanders and civilian officials, and to reward the army. Song Jiang put Taoist Gongsun and the Wizard in charge of a religious ceremony which was to last seven days and nights, to ease the passage of the souls of the dead commanders and of all who had suffered an unjust death in the West.

Shortly after this it was announced that the Chancellor had caught some infection and died in the camp. Song Jiang was very upset. He arranged the funeral and the body was buried at Dragon Heights. The Chancellor's death affected the Wizard deeply and he said to Song Jiang: "He was my countryman and my close friend. He committed a crime in order to avenge his father and had to throw in his lot with the rebels. When you enlisted him I hoped that his fate would improve. Who'd have thought that he would suddenly die like this! The fact that I joined you is due to his having set me straight. You can imagine my feelings now he is dead. The kindness of yourself and the Unicorn is engraved on my heart and I can never repay it, but I would like to ask you to allow me to take myself off to the wilderness; I need to husband what remains to me of the life force."

When Magic Steed heard about this he too went to Song Jiang and said: "Please allow me to go with the Wizard."

Song Jiang was exceedingly reluctant but since they were adamant he had to let them go. A farewell party was held, at which Taoist Gongsun was notably silent. The two of them said goodbye and then went to take leave of the Commissioner, after which they departed contentedly. Later they would both proceed to where the Great Sage was and sit at his feet and follow the Way till they reached the end of their days.

The Commissioner calmed the fears of all the people in the West, civil and military, and provided them with aid. This was the region beyond the Huai River, which is why in the days of Song they called it West of the Huai, or the West. The Commissioner now ordered all his commanders to pack up and return to the capital.

Song Jiang ordered the main army to escort Commissioner Chen and the other two on the journey and told the water-borne leaders to sail on ahead to the capital first in their boats, tying up and awaiting orders when they got there. He instructed Magic Hand to compose an inscription and the Craftsman to carve a stone tablet to commemorate these events. The monument was placed to the east of Nanfeng at the foot of Dragon Heights, where it stands to this day. A send-off was organized for the Hu brothers; when Song Jiang returned to court he told the Emperor how they had turned over a new leaf and made an important contribution to the victory and got them appointed as water-borne commanders in Dongchuan, but that was later.

Song Jiang now divided the army into five columns and fixed the time of departure. As well as the troops left to guard each district, there were also a number who asked leave to return to farm their land. Nevertheless there were more than a hundred thousand who left Nanfeng and headed for the capital. They had strict orders not to cause any disturbance in the regions they passed through, and the people came out to greet them with incense, lamps and candles. After several days' march they came to the place called Autumn Woods Crossing, at the foot of the Autumn Woods range. The landscape around here was particularly beautiful, full of streams and rocks, and Song Jiang looked around him as he rode. Raising his eyes to the sky he saw a flock of wild geese, not flying in their usual formation but scattered any old how, as if something had frightened them. He was puzzled by the sight. Then he heard a clamour of applause from the troops ahead and sent someone to inquire the reason. What had happened was this: the Prodigy had been practising with a bow and arrows and had aimed at the geese flying overhead. Every arrow had hit. In no time at all he shot a dozen or so birds, to the amazement of his companions. Song Jiang summoned the Prodigy to him. He arrived at the gallop with his bow bent and an arrow ready, and his horse's crupper loaded with dead geese. He vaulted from the saddle in front of Song Jiang and stood to attention.

"So you've been shooting geese, have you?" Song Jiang said.

"I was practising and I saw these geese flying past, so I had a shot at them and to my surprise every arrow hit."

"It is natural for a soldier to practise archery, and you have a talent for it," Song Jiang said. "But just think about these migrating geese, how to escape the cold they leave the northern moun-tains and cross over lakes and frontiers to seek the warm lands south of the River in search of grain and rice, and then at the start of spring fly all the way back again. This bird is an emblem of virtue. No matter if they're ten or fifty, the group is bound together by mutual courtesy, the seniors go first, the youngest follow behind, their flight is orderly, they abide by the rules of the flock. When they rest at night they set a watch. If one of a pair is lost the other grieves and will take no other mate all its life. It is a bird which has all the five virtues: humanity, righteous-ness, courtesy, wisdom and faith. If they fly past a dead goose they show all the signs of alarm: this is humanity. If a goose loses its mate it never takes another: this is righteousness. They fly in their proper order with no striving to be first: that is courtesy. To avoid the eagle they go via lakes and passes, that is wisdom. South in autumn, north in spring, never failing: this is faith. A creature so abounding in virtue, how can you harm it? As the flock wings through the sky they call out to each other. They are just like our company. Now you have shot these birds, it's like losing one of our number is for us. How would we all feel? From now on please do not harm this admirable bird."

The Prodigy was silent. He deeply regretted his actions. Song Jiang still mastered by his emotion improvised this poem:

Geese wing their way across the heavens;
Suddenly one of a flying pair is cancelled by an arrow:

Song Jiang recited the poem. The words seemed to affect him deeply. That night they camped in the approaches to Autumn Woods Crossing. Song Jiang in his tent again remembered his sadness at the Prodigy's shooting the geese; he took out paper and brush and wrote the following:

Across the clear sky the flock is broken and the geese scatter in panic; their objective was simply to go down to the wintering grounds. For the grass is withered, the sand washed clean and the water spread out flat under a distant sky. It is hard to express all that one feels, at best one shares but a little of one's thoughts. At day's end the sky is veiled, evening mist rises from the ancient moat. Impossible to describe the sadness. Now that the reeds are gathered in, there is no more shelter. Alas, when will they return to visit the beauteous region? Birds call forlornly, the melancholy riverside is not a place where one would choose to linger. We await the return of spring days and the paired swallows atwitter in the eaves.

He gave this to the Professor and Taoist Gongsun to read. The sentiments expressed in the poem were gloomy and depressed in the extreme. Song Jiang was obviously plunged in gloom. That night the Professor and the others organized a party which only ended when they were all drunk. At dawn next day they mounted and rode south. It was near winter's end, but it was a wintry landscape they rode through, according well with Song Jiang's mood. They did not pause till they reached the capital and set up camp at Chenbridge, to await their orders.

Meanwhile Commissioner Chen and Marshal Hou had entered the city with the main army and had already told the Emperor of Song Jiang's achievements. They told him that General Song Jiang and his troops were on their way back to the capital and had already reached the frontier. The Emperor was full of praise when he heard from Commissioner Chen how hard Song Jiang and his troops had fought. The Commissioner and the Marshal were both honoured, as well as being rewarded with silver and silk. The palace chamberlain received orders to admit Song Jiang and his companions for an audience and to have them ride into the city in full armour.

In obedience to the imperial order, Song Jiang and the rest of the one hundred and eight put on their armour, dressed in embroidered robes, and with gold and silver banners rode through the Gate of Eastern Splendour to the Hall of Culture and Ethics for their audience with the Emperor. They kowtowed respectfully and gave him three cheers. It was a sight to gladden the Emperor's heart: all of them in brocade robes with gold belts, except the Professor, Taoist Gongsun, Lu Zhishen the Monk and Wu Song the Pilgrim, who wore their own appropriate dress. "We have heard much," he said, "of your bitter campaign and how hard you strove to suppress the bandits, how many of you suffered injury. Our heart goes out to you."

Song Jiang again prostrated himself and said: "Because Your Majesty enjoys such favour from heaven, we have come through, albeit with a few wounds. Now the traitors have surrendered, the West has been pacified. In serving Your Majesty's greatness how can we feel any burden?"

He prostrated himself again to show his gratitude, and then went on: "We beg now to present the captive Wang Qing to Your Majesty, in order that his case may be resolved."

The Emperor said: "I shall order the officials of the judicial committee to arrange for him to be punished with a lingering death."

Song Jiang told the story of how Bountiful masterminded the handing over of the city of Jingnan without harm to the people and modestly rejected any offer of advancement.

The Emperor said: "I am truly moved by such faithful service." He ordered the Military Council to try to bring Bountiful back to serve in the capital. Song Jiang and the others kowtowed again to show their gratitude. But what member of the Military Council was going to exert himself to acquire for the Emperor the services of an honest man? However, that is another story.

That same day the Emperor ordered the members of the Military Council to consider the conferring of rank and honours on Song Jiang and his company. The Grand Preceptor and the President of the Council, Marshal Tong, discussed it and proposed the following: "Peace has still not been fully restored, so we cannot make these appointments yet. Let us give to Song Jiang the title of Guardian of Righteousness, licensed to bear arms for his sovereign as Emperor's Champion, and to his second-in-command the Unicorn the title of Warrior First Class, also licensed to bear arms for the Emperor, as a palace guard. The Professor and the other thirty-three will have the rank of full commanders in the armed forces: the Strategist and the other seventy-one will have the rank of vice-commander. Their army will be rewarded with gold and silver from government funds." The Emperor accepted this arrangement and ordered the Military Council to confer these titles forthwith and to pay the monies due to them in advance.

Song Jiang and company went to bow and express their thanks in the Hall of Culture and Ethics. The Emperor ordered the Secretariat to prepare a great banquet and presented Song Jiang with an embroidered robe, a suit of gilt armour and a fine horse. For the rest, from the Unicorn down, the reward was different: it was to be drawn from the treasury.

That day after the judicial committee had prepared a placard announcing his crime, the prison cart was opened and Wang Qing was taken out. The words "hack to death" were pronounced and he was hustled towards the market place. The onlookers were jostling and shoving to get a better view. Some were spitting and shouting abuse, others were moved to tears. Wang Qing's father, his former wife and in-laws, his whole family and household had been apprehended when he first declared his rebellion and suffered the extreme penalty.

Now only Wang Qing was left to face the executioner's sword. Two stuttering rolls of the drum and a cracked note on the gong, the sword drawn and glittering like fresh snow; black banners streaming above like a storm cloud! The executioner's awesome roar summoning the demons of hell! The time a little past noon. Wang was dragged to the crossroads and the sentence was read out, ordering slow death by slicing. The onlookers might say to themselves:

The criminal always has something to teach us:
For dreams in the head the body must pay.
Surely the crime must have been heinous!
Why else should he suffer this way?

The chief executioner carried out the sentence and the felon's head was exhibited. Of this no more.

Having received their reward Song Jiang and his companions returned to the camp the following day. Now Taoist Gongsun strode into the command tent. He greeted them all with a very low bow and said: "Previously my teacher, the Blessed Sage, told me that after accompanying you back to the capital I was to return to him on the mountain. Now your achievement is complete and you have made your name, I must bid you farewell and take leave of the company, for I must return to study the Way with my teacher and look after my old mother for the remainder of her days."

Song Jiang had given his word and could not go back on it. But he was weeping inside as he said to Taoist Gongsun: "I remember the old days, when we first met, and it was like a flower opening. Now you must go and it is like the flower that fades and falls. I must be true to my word of course, but how will I be able to bear this parting?"

Taoist Gongsun said: "Had I abandoned you in the middle of something, then there would have been cause to reproach me. But now that you have fulfilled your task, you have to let me go."

Song Jiang tried hard to make him change his mind, but he would not. So as usual a feast was organized for all the company to bid him farewell. Cups were raised, with many a sigh. Everyone was sad and they all had gifts for him which he did his best to refuse. His friends however kept stuffing them in his pack. Next day, after a final farewell, Taoist Gongsun put on his hemp sandals, shouldered his pack, bowed low to the ground, and then set off northward. Song Jiang missed him sorely for many days and his heart was heavy.

In time it drew near to the first full moon of the new year, and government officials were all preparing to offer congratulations to the Emperor. The Grand Preceptor did not want Song Jiang and his companions to join this ceremony, because he feared that the Emperor would be obliged to give them all new official posts. He asked the Emperor to issue an order forbidding them to come to court for the ceremony, all except Song Jiang and the Unicorn who had official positions. The others, who had no rank, were to be excluded from the ceremony lest they offend the Emperor. At dawn on the day all the courtiers, including Song Jiang and the Unicorn in their uniforms, lined up in the court of the Water Clock to await the Emperor and to pay homage according to court etiquette. His Majesty held court that day in the Palace of Purple Dawn, where Song Jiang and the Unicorn after doing obeisance, waited in line below, not presuming to approach the throne. Gathered around the throne there were many notable beauties to be observed and much finery on display. Many a toast was drunk. After a whole morning of this the time came to express thanks and depart, and the Emperor was carried off in his palanquin. Song Jiang and the Unicorn changed their official robes and rode back to camp, flushed with drinking. When they arrived the others noticed Song Jiang's gloomy expression and seeing something was wrong came one by one to greet him, afterwards lining up on the side. Song Jiang merely hung his head and did not speak. "Why have you returned from court so sad, brother?" the Professor asked.

Song Jiang heaved a sigh: "Fortune it seems does not smile on me, my path is obstructed," he said. "We have smashed the Tartars and eliminated bandits, marched this way and that and suffered many hardships, and I have involved all of you in these things, yet without proper recompense. That is why I am sad."

"Just because things don't work out is not fit cause for grief," the Professor said. "Sorrow is to be shared and one should not take things too much to heart."

Iron Ox spoke up: "Don't you see, brother? When we were on Mount Liang none bothered us. But you kept saying amnesty, amnesty, and now we've got the amnesty and it's nothing but trouble. If we could only get out of here and go back to Mount Liang it'd be great!"
Song Jiang blew up. "This black brute is at it again," he shouted. "We're servants of the crown now, loyal servants of the Emperor. Don't you understand anything? You still can't change!"
Iron Ox said: "You won't listen to me, but I tell you, you're going to regret it!"
Everyone laughed at him and then they all drank Song Jiang's health. They went on till late that night before parting. Next day they went with a few dozen cavalry into the city to give the compliments of the season to Marshal Su, Counsellor Zhao and the members of the Council and their coming and going was noted by many.
Someone reported it to the Grand Preceptor, who next day petitioned the Emperor to have a banning order posted at all the city gates to say: "All members of the expeditionary force are to remain in their camp outside the city and await orders. Without receiving an order from the highest authority they are on no account to venture into the city! Any violation of this order is to be punished by military law!" Someone saw this notice when it was put up outside the Chenbridge Gate and reported it to Song Jiang, whose gloom increased. When the others heard about it they were furious and would have rebelled, only Song Jiang prevented it.
The boat captains went to the Professor and told him they wanted to discuss something. The Professor went down to the boats, where the White-Water Dragon and the rest said to him: "The court has broken faith with us. Corrupt officials have usurped power and are standing in the way of honest men. The Leader has destroyed the Tartars, annihilated Tian Hu and now put down Wang Qing. All he's got for it is the title of Emperor's Champion, and we ordinary folk have not been promoted at all. Now there are notices everywhere prohibiting us from entering the city. Most likely those scoundrelly officials plan to break up our company and post us all to different places. We want to make a proposal to you, because we know that if we put it to the Leader he will reject it. Let us attack the capital and plunder it. Then we can go back to the Marshes of Mount Liang. The outlaw's life is the only one for us."
The Professor said: "The Leader will definitely not stand for that. You're wasting your breath. If the arrowhead's not good, do you break the shaft? Everyone knows a headless snake won't get anywhere. How do you expect me to propose this? Even if he agreed, there'd still have to be a way of putting it into action. If he doesn't accept it, you'll never get anywhere with this rebellion of yours!"
When they saw the Professor wasn't prepared to put forward the proposal, the boat leaders shut up. The Professor went back and while he was chatting with Song Jiang about the military situation, he said: "We always used to be completely independent, completely at ease. All of us had a good life. But since we received the amnesty, we have fought for our country and served our country, and not been under any constraint, but we have not been given responsibility, and our brothers are angry."
Song Jiang was shocked: "Has somebody been saying something to you?"
"It's a normal reaction, why should it need explaining? As they say, if you have riches and honour everyone wants you, if you're poor and a thief everyone shuns you. Look at the shape and the colour if you're judging the state of a beast or a situation."
Song Jiang said: "If the comrades are becoming disaffected, it would be better for me to die and go to the other world with my honour still intact!"
Early next morning he called a general meeting. When they were all assembled in front of the tent, Song Jiang began his speech: "I started off as just a local clerk in Yuncheng. Then I committed a serious crime. But thanks to the support of all of you, I became your leader. I have now risen to a government position. But you know the saying, 'Without pain no gain.' Success and trouble go together. We may not like this ban the authorities have imposed on us, but it is our duty to respect it. You must none of you enter the city unless you have a reason. We lived as outlaws in the mountains and forests and our manners are rough and ready. If we cause trouble, we will face the penalty of the law and also ruin our reputation. It is really all for the best that we are not allowed into the city. If you resent these restrictions and won't accept them, you had better cut off my head first, and then you can do what you like. For otherwise, if I am to live in the world without honour, I will have to kill myself and leave you free to do as you please."
This speech produced tears and protestations of loyalty from all of them. They dispersed and thereafter none of them went into the city without business there. But the fifteenth of the first month was approaching and it was the custom in the capital to have a display of lights to celebrate the first new moon of the year. All the streets would be festooned with lanterns and every government office would be lit up.
The Prodigy and Lungs were discussing the festival. "There's going to be this display of lights and fireworks in the capital to celebrate the new year, the Emperor and the people will all be having a good time. Why don't we two change our clothes and slip into the city to see it?"
As they spoke, someone else suddenly appeared and said: "If you're going to see the lights, please let me come with you." It was Iron Ox. He went on: "I know you didn't want me to know about it. But I heard everything."
The Prodigy said: "I'd have nothing against your coming with us if it wasn't for your temper. You're bound to cause a disturbance. You know this ban of the Military Council's forbids us to go into the city. If you go with us to see the lights and cause some sort of rumpus, we will have fallen right into their trap."
"I won't cause any trouble this time, I'll do exactly as you say!"
"All right, tomorrow we must all dress up as travellers," said the Prodigy. "You can come with us."
Iron Ox was delighted with this. Next day he dressed appropriately and waited for the Prodigy. Unfortunately Lungs was terrified of Iron Ox, and he went off earlier with the Flea. There was no escape for the Prodigy; he had to take Iron Ox with him to see the lights. He dared not enter the city directly through the Chenbridge Gate, so they made a big detour and went in through the Gate of the Mounds.
Strolling along arm in arm they came to a house of entertainment called the Mulberry Club. They heard the sound of gongs coming from inside and nothing would suffice Iron Ox but that they should go in, so the Prodigy pulled him into the middle of a crowd. They could hear the voice of a storyteller upstairs. He was reciting from the Romance of the Three Kingdoms and had reached the point where Duke Guan has his bone scraped to remove the poison. The Duke has had this poisoned arrow in his shoulder, you see, and the poison has entered the bone. The doctor says: "In order to deal with the poison we must erect a brass post with an iron ring on top and put your arm through it and secure it with rope. Then I will have to cut the wound open and remove a proportion of the bone to get rid of the poison. I will stitch it up with oiled thread and apply an ointment externally and some special medicine internally. In two weeks it will be as good as new. The treatment for this kind of wound is very hard." The Duke gives a loud laugh and says: "A true man has no fear of death, so why should he be worried about an arm? I don't need your post and your ring. Why don't you just start cutting right away?" He calls for a chessboard and starts a game, offering his left arm to the doctor and telling him to scrape the bone and remove the poison. His colour does not change and he goes on talking and joking with the onlookers. When the storyteller reached this point there was a great roar of approval from Iron Ox: "That's what I call a real man!"
The rest of the audience turned and stared at Iron Ox and the Prodigy in amazement. The Prodigy hurriedly tried to shut him up: "What a country bumpkin you are, brother!"
Iron Ox protested: "You can't help applauding something like that!"
The Prodigy dragged him away from the Mulberry Club and they wandered down a narrow passage where they came upon a fellow intent on destroying a citizen's house: bricks and mortar were flying all over the place.
The citizen was saying: "These are times of peace, heaven and earth are supposed to be at rest! Just because I ask him to pay back some money he wants to tear my house down!"
When Iron Ox heard this he smelt an injustice and wanted to step right in and start a fight. The Prodigy was equally determined to prevent it. Iron Ox went on glaring at the man ferociously, itching for trouble. The man said: "I've got an account to settle with him. What business is it of yours? Any day now I've got to go with Marshal Zhang to fight south of the river, so you'd better not provoke me. If I go there I'm as good as dead anyway, I might as well fight you here, because if I get killed at least I'll get a decent coffin."
"What's all this about south of the river?" said Iron Ox. "I haven't heard anything about a mobilization order."
The fight having been averted, they went back down the passage and at the end of a side-street found a tiny teahouse. They went in and found a place to sit and have a cup of tea. Sitting opposite was an old fellow who invited them to join him. They chatted as they drank their tea, and the Prodigy asked: "Tell me, sir, at the end of this street we met a soldier involved in a brawl and he said he was going south of the river with Marshal Zhang and that there would be a mobilization. Is it true there's going to be a war?"
"You haven't heard then?" the old man said. "The bandit Fang La is in rebellion south of the river. He has occupied eight provinces and twenty-five districts, which he calls his country. Sometime soon he'll attack Yangzhou. The government have sent Marshal Zhang and General Liu to arrest him."
Iron Ox hurriedly paid for their tea and they raced back to the camp. They went straight to the Professor and told him about it. He thought it excellent news and went to tell Song Jiang about Fang La's rebellion and how the court had appointed Marshal Zhang to lead a campaign against him. Song Jiang said: "We are all of us wasting our time here, it's very bad for us. Don't you think we should send to Marshal Su and ask him to tell the Emperor we would like to offer our services in this war?" When they held a general meeting of the leaders everyone approved this plan. Next day Song Jiang changed his uniform and took the Prodigy with him to the city to help explain things. They went straight to Marshal Su's. The Marshal was at home and as soon as they were announced he invited them in. Song Jiang stepped up to the dais and prostrated himself respectfully. The Marshal said: "What can I do for you, General? I see you come all dressed up."
Song Jiang said: "Because of the recent notices published by the Military Council, forbidding military personnel to enter the city unless summoned, I would not come without cause. I have ventured to come here because I wish to make a request. I have heard that Fang La has started a rebellion south of the river, that he has proclaimed a new dynasty and has overrun Runzhou and is likely to cross the river and attack Yangzhou. My army and I have long been idle, wasting our time in camp. We request permission to join the campaign and fight for our country. I would ask Your Excellency to forward our request to the Emperor."
The Marshal's reaction was most favourable: "Your words accord exactly with my thoughts, General. I shall support your request in every way. Please return to your camp and tomorrow morning I will present your proposal to the Emperor. I am sure His Majesty will give you employment."
Song Jiang returned to camp and told the others.
Next day Marshal Su attended the dawn court. While the Emperor was presiding over his officials, civil and military, in the Hall of Incense, he was told how Fang La was wreaking havoc south of the river where he had seized territory and proclaimed his own dynasty (a new year name) and was thus in rebellion and usurping the prerogatives of the Emperor and how an attack on Yangzhou was feared. The Emperor said: "But we have already appointed Marshal Zhang and General Liu to lead a campaign and we do not yet know the outcome."
At this Marshal Su stepped forward and said: "This outlaw poses a serious threat. Your Majesty has already appointed Marshal Zhang and General Liu, it is true, but we should send Song Jiang's two armies which have just returned victorious from the West to spearhead the attack. I am sure they will be successful."
The Emperor thought this was a good idea and immediately sent someone to the Military Council with orders. The members of the Military Council came to the palace to receive the edict, and Song Jiang and the Unicorn were ordered to attend for an audience with the Emperor in the Hall of Incense. When they had paid homage His Majesty gave Song Jiang the letter appointing him Commander of the Southern Pacification Expedition against Fang La, and appointing the Unicorn his second-in-command. Each was awarded a gold belt, a brocade robe, a suit of gold armour, a fine horse and twenty-five coloured silk coats with linings. The others were all given silk and silver with a promise of further honours if the expedition was successful.
After receiving their commissions Song Jiang and the Unicorn bade the Emperor farewell. The Emperor said: "Among your company there is one who is an expert carver of inscriptions, known as the Craftsman, and also one who knows how to cure sick horses known as Redbeard. Would you leave these two behind to serve me?"
They assented, thanked the Emperor again and returned to the camp.
The two leaders rode along contentedly, letting their horses follow their own pace. Outside the town they came to a market-place where they saw a man who was playing with an object in his hand. It was contrived of two sticks with a string stretched between them which when manipulated by the hand caused an object to hum. It was unfamiliar to Song Jiang, so he had a soldier call the man over and asked: "What is that thing?"
The man replied: "It's a Tartar bell. You pull the string and it makes a noise." Song Jiang made a verse about this:

A low note and a high note,
Loud enough and clear enough to reach heaven;
But on its own a heroic spirit isn't much use;
Without a helping hand it won't produce!

Song Jiang said to the Unicorn with a laugh: "It's like you and me, you see. We might have huge talents, but without someone to help us along we won't produce a sound."
"Why do you say that?" said the Unicorn. "From what we know of the great leaders past or present, it's great personal ability they need and without it they won't do anything great however much they are promoted."
Song Jiang said: "I'm afraid I can't agree with you there. If it weren't for Marshal Su's generous support, we would never have been allowed to return to the Emperor's service. One should not forget what one owes to others."
The Unicorn knew that he was wrong and had nothing to say to that.
When they returned to the camp there was a meeting for all the leaders in the command tent. Except for the woman warrior Jade Arrowtip, who was pregnant and remained in the capital with the husband and wife team of the Butler to look after her and the doctor to attend her, they were all told to pack up and prepare their horses and armour and be ready to march, to join the campaign against Fang La. Later, when her time came, Jade Arrowtip was delivered of a fine boy with a square face and big ears. He was named Zhang Jie. Later, when she heard her husband had been killed by the rebel Li Tianrun on Lone Pine Heights she fainted from grief. Afterwards she went herself with the Butler and Mrs. Ye to Lone Pine Heights and they bore the coffin back to Hotshot's old home town of Zhangde for burial. Later still when the Butler became ill, she lived with old Mrs. Ye. She had a hard time of it bringing up the fatherless child. When Zhang Jie was grown he took part in the famous defeat of the Jin at Monk's Plain, where their general escaped detection by shaving off his beard. For this he was given high military honours, but later went home to look after his old mother until she died. Because she had remained constant to the memory of her husband, he obtained permission to erect a memorial arch in her honour. Thus ended the story of Jade Arrowtip and her filial and conjugal virtues.
But enough of this. We must return to Song Jiang who, the day after receiving his commission to march against Fang La obtained the gift of silk and silver from the government stores and divided it among the leaders for distribution to the army. He also sent Redbeard and the Craftsman to the court to attend the Emperor. He dealt first with the boats, ordering the captains to prepare poles, oars and sails and head for the main river, at the same time ordering the cavalry to prepare bows, arrows, spears and swords, uniforms and armour. It was to be a joint attack by land and water, and in order to keep up with the boats they must be ready to march immediately. At this point the Grand Preceptor sent one of his household to request the services of Magic Hand to do some writing for him. The next day some bigwig turned up in person to ask for Lungs because he had heard he had a wonderful voice and wanted to give him a position in his household. Song Jiang had to accede to all these requests. He had now lost five of his company and he was not at all happy about it. Finally, having made his plans with the Unicorn, he ordered all the leaders to prepare to leave the city.

Now, this Fang La had long been disaffected. His strength had grown gradually, and now turned into a serious threat. Originally he had been a woodcutter in the mountains of Shezhou. One day he had gone to the river to wash and in his reflection had seen himself wearing a crown and the dragon robes. Because of this he told people that he was destined to be emperor. At the time when granite was collected in the south, the people had become resentful and disaffected. Fang La took advantage of this to declare his rebellion, and built himself a grand citadel at Bangyuan Gap in the district of Clearwater, complete with gardens, halls and towers. He also had travelling palaces at Muzhou and Shezhou and equipped himself with a complete set of officials, civil and military, a military council, court servants and military commanders, the whole shooting-match. In all he seized eight towns — Shezhou, Muzhou, Hangzhou, Suzhou, Changzhou, Huxhou, Xuanzhou and Runzhou. Now he styled himself emperor and illicitly claimed authority over the whole region: it was a serious business.
The name Fang La originated from Taoist books. In one of them it says: "To thousands ten add a small stroke, in winter's depths give praise and honour. After crossing the river, he makes his appearance in the southern kingdom." For "thousands ten" it is more usual to say "ten thousand" which is written with the character wan. If you add a small stroke to wan you get fang. Winter's depths is the winter solstice in December and the festival which celebrates it is known as la. One to whom praise and honour are given is the ruler. So you have the two characters for Fang La, who declares himself ruler of eight towns south of the river, a region whose natural boundary is the Yangtze.
Meanwhile Song Jiang having selected his leaders and said goodbye to the worthy councillors, Marshal Su and Counsellor Zhao came to give him a send-off and reward the troops. The boat captains moved out into the Huai River and set sail for the naval base at Huai'an with instructions to assemble at Yangzhou. Song Jiang and the Unicorn thanked Su and Zhao, divided their army into five columns and headed for Yangzhou.
The journey was uneventful. The advance guard made camp at Huai'an, where a local official organized a banquet for them and invited Song Jiang into the city when he arrived. The official told Song Jiang: "Fang La's army is formidable, you must not underestimate them. Ahead of you is the Great River, that's the first hurdle you have to leap. On the other bank of the river is Runzhou, At present this stretch of the river bank is defended by Fang La's chief lieutenant and twelve others. Unless you can gain Runzhou as a base you'll find it difficult to defeat them."
Song Jiang therefore asked the Professor to devise a plan. Since the river lay in front of them blocking their path, it would be necessary to use the boats to lead the attack.
The Professor said: "There are two islands in the river opposite Runzhou. You can get some of our comrades to go there first to reconnoitre, to find out what is going on on the other bank and what sort of boats we need for the crossing."
Song Jiang summoned the boat captains to receive their orders. "Which of you're prepared to undertake a spying mission for me and find out what's going on across the river?" 4 of them volunteered. And if it had not been these 4, things might have been different. We would not have seen the corpses piled high to rival North Peak or the waters of the Yangtze died red with blood.

Happening to look up at the sky, Song Jiang saw several lines of wild geese. But they were not in their usual formations. Some flew high, some low, and all were squawking in alarm.
While puzzling over this, he heard cries of admiration further up the line of march, and sent a mounted scout to inquire. The man quickly returned and reported that Yan Qing the Prodigy had been practicing with his bow. Every arrow had hit a goose, bringing down well over a dozen, thus arousing the watchers' acclaim.
Song Jiang directed that Yan Qing come to him immediately. The Prodigy wore a broad-brimmed white felt hat and a parrot-yellow tunic quilted with flaxen floss. Astride a roan desert steed and carrying his bow and arrows, he cantered up to halt before Song Jiang, the dead geese hanging over his horse's rump. He dismounted and stood waiting.
"Was that you, shooting geese just now?"
"I needed practice and saw them flying overhead. I didn't expect every arrow to score a hit. I must have brought down more than a dozen."
"A military man ought to practice his archery, and you're an expert at it. I was just thinking—these geese leave the Tianshan Range in autumn and fly south across the Yangzi with reeds in their beaks to where it's warm and they can find food, and don't return till the following spring. They're the most virtuous of birds. They travel in flocks of up to half a hundred, flying in orderly ranks, with the leader at the head and the inferiors behind. They never leave the flock, and post sentinels when they rest at night. If a gander loses his goose, or a goose her gander, they never mate again. These fowl possess all five attributes—virtue, righteousness, propriety, knowledge and faith.
"If a goose dies in flight, all utter cries of mourning, and none will ever harass a bereaved bird. This is virtue. When a fowl loses its mate, it never pairs again. This is righteousness. They fly in a definite order, each automatically taking its place. This is propriety. They avoid hawks and eagles, silently crossing the passes with reed sticks in their beaks. This is knowledge. They fly south in autumn and north in spring, every year without fail. This is faith.
"How could you have the heart to harm such admirable creatures? Those geese passing in the sky, all helping one another, are very much like our band of brothers. Yet you shoot them down. How would we feel if it were some of our brothers we had lost? You must never hurt these virtuous birds again!"
Yan Qing listened in penitent silence. Emotionally, Song Jiang composed and recited a poem:

Jagged peaks draped in mist,
Three lines of geese across the sky.
Suddenly in flight a mate is lost—
Cold moon, chill breeze, a mournful cry.

He felt extremely depressed. That night, the army camped at Double Woods Crossing. Song Jiang brooded in his tent. He called for paper and writing brush and composed these lines:

Far from the startled scattered flock
In the vast clear firmament
A wild goose flies.
A lone shadow seeking a sheltering pond

Finding naught but dry grass, sandy wastes,
Open water, endless skies.
No poet,
I can only set down these few thoughts.
Dusk in an empty ravine,
Campfire smoke in an ancient fort,
I'm more dejected than I can say!
Though we've cleared the reeds
We've no place to spend the night.
When, oh when, will we see once more
The Yumen Gate to our homeland!
Drearily, I sob and sigh.
Longing to depart this hateful river.
Would that spring come soon again,
With swallows nesting in the beams.

Song Jiang showed what he had written to Wu Yong and Gongsun Sheng. His sadness and loneliness were quite apparent. He was very unhappy. That night Wu Yong plied him with wine until he was drunk.

The next morning they mounted and continued the southward march. It was early winter, and the desolate landscape deepened Song Jiang's gloom.

After many a day, they finally neared the capital. They made camp at Chen Bridge Station and awaited the emperor's directive.

Marshal Su and Commissioner Zhao, who had reached the city first with the central army, praised Song Jiang's deeds to the sovereign, and reported that he and his forces were already outside the pass in the environs of the capital. Commissioner Zhao related the arduous exploits of Song Jiang and his generals in the border region. The monarch warmly voiced his approbation. He instructed the royal chamberlain to summon them to his presence, and permit them to enter the capital in full armor.

On being notified by the royal chamberlain, Song Jiang and his chieftains—one hundred and eight in all—donned armor and helmets, carried their weapons, hung gold and silver slabs on their silken robes, and filed into the palace through the East Glory Gate. His Majesty received them in the Hall of Culture and Virtue, where they kowtowed and shouted long live the emperor. Their magnificent military apparel impressed the monarch. Only Wu Yong, Lu Zhishen and Wu Song wore the clothes of their religious calling. The sovereign was very pleased.

"I have heard much of your hardships on the expedition and your dedication in the border region. I was greatly concerned over the many casualties you suffered," he aid.

Again kowtowing, Song Jiang replied: "Thanks to the good fortune emanating from Your Majesty, the border region is now at peace. Some of my generals were wounded, but none seriously. The sandy kingdom of the Liao has already capitulated. This, too, is a result of Your Majesty's benevolent teaching." He bowed once more and expressed his gratitude.

The emperor wanted to confer on Song Jiang a rank of nobility, but Premier Cai Jing and Chancellor of Military Affairs Tong Guan advised against it.

"Our borders are still troubled," they said. "He should not be raised. Give him an honorary title of Defender of Righteousness, let him bear imperial arms, and put him in charge of guarding the palace. As to Lu Junyi, he can be called Military Teacher and be permitted to bear imperial weapons; make him head of military training. Wu Yong and the rest of the thirty-six can become full commanders, Zhu Wu and the remainder of the seventy-two can be vice-commanders. We can also spread some money among the soldiers."

The sovereign agreed. He instructed the Council of Military Affairs to grant the appropriate ranks and issue the monetary rewards. Song Jiang and his chieftains kowtowed and thanked the emperor for his benevolence. The monarch ordered the Imperial Caterers to give a banquet in their honor. When it was over, Song Jiang was presented with a silken robe, a set of gold armor, and a fine horse. Lu Junyi and the others were also given gifts drawn from the Treasury. All expressed their thanks. They withdrew from the palace through the West Glory Gate, mounted and returned to camp, there to await further orders from the imperial court.

Gongsun Sheng, the following day, came to Song Jiang's tent. He placed his palms together and bowed in the Taoist fashion to Song and the other chieftains.

"My teacher Luo the Sage instructed me to return to the mountain and continue my studies after escorting you safely to the capital. You agreed to this, brother," he said to Song Jiang. "Now that you have returned, famous and in triumph, I must not linger. I shall say farewell, go back to the mountain, and spend the rest of my days studying the Way and caring for my old mother."

Song Jiang couldn't renege on his promise. With tears in his eyes he said: "Our days together were like opening flowers. Our parting is like flowers that fall. I gave my word, but it breaks my heart to see you go!"

"I would be lacking love and respect if I left you halfway. But you're already famous and a success. This is no place for a poor Taoist. You must give your consent."

When all Song Jiang's urgings proved in vain, he ordered a large farewell banquet. All sighed as they raised their cups. Tears flowed with the wine. Gongsun refused gifts of gold and silks. The chieftains, over his protests, stuffed them in his luggage.

The next day he took his leave. He wore hemp sandals and carried his luggage on his back. Palms together, he bowed his head, then set off towards the north.

New Year's Day was fast approaching, and the officials prepared to celebrate. Premier Cai was afraid that if Song Jiang and all his chieftains were present at the court festivities the emperor would see them and be reminded to make important use of them. He therefore persuaded the monarch to limit the invitations to Song Jiang and Lu Junyi, the only two who held imperial posts. The other chieftains who had been on the expedition against the Tartars had no official ranks. They were "excused" from attending lest they "alarm the sovereign."

On New Year's Day the emperor held court, and the officials came to offer their congratulations. Song Jiang and Lu Junyi, both in formal dress, were in the Waiting Room for the morning imperial audience, and kowtowed with the officials. The emperor, in fringed hat and wearing a jade-encrusted girdle, was seated on his throne, attended by his high ministers. But neither Song Jiang and Lu Junyi nor the officials were allowed to enter the imperial hall. They could only observe the jewelled ornaments and fine trappings of the ministers, coming and going as they toasted the sovereign.

This went on from dawn until noon. Only then were those outside given a little imperial wine with which to express their thanks. Then the officials withdrew and the emperor concluded his court.

Song and Lu left the palace, removed their court dress, mounted their horses and returned to camp, their faces dark. Wu Yong and the other chieftains were waiting for them. As they offered congratulations on the holiday, they observed Song Jiang's gloomy expression. The hundred or more of them lined up on either side. Song Jiang sat in silence, his head lowered.

Song Jiang sighed. "I must have been both unlucky. We went through so much hardship to smash the Liao, but I've obtained very little for you brothers. I myself have been made only a petty official."

"Though you haven't yet achieved good fortune, why be downcast? All things are pre-ordained. There's no need to worry."

Li Kui the Black Whirlwind spoke. "You still haven't thought this out, brother! When we were in Liangshan Marsh, nobody could push us around. But all you could talk about was amnesty, amnesty! Now that we've got it we have nothing but aggravation. We brothers are all here together. Let's go back to Liangshan Marsh, I say, and be happy!"

"You're talking wild again, black beast," Song Jiang shouted. "All of us have been made officers in the imperial army. You don't understand these things. You're still a rebel at heart!"

"If you don't listen to me, brother," Li Kui insisted, "all you'll get is more abuse!"

Everyone laughed. They raised their cups and congratulated Song Jiang on the New Year. They drank until the second watch before breaking up.

The next day, with a dozen horsemen, Song Jiang entered the city and offered congratulations on the New Year to Marshal Su, Commissioner Zhao, and various ministry officials. Many persons observed this, and one of them reported to Cai Jing. The following day, after obtaining the emperor's approval, Cai had notices posted on every city gate!

They read as follows: All officers and commanders of expeditionary forces shall remain in camp and wait for orders. They are not to enter the city without specific instructions in writing from higher headquarters. Whoever disobeys shall be punished according to military law.

One of the notices was posted at Chen Bridge Gate, and a person who saw it told Song Jiang. His depression deepened. The chieftains were furious. Except for Song Jiang, all seethed with rebellion.

Several naval chieftains requested a conference with Wu Yong. Escorted on board a warship, he met Li Jun, Zhang Heng, Zhang Shun and the three Ruan brothers.

"The imperial court doesn't keep its word. Treacherous ministers wield power and block the correct path," they said. "Although Brother Song Jiang has broken the Liao, he's been made only a petty palace functionary. He hasn't been able to obtain any raise in rank or rewards for the rest of us. Now a notice has been posted forbidding us entry into the city. We think those evil ministers are trying to split us up, to transfer us away. We'd like you to support us. If we ask brother, he'll flatly refuse. Our idea is to fight a bloody battle, pillage the city clean, go back to Liangshan Marsh and become brigands again! That would be best!"

"Brother Song Jiang will certainly refuse. You're wasting your time. If the arrow point doesn't leave the bow, the shaft is sure to snap. The headless snake cannot crawl. How can I propose such a thing? We can't do anything until brother is willing. If he doesn't agree and you rebel on your own, you'll never succeed."

It was plain that the military advisor would not be their advocate. The six naval chieftains fell silent.

Returning to camp, Wu Yong chatted with Song Jiang about military affairs. Then he said: "Our brothers usually were free to come and go as they pleased, and they were quite happy with the situation. Yet today, even though we've been amnestied and you've been made an official, they're suddenly been restricted. They can't accept it. They're very angry."

Song Jiang was startled. "Has someone been saying something to you?"

"No one had to say anything. It's common sense. As the old saying goes: 'People want wealth and position, they hate being poor and lowly.' You've only to look at their faces to see their mood."

"The brothers may want to revolt, Military Advisor, but though I die and go to the Nether World I'll never abandon my loyalty to the emperor!"

The next morning Song Jiang summoned all his chieftains for a conference. When they had assembled before his tent, he addressed them.

"After starting in life as a petty functionary in Yuncheng, I committed a major crime. Thanks to your support, brothers, I became your leader and, today, a government official. Since ancient times it has been said: 'A mature man is not without restraint; without restraint one cannot achieve maturity.' The court has its reasons for posting those notices. You're not to go into the city without permission. Many of us in the mountain forests were just rough soldiers. Whoever stirs up trouble will surely be dealt with according to law. Our reputation will be damaged. It's lucky for us we're not allowed into the city. If you feel so hampered that you must revolt, cut off my head first! Otherwise I won't be able to face the world. I'll have to kill myself! The choice is yours!"

At Song Jiang's words, the chieftains wept. They reaffirmed their fealty, and the meeting disbanded.

From then on, unless on official business, none of them went into the city. As the first lunar festival drew near, in the Eastern Capital, as was the annual custom, the streets were festooned with lanterns. In the camp, Yan Qing the Prodigy had a proposal for Yue Ho the Iron Throat.

"The emperor and the people are celebrating the New Year with fireworks and lantern displays. Let's disguise ourselves and go in and have a look."

"If you're going to see the lanterns," someone said, "You'll have to take me."

Yan Qing turned around. It was Li Kui the Black Whirlwind.

"There's no use trying to fool me," said Li Kui. "I heard everything."

"We can take you easily enough," said Yan Qing, "but I'm worried about that temper of yours. You're sure to stir up trouble. The Council of Military Affairs has posted notices forbidding us to enter the city. If you create a row, we'll fall right into their trap."

"I won't cause any fuss. I'll do whatever you say."

"All right, then. Dress up as a traveller tomorrow, and you can come."

Black Whirlwind was delighted.

The next day, in the garb of travellers, the three set out. Yue Ho and Shi Qian, whom they happened to meet, sneaked in first. Yan Qing couldn't get rid of Li Kui and had no choice but to let the Black Whirlwind accompany him. They dared not enter the Chen Bridge Gate. Making a detour around the capital, they went in through Fengqiu Gate.

Hand in hand they strolled towards the amusement center. Li Kui, hearing the sound of music, insisted on going in. He and Yan Qing pushed through the crowds to where a performer was reciting a ballad based on an episode in the novel The Romance of the Three Kingdoms. It was about the famous hero of antiquity, Guan Yu, who had been struck in the left arm by an arrow. The poison had seeped into his bone.

"If you want me to cure you," said the doctor, "you'll have to put your arm through iron hoops attached to a bronze rod and let me bind it tight. I'll slice open your flesh and cut out the three tenths of the bone that's been poisoned. After putting growth-promoting medicine inside, I'll sew you up with oiled thread and apply ointment to the outside. In less than half a month you'll be as good as new. But the operation is very painful."

Guan Yu laughed. "Even death doesn't daunt a real man. Would I worry about a mere arm? No need for your rod and hoops. Just slice away!"

He called for his chess-board, and played a game with a friend, while the doctor carved the bone and extracted the poison. Guan Yu never blanched. He chatted and laughed with his friend all the while.

When the ballad reciter reached this point, Li Kui shouted out: "Now that's what I call a brave man!"

The startled audience turned to stare. Yan Qing hastily restrained him.

"How can you be so dumb, brother? An amusement center is no place to make a big disturbance over a little thing!"

"I couldn't help it. I was carried away."

Yan Qing dragged him out. They left the amusement center and walked along a cross-town street. A man was slinging bricks and tiles at another man's house.

"Twice I've loaned you money," cried the person under attack. "Not only do you refuse to pay back but, out of a clear blue sky, you bombard my house!"

Aroused by the injustice, Li Kui wanted immediately to intervene. Yan Qing flung both arms around his waist. Li Kui glared.

"There's a debt question between him and me," said the brick thrower. "What's it to you? I'm going south of the Yangzi any day now in an expedition against the bandits, so you'd better not rile me! It's sure death down there! I'd just as leave fight you and be killed here! I end up in a coffin either way!"

"What's this about going south?" said Black Whirlwind. "We haven't had any mustering of troops or orders to commanders."

Yan Qing calmed the combatants and, with Li Kui, left the cross-town street. Traversing a lane, they saw a small tea-shop, went in and sat down. As they were sipping their beverage, they got into conversation with an old fellow, opposite.

"Can you tell us something, grandpa?" said Yan Qing. "We ran into a brawling soldier just now who said he was leaving soon on an expedition across the Yangzi. Where exactly are they going?"

"Oh, you don't know? A bandit there named Fang La has rebelled. He's occupied eight prefectures from Muzhou to Runzhou and twenty-five counties. He calls this territory a nation. Sooner or later the rebels will attack Yangzhou. The emperor has ordered Military Governor Zhang and District Commander Liu to clean them out."

Yan Qing and Li Kui paid their bill and hurried back to camp, where they reported their conversation to Wu Yong. The military advisor was very pleased. He told Song Jiang about it.

"Being idle here is not right," said Song Jiang. "We should ask Marshal Su to petition the emperor to let us join the expedition."

He discussed the matter with his chieftains. They all liked the idea.

The next day Song Jiang changed his clothes and went into town with Yan Qing. At the residency of Marshal Su they dismounted. They were announced and, on the marshal's instructions, ushered in. Song Jiang bowed in greeting.

"Why are you dressed in civilian garb, General?"

"The Military Affairs Council has forbidden all expeditionary officers to enter the city unless summoned, and I wanted to see Your Excellency privately. I hear that Fang La, south of the Yangzi, has rebelled, occupied several prefectures, and calls himself a king. He's advanced as far as Runzhou. It's expected that, sooner or later, he'll cross the river and attack Yangzhou. My forces are idle, just camped here. It's not right. I'd like to lead them on an expedition against Fang La and demonstrate our loyalty. I pray Your Excellency petition the emperor for us."

Marshal Su was very pleased. "Exactly what I'd been thinking, General. This is of great importance to our country and our people. Why shouldn't I petition the emperor? Go back. I'll do it first thing in the morning. He's sure to give it serious attention."

Song Jiang bid the marshal farewell, returned to camp, and informed his brothers.

When the marshal attended the early court the next day, he found the monarch conferring with his civil and military officials in the Mantled in Incense Hall. The emperor was speaking of how Fang La was ravaging the south, how he had occupied twenty-five counties in eight prefectures, given himself a dynastic title, had rebelled and proclaimed himself king. It was only a question of time until he attacked Yangzhou.

"I have directed Governor Zhang and District Commander Liu to lead an expedition, but so far I haven't seen any results," the emperor said.

"The bandits are a serious menace," Marshal Su agreed. "Why not send, in addition, Song Jiang who defeated the Liao Tartars? The two combined forces can surely wipe out the rebels and win a great victory."

"Your proposal suits my purposes excellently," said the monarch. He ordered that the Chancellor of Military Affairs be summoned to hear his decree.

Governor Zhang and his staff officers Cong and Geng requested that Song Jiang and his troops go as the vanguard of the expedition. When the Chancellor of Military Affairs had received his orders, Song Jiang and Lu Junyi were sent for. They kowtowed before the emperor.

The sovereign proclaimed Song Jiang Commander-in-Chief of the Southern Pacification, and Vanguard of the Expedition Against Fang La. He named Lu Junyi as second in command. To each he awarded a gold belt, a silk robe, golden armor, a fine horse, and good cloth for twenty-five garments. The other generals were given cloth and silver, and a promise of a rise in rank and status upon displays of merit in battle. Silver was given to the various chieftains. All these awards were to be drawn from the official treasury. A time limit was set for the departure of the expeditionary force. Song Jiang and Lu Junyi begged to take leave of the emperor.
"You have a carver of jade seals, Jin Dajian, and an experienced judge of horses, Huangfu Duan," said the monarch. "Leave those two for our use."
Song Jiang and Lu Junyi again kowtowed. They thanked the emperor, left the palace, mounted their steeds and headed for camp. They rode side by side in high spirits.
In a marketplace outside the city they saw a man shaking out a rhythm on a pair of wooden castanets. They clattered with the movements of his hand. Song Jiang had never seen such a contraption.
He had a soldier ask the fellow: "What is that thing?"
"It's called a Foreign Clapper. When you shake your hand, it makes a noise."
Song Jiang composed a poem on the spot:

Now a low sound, now a high,
Clackety-clack into the sky,
Though heroic strength pervades the air,
If not used, it's wasted there.

From his seat in the saddle, he laughed. "That Foreign Clapper is like you and me. Between us, we have heaven-piercing capabilities. But if no one shakes us into action, how can we perform any resounding deeds?"
He told his aides to give the man some silver, and they rode on. Song Jiang continued to chat with Lu Junyi. Again poetic images rose in his mind, and he composed another verse:

Though by the finest craftsmen made,
Feeble chime the hearts of jade.
Only taken well in hand,
Will they ring throughout the land.

"Why do you say that, brother?" Lu protested. "Our talents are equal to those of any general, past or present. If that weren't so, what good would it do to take us in hand?"
"You're wrong, brother. If Marshal Su hadn't petitioned for us, would the emperor have given us such important assignments? A man who gains fame shouldn't forget his benefactors."
Lu felt the reprimand was justified. He had nothing more to say.
Returning to camp, they convened a meeting of the chieftains and directed that as many horses and as much armor as possible be assembled in preparation for an expedition against Fang La. The next day the emperor's awards were drawn from the treasury and distributed, and Jin Dajian and Huangfu Duan were sent off to serve the imperial court.
Song Jiang instructed the armada to leave first, directing the naval chieftains to put the craft in ship-shape condition. They were to sail towards the Yangzi. The cavalry chieftains were told to ready their weapons and armor. When the expedition started, land and water forces would proceed together.
Premier Cai Jing suddenly arrived at the camp. He demanded that Xiao Rang the Master Hand be given into his service. The following day District Commander Wang appeared and asked for Iron Throat Yue Ho. He said he'd heard that Yue Ho was a good singer and he needed such a person in his residency.
Song Jiang had no choice but to consent, and he saw the two of them off. He had now lost five brothers, and he felt very badly. He finished making plans with Lu Junyi and ordered the contingents to get ready to march.

The revolt of Fang La, south of the Yangzi, had commenced some time before. It developed gradually. No one had expected it to turn into such a large affair. Fang La had been a woodcutter in the hills of Shezhou Prefecture. One day, while washing his hands in a stream, he observed his reflection in the water. He seemed to be wearing a crown and a dragon robe. Fang La therefore announced he was destined to be a king, and started his rebellion.
He established a Precious Hall in the Pangyuan Cavern in Qingxi County, and built a Royal Garden and Palace. He set up smaller palaces in Muzhou and Shezhou, and designated civil and military ranks, created ministries, appointed premiers and generals, and a whole panoply of ministers. (When reconquered by the Song Dynasty Muzhou became Yanzhou, Shezhou became Huizhou. Today they are called Jiante and Wuyuan.)
Subsequently, Fang La took Runzhou, present-day Zhenjiang. By then he controlled a total of eight prefectures containing twenty-five counties. The eight prefectures were: Shezhou, Muzhou, Hangzhou, Suzhou, Changzhou, Huzhou, Xuanzhou and Runzhou. Jiaxing, Songjiang, Chongte and Haining at that time were counties, and were among the twenty-five under the eight prefectures. Fang La proclaimed himself king and appointed provincial, prefectural and departmental officials. This was no small organization. It was infinitely larger than some gang of bandits in the hills.
Fang La fulfilled a heavenly prophecy which read: Ten thousand plus a dot and the last winter month shall a monarch be. Across the Zheshui River, in Wuxing, proclaim aloud your sovereignty. A dot above the character for "ten thousand" converts it into "fang." The last winter month is known as "la." Thus "Fang La" the king. Of course his eight prefectures south of the Yangzi were much smaller in area than the kingdom of Liao.

Song Jiang, meanwhile, fixed a date for his march and bid farewell to the various ministers. Marshal Su and Commissioner Zhao saw the army off personally, and rewarded the troops. The naval chieftains had already sailed their boats from the Sishui River into the Huai, and were moving in the direction of the Huai'an Dyke. They would ultimately assemble at Yangzhou.
Taking a respectful leave of the marshal and the commissioner, Song Jiang and Lu Junyi set forth. The army was divided into five columns. Their destination was also Yangzhou. The march was without incident, and the vanguard unit reached Huai'an County and made camp. The Yangzhou prefectural officials provided a banquet for Song Jiang and quarters in the city when he arrived.
"Fang La has a powerful army. You mustn't underestimate him," they said. "Ahead is the Yangzi, which flows 9,300 li before emptying into the sea. That's the first dangerous barrier you have to cross. Then you come to Runzhou, which is held by Fang La's Minister of Military Affairs Lu Shinang and twenty-four commanders whose job it is to defend the banks. Unless you can take Runzhou, you'll have a hard time withstanding Fang La."
Song Jiang called Military Advisor Wu Yong into conference. How were they going to cross the Yangzi? Their campaign against the Liao Tartars had been on dry land. It required no contribution from the naval chieftains. But now a navy was indispensable.
"There are two islands in the river near Runzhou—Jinshan Hill and Jiaoshan Hill," said Wu Yong. "Send a few brothers there to spy out the approaches to the city and learn what kind of boats are needed to get across."
Summoning his naval chieftains, Song Jiang said: "Which of you brothers will find out about water approaches and think of a plan for getting our soldiers over?" 4 men stepped forward and proclaimed their willingness. And because these scouts went forth, corpses were piled as high as Beigu Mountain and the Yangzi River flowed red with blood. The sacked city of Runzhou was left an abode for naught but weeping ghosts and howling demons, and the Jinshan Monastery was turned upside down. A great army soared over Black Dragon Range, an armada swallowed White Goose Shore.

White Eel Zhang Shun swims to Temple Hill by night & Stages a Night Ambush at Jinshan Monastery; Song Jiang Cleverly succeeds in capturing Runzhou City

The mighty Yangzi has two large tributaries—the Hanyang River and the Xunyang River. It passes many places in its 9,300 li march from Sichuan to the sea. For this reason it is called the Long River of Ten Thousand Li. In the Wu and Chu areas there are two islands in the river. One was known as Jinshan Hill, the other Jiaoshan Hill. On Jinshan Hill a monastery wound up the slope into the heights, and so was called the Monastery Embracing a Hill. The monastery on Jiaoshan Hill was hidden in a declivity, and so was called the Hill-Embraced Monastery. The islands were precisely on the dividing line between the Chu and Wu areas. On the north bank was Yangzhou, on the south bank was Runzhou—today called Zhenjiang. At Runzhou, Fang La's Minister of Military Affairs, Lu Shinang, defended the river banks. Lu was a rich man from Shezhou who obtained his position as a reward for contributing money and grain to Fang La. When he was young he studied books on military strategy. He used a snake lance eighteen feet long with outstanding skill. Under him were twelve commandants, better known as "The Twelve Gods South of the Yangzi." They cooperated in defending the shore in each of the twelve prefectures. Lu was general of a total of fifty thousand southern soldiers. They held the banks. More than 3000 warcraft rode the waves near Dew Pavilion. It was clear water between there and Guazhou, the ferry point on the opposite north shore.

Meanwhile, Song Jiang's army had reached Huai'an, the last stage before assembling in Yangzhou. Song was conferring with Wu Yong in his tent.
"We're not far from the Yangzi, now," he said. "The enemy hold the southern shore. Who can I send as scouts to find a way of getting across?'
Four chieftains promptly volunteered. Who were they? Chai Jin the Small Whirlwind, Zhang Shun the White Streak in the Waves, Shi Xiu the Rash, and the Devil Incarnate Ruan the Seventh.
"Form two teams—Zhang Shun with Chai Jin, Ruan the Seventh with Shi Xiu," Song Jiang directed. "Go to the islands of Jinshan Hill and Jiaoshan Hill. Find out the strength of the foe in Runzhou and report back to me in Yangzhou."
The four took their leave of Song Jiang, divided into two teams, and proceeded first to Yangzhou, disguised as travellers. They met no one along the road. The local populace, hearing that an expeditionary army against Fang La was on its way, moved and hid themselves in outlying villages. The four split up after reaching Yangzhou. Each took along some dry rations. Shi Xiu and Ruan the Seventh set out for Jiaoshan Hill with two servants.
Chai Jin and Zhang Shun, armed with sharp daggers and halberds, also with two servants, all carrying dry rations, hurried to Guazhou. It was early spring. The sun was warm and the air fragrant with flowers when they arrived at the banks of the Yangzi. From a height, they observed the tumbling misty waves. A magnificent river scene!
On the other side they could see a long stretch of green and white flags at the foot of Beigu Mountain, and a line of many craft flanking the shore. On the north bank where the four stood there wasn't even a wooden spar.
"All the houses on the road to Guazhou were empty," said Chai Jin, "and here at the river there are no boats. How can we learn what's happening over there?"
"Let's find a house to rest in," Zhang Shun suggested. "I'll swim to Jinshan Island and see what I can find out."
Chai Jin agreed, and the four walked along the shore until they came to a thatched shack. The door was locked from the inside. They couldn't push it open. Zhang Shun knocked a hole in the side wall and crawled in. A white-haired old woman rose from beside the stove. "Why didn't you open your door, old mother?"
"We've heard that the emperor is sending an army to fight Fang La, and we're right on the road to the river. A lot of people have moved away and gone into hiding. They've left me to take care of the house."
"Where's your son?"
"He went to the village to look after his wife and children."
"There are four of us, and we want to cross the river. Is there a boat around?"
"Where could anyone find a boat? Lu Shinang, when he heard the army is coming, took all the boats to Runzhou."
"We have our own rations. If you let us live here a day or two, We'll give you some silver as rent. We won't disturb you."
"You can stay. That's no problem. But I don't have any beds."
"We'll manage."
"I'm only afraid that big army will come here pretty soon."
"We'll be able to hide."
Zhang Shun opened the door and Chai Jin and the two servants entered. They rested their halberds, put down their luggage, brought out their dry rations and wheat-cakes, and ate.
Zhang Shun again went down to the river and looked. He saw Jinshan Monastery on an island precisely in the middle of the Yangzi. "Minister of Military Affairs Lu must go to that hill frequently," he said to himself. "I'll slip over tonight and pick up some news."
He returned and told Chai Jin what was on his mind. "There isn't even a small boat around here. How can we find out what's doing on the other side of the river?" he said. "Tonight I'm going to make a bundle of my clothes, wrap in two ingots of silver, put the whole thing on my head, and wade over to Jinshan Monastery. I'll bribe some monks, get the news, and come back and tell Big Brother. You wait here."
"Go and return quickly," said Chai Jin.
It was a starry evening, with a gentle breeze. The waves were calm, the water and the sky were the same color. Zhang Shun tied his clothes and two silver ingots in a bundle which he bound to his head, tied a sharp dagger at his waist, and entered the river at Guazhou. The water only came up to his chest. It was virtually like walking on dry land.
As he neared the foot of Jinshan Hill, he spotted a small craft moored beside the rocky slope. He crept over to it, removed the bundle from his head, stripped off his soaking garments, rubbed himself dry, changed into the clean clothes, and sat down in the boat. He could hear a watchman's drum in Runzhou striking the third watch.
Concealing himself, he looked around. A small vessel was sculling, downstream in his direction. "Those fellows are up to no good, zigzagging like that," he mused.
He decided to shove off. It was then he discovered that his boat had only a mooring rope, but no oars or poles. Once again he removed his clothes. Pulling out his dagger, he waded towards the approaching craft.
The two men plying the sweep oar were watching the north shore, and didn't see Zhang Shun closing in from the south. He suddenly popped up at the side, grasped the gunwale and slashed with his dagger. The men dropped the oar and toppled into the river. Zhang Shun sprang onto the craft. Two more men emerged from the cabin. Again Zhang Shun stabbed. One collapsed into water, the other, terrified, fell backwards into the cabin.
"Who are you? Whose boat is this?" Zhang Shun shouted. "Tell the truth and I'll spare you!"
"Hear me, good sir. I'm the steward of the Chen Guan family in Dingpu Village outside of Yangzhou City. I've just delivered a gift of grain to Minister Lu in Runzhou. He's accepted it and sent me back with one of his captains to demand fifty thousand bushels of white rice and three hundred boats. That will be my master's entrance fee into Lu's forces."
"What's the captain's name? Where is he?"
"His name is Ye Gui. He's the man you just cut down."
"What's your name? When did you bring the surrender offer to Lu? What's in this boat?"
"I'm called Wu Cheng, sir. We crossed over on the seventh of this month. On Minister Lu's instructions, I went to Suzhou to see the king's younger brother Fang Mao, the Third Great Prince, and drew three hundred unit banners and my master's official appointment document. He's been made prefect of Yangzhou and a Lord of Central Clarity. I have also a thousand uniforms and a letter from Minister Lu."
"How many soldiers does your master command?"
"Several thousand infantry and a hundred or so cavalry. His two sons, Chen Yi and Chen Tai, are both formidable warriors."
Having obtained the information he wanted, Zhang Shun with one stab of his dagger thrust Wu Cheng into the river. Then he took over the sweep oar and rowed back to Guazhou.
Chai Jin hurried out at the sound of the oar and saw Zhang Shun arriving in a boat. Zhang Shun related what had happened in detail. Chai Jin was very pleased. They took from the cabin the document and letter, three hundred unit designation banners of red silk, and a thousand army uniforms of various color. They formed two large loads.
"I'll get my clothes," said Zhang Shun. He rowed back to Jinshan Island, retrieved his clothing, his head kerchief, and the silver ingots. By the time he returned to the Guazhou banks it was almost dawn. A heavy mist blanketed the ground. At the shack they paid the old lady two or three ounces of silver, shouldered the loads, and went back to Yangzhou.
Song Jiang's forces were camped outside the city. The prefectural officials gave a banquet in his honor and invited him to move into the hostel for visiting dignitaries. They wined and dined him several days in a row, and fed his soldiers.
When the feasting was over, Chai Jin and Zhang Shun called on Song Jiang in the hostel. They said: "Chen Guan has tied in with Fang La. He's about to sneak rebel troops across to attack Yangzhou. Luckily, I intercepted Chen's steward in midriver. This is your chance, brother, for a brilliant stroke."
Song Jiang was delighted. He called Wu Yong into conference and asked: "How shall we go about it? What would be our best plan?"
"Under the circumstances, taking Runzhou will be as easy as turning over your hand," said the military advisor. "Once we nab Chen Guan, it will be a sure thing." He spelled out his strategy.
"Excellent," said Song Jiang. He directed Yan Qing the Prodigy to disguise himself as Captain Ye, and Xie Zhen and Xie Bao to dress as two southern soldiers. He gave them specific instructions. The three left the city for the village of Dingpu, the Xie brothers carrying the loads.
Forty li or more from Yangzhou, they neared Chen Guan's manor. Twenty or thirty vassals, in ordinary garb, were lined up neatly at the gate. Yan Qing hailed them, assuming a local accent.
"Is the master at home?"
"Where are you from, traveller?"
"Runzhou. Took a wrong turn after crossing the river. We wandered around for hours before reaching here."

The vassals ushered the visitors into the guest-house and told them to rest their loads. Then they led Yan Qing to Chen Guan in the rear of the manse. Yan Qing bowed.
"Ye Gui presents his respects."
"Where are you from, sir?"
"If you'll ask the others to withdraw, I'll venture to tell you."
"These are all trusted associates. You can speak freely."
"My name is Ye Gui. I am a captain under the command of Minister Lu. On the seventh day of the first month he received Wu Cheng with your secret message. He was very pleased. He directed me to escort Wu Cheng to Suzhou to convey Your Excellency's idea to the Third Great Prince, the king's younger brother. The prince petitioned His Majesty and obtained for you the position of prefect of Yangzhou. After you have met with the minister, he will determine ranks for your two sons. Wu Cheng has unfortunately been laid low by the flu. In order not to delay matters, the minister has dispatched me with your certificate of appointment, along with his letter, as well as your seal of office, tablet of authority, three hundred unit banners and a thousand uniforms. He would like Your Excellency's grain vessels to make delivery on the Runzhou river bank at the appointed time."
Yan Qing handed over the official appointment certificate. Chen Guan read it joyfully. He hastily lit incense and, facing south, voiced thanks for this benevolence. He summoned his two sons, Chen Yi and Chen Tai, and presented them to the "captain." Yan Qing instructed the Xie brothers to deliver the banners and uniforms to the rear manse. Chen Guan invited Yan Qing to be seated.
"I'm only a common soldier. How dare I sit in Your Excellency's presence?"
"You come as an emissary of His Majesty with documents of appointment for my humble self, sir. I would not be lacking in courtesy. Please be seated. It's quite proper."
After repeatedly protesting, Yan Qing finally sat down at a distance. Chen Guan called for wine and preferred him a cup. Yan Qing politely refused.
"I never drink," he said. He nevertheless downed two or three cups.
Then the two sons came forward to congratulate their father. With a significant glance, Yan Qing signalled to the Xie brothers. Xie Bao slipped a powerful drug into the wine pot when no one was looking. Yan Qing rose and spoke.
"I have brought no wine with me from across the river, but if I may use Your Excellency's brew, I would like to offer my congratulations."
He poured a goblet to the full and urged Chen to drain it. He also gave a cup each to the two sons and the various close cronies. When all had drunk, Yan Qing pursed his mouth and gestured with his head. Xie Zhen left the building, found a firebrand, took out a small cannon and signal flag concealed on his person, went outside the manor, and fired the cannon. At the sound, chieftains, who had been waiting in concealment to the left and right, came running.
Yan Qing, in the manse, watched man after man collapse. He whipped out his short sword, and he and Xie Bao cut off all the heads. Ten gallant fellows poured in, yelling, through the manor gate. The vassals were unable to stem their rush. Yan Qing and the Xie brothers strode out carrying the heads of Chen Guan and his sons.
By then another six chieftains had arrived, leading a thousand troops. They ringed the manor, rounded up Chen Guan's family, and killed them all. Then, with the vassals in tow, they marched down to the cove. Riding at anchor were three or four hundred craft, laden to the brim with rice. The vessels were counted and a report rushed to Song Jiang.
He conferred with Wu Yong. Then they packed, took their leave of Governor Zhang, and marched with the army to Chen Guan's manor. They selected troops to board the craft, meanwhile dispatching a man to urge the naval vessels to hurry over.
"We'll send three hundred fast boats, first," said Wu Yong, "each flying Fang La's banner. On deck, a thousand men will dress in the uniforms we got from him, and another three or four thousand will wear ordinary garb. An additional twenty thousand troops will be concealed in the cabins. Mu Hong will be disguised as Chen Yi, Li Jun as Chen Tai. They will each captain a large boat. Other chieftains will command the remaining craft."
Mu Hong and Li Jun headed the first fleet. Each was supported by ten chieftains. Zhang Heng and Zhang Shun led the second fleet. They were backed by four chieftains each. Ten chieftains captained the third fleet. That made a total of forty-two chieftains commanding the three hundred vessels.
These were to be followed by Song Jiang and the others in boats carrying the horses, a thousand warcraft like swimming dragons and speeding leviathans, all flying Song Jiang's banner and containing the whole force of infantry and cavalry and commanders. The admirals of this armada would be Ruan the Second and Ruan the Fifth.
Meanwhile, on Beigu Mountain in Runzhou, a lookout observed the three hundred craft setting sail from the cove. Fluttering from their masts was the red banner designating the grain convoy. This was immediately reported to the harbor master. Minister Lu, accompanied by twelve commandants, all in full armor, their bows strung, their swords unsheathed, rode down to the river bank. With them was a unit of crack troops.
A hundred boats were nearing the shore. On the first two vessels were two men who appeared to be leaders. They were surrounded by soldiers in uniforms with a lock designation, stalwart fellows every one.
Minister Lu dismounted and sat down in a silver armchair. The twelve commandants formed two lines along the bank. Mu Hong and Li Jun hailed Lu respectfully. Captains to the left and right shouted for the boats to halt. The hundred craft, in a straight line, dropped anchor.
Sailing with a favorable wind from the north, the next two hundred also arrived. They divided into a hundred to the right and a hundred to the left, so that each of the three groups was equi-distant from the others.
The shipping commissioner approached the near craft.
"Where are you from?"
"My name is Chen Yi," said Mu Hong, "and my brother is called Chen Tai. Our father, Chen Guan, has ordered us to deliver these fifty thousand bushels of white rice, three hundred vessels, and five thousand crack troops, in gratitude to Minister Lu for having petitioned the king on his behalf."
"Minister Lu dispatched a Captain Ye the other day. Where is he?"
"Captain Ye and Wu Cheng both have typhoid fever. They're bedridden and couldn't come. But we've brought our father's seal of office and his appointment document."
The shipping commissioner took them and walked up the bank to Minister Lu. "The sons of Chen Guan of Dingpu Village outside Yangzhou have brought grain and soldiers," he said. "And here is the seal of office and appointment certificate you sent him."
Lu examined them. It was indeed the original document. He ordered that the two sons be allowed ashore. The shipping commissioner shouted for Chen Yi and Chen Tai to be brought before the minister.
Mu Hong and Li Jun mounted the bank, followed by twenty chieftains. "The minister is here," yelled the guards. "Persons with no business, stay away!" The twenty chieftains halted. Mu Hong and Li Jun, each with hands clasped and bodies inclined deferentially, also waited at a distance. After a lengthy pause, the shipping commissioner again conducted the two forward. They knelt before the minister.
"Why hasn't your father Chen Guan come in person?" Lu demanded.
"Our father has heard that Song Jiang of Liangshan Marsh is approaching with a large army," replied Mu Hong. "He's afraid the bandits will disturb the countryside. He's staying at home to deal with them."
"Which of you is the elder?"
"I, Chen Yi, am," said Mu Hong.
"Have you two brothers learned the martial arts?"
"Basking in Your Excellency's propitious emanations, we have had some training."
"This rice you're bringing, how is it stored?"
"Three hundred bushels per large vessel, one hundred bushels per small."
"No doubt there's more to your mission than delivering grain!"
"Father and sons, we're completely loyal. We'd never venture to do anything untoward!"
"Your personal intentions may be all right, but there's something fishy about those troops on your craft. I can't help being suspicious. You two stay here. I'm going to send four commandants with a hundred soldiers to search your boats. It'll go hard with you if we find anything wrong!"
"We came hoping that you would make important use of our services. How can you doubt us!"
Before Lu could issue his order, a mounted scout trotted up and reported. "An order from the king has arrived at the South Gate. Your Excellency is requested to go at once to receive it."
The minister hurriedly mounted. "Hold this bank. Don't let anyone ashore," he instructed his officers. "Chen Yi and Chen Tai are to come with me."
Mu Hong shot Li Jun a significant glance. Lu rode on ahead. Calling their escort of twenty, they followed him into the city. But the guards at the gate barked a command.
"Minister Lu said that only these two are allowed in, no one else!"
Mu Hong and Li Jun were permitted to pass. The twenty chieftains had to wait. Minister Lu proceeded across the city to the South Gate, where he met the royal emissary.
"What's so urgent?" Lu asked.
The messenger was Fang La's royal usher, Feng Xi. He replied in an undertone: "Eunuch Pu Wenying the court astrologer has recently reported that, according to the night sky, many star spirits have entered this Wu area. He says half of them emit no light, a sure sign of serious trouble. The king has handed down this order, instructing you, Minister, to guard the bank well. Any persons coming from the north must be closely questioned. Kill them immediately if they arouse even a shadow of suspicion! They must not be allowed to remain!"
Lu was shocked. "A party of men has just come that I'm very doubtful about, and now this order. Please come into the city and read it to me."
Feng Xi went with Lu to the provincial office, and there the emissary read the directive aloud. Just then, a messenger galloped up with a report.
"An order from the Third Great Prince in Suzhou. He says: 'Your news about the surrender of Chen Guan of Yangzhou is incredible. It's probably invented. At the same time there has been the announcement by the royal astrologer regarding the entry of star spirits into this Wu area. You must hold the river bank firmly. I am sending a man to supervise."
"So the Great Prince is also concerned," said the minister. "I've ready received a royal edict."
He ordered his forces to closely guard the river front. No one was to be allowed to disembark. Lu then feasted the two emissaries.
Meanwhile, time was dragging for the men on the three hundred boats, and nothing was stirring. First Zhang Heng, Zhang Shun and the eight chieftains came ashore from the hundred craft on the left, carrying their arms; then another hundred, weapons in hand, from the hundred vessels on the right. The southern soldiers guarding the bank were unable to stop them.
Li Kui the Black Whirlwind and the Xie brothers headed for the city. Officers at the gate hurriedly blocked their path. With a hack and a chop, Li Kui promptly cut two of them down. Yells were heard as Xie Zhen and Xie Bao, each wielding a steel pitchfork, charged into Runzhou. With all this happening at the same time, it was impossible for the guards to close the gate.
As Li Kui bored into the passage, killing everyone he met, the twenty chieftains who had been denied entrance earlier now rushed in and seized the guards' weapons.
The twelve commandants had just received Minister Lu's order to hold the river front when the noise of the fighting at the city gate erupted. Hurriedly, they mustered their forces. But by then Shi Jin and Chai Jin had directed their troops on the decks of the three hundred craft to divest themselves of their southern uniforms and had led them ashore. They were followed by the soldiers who came swarming out of their concealment in the cabins.
Commandants Shen Gang and Pan Wende hastened with two columns to defend the city gate. Shen Gang was cut down from his horse by a single thrust from Shi Jin. Zhang Heng's spear ran Pan through the side. A wild melee followed, during which the remaining ten commandants fled into Runzhou to protect their families.
When Mu Hong and Li Jun heard the news, they took firebrands from a tavern and began setting blazes. Minister Lu sprang into the saddle. Three of the commandants had come to his support. By then the city was burning as if the sky had fallen.
Guazhou, seeing the conflagration, rushed a relief force. Battles raged at all four of the city gates, but on Runzhou's walls the banners of Song Jiang were already flying. The slaughter and confusion on every side were beyond description.
Another hundred and fifty warcraft arrived from the north shore and unloaded two thousand cavalrymen and their mounts, led by ten chieftains in full armor. They charged into the city. Minister Lu was badly defeated. With his broken army he fled to Dantu County.
The expeditionary forces occupied Runzhou. They extinguished the fires and took command of the four gates. At the shore they welcomed Song Jiang's boat, and watched the other vessels, like swimming dragons and speeding leviathans, arriving on favorable winds at the south bank.
Chieftains of high rank and low led Song Jiang into the city. First, he posted notices reassuring the local populace. Then he mustered his military officers and assembled them at central headquarters, where they claimed their awards.
Shi Jin presented the head of Shen Gang, Zhang Heng the head of Pan Wente, Liu Tang the head of Shen Ze. Kong Ming and Kong Liang came forward with their captive Zhuo Wanli, Xiang Chong and Li Jun with their prisoner Ho Tong. Hao Siwen had killed Xu Tong with an arrow from his bow.
The attackers had taken Runzhou, killed four commandants, and captured two others. They had slaughtered southern aides, officers and soldiers without number.
Song Jiang's army had lost three chieftains, either killed by arrows or trampled to death by horses in the confusion of battle. They were Guardian of the Clouds Song Wan, Jiao Ting the Merciless, and Tao Zongwang the Nine-Tailed Tortoise. Song Jiang was very distressed.
"Life and death come to every man," said Wu Yong. "Although we've lost three of our brothers, we've taken our first prefecture south of the Yangzi and removed a dangerous obstacle. Why upset yourself and injure your health? If we're to serve our country well, we'd better discuss national affairs."
"The hundred and eight of us are inscribed on the stone tablet, we correspond to stars in the sky. First in Liangshan Marsh, and then on Mount Wutai, we vowed to live and die together. Who would have thought that after we returned to the capital Gongsun Sheng would leave us, the emperor would retain Jin Dajian and Huangfu Duan, Premier Cai would take Xiao Rang, and District Commander Wang would demand Yue Ho! And now, when we've just crossed the Yangzi, we've lost three more brothers! Song Wan wasn't very accomplished, but I remember what a great help he was when we first established ourselves on Mount Liangshan. And today he's gone to the Nether World!"
Song Jiang ordered the soldiers to set up a sacrificial altar on the spot where Song Wan died, and to lay out paper silver ingots, a black pig and a white sheep. He personally dedicated the sacrificial wine. Zhuo Wanli and Ho Tong, the commandants who had been taken prisoner, were decapitated, and the blood from their severed heads sprinkled to propitiate the spirits of the three departed heroes.
After revising the prefectural government and the local administrations, Song Jiang issued awards and wrote a report of his victory to Governor Zhang, inviting him to come and inspect. Corpses on the streets were collected, removed from the city, and burned. The bodies of the three slain chieftains were buried outside of Runzhou's East Gate.
Minister Lu had lost half his effectives. He retreated to the county town of Dantu with his six remaining commandants, and dared not venture out again. In a written dispatch to Suzhou, he begged the Third Great Prince to rescue him. Suzhou sent an army under General Xing Zheng. Lu welcomed him gratefully. In county headquarters, Lu told how, in the guise of Chen Guan's surrendering troops, Song Jiang's forces had been able to sneak across the Yangzi.
"But now that you are here, General," Lu concluded, "we shall regain control of Runzhou City."
Xing Zheng replied: "When the Third Great Prince's informed that certain stars were invading this region, he decided to dispatch me with an army to patrol the river front. We didn't expect that you'd have already been put at a disadvantage. But with your assistance, Minister, I'll avenge you." The next day, Xing Zheng marched forth with his army to recapture Runzhou. In Runzhou, meanwhile, after consulting with Wu Yong, Song Jiang sent Tong Wei and Tong Meng with a hundred or more men to Jiaoshan Hill to look for Shi Xiu and Ruan the Seventh. He also dispatched a contingent to take Dantu. Five thousand strong, it was commanded by ten chieftains. On the way, they encountered Xing Zheng's army. An exchange of arrows caused both forces to halt out of each other's bow range and set up positions. Battle drums thundered, multi-colored embroidered banners fluttered in the breeze. Xing Zheng rode forward with levelled lance, flanked on either side by the six commandants. From the Song army midst, Guan Sheng, brandishing his crescent halberd embossed with a dragon design, cantered out to meet the foe. The two contenders clashed in a murderous rage, their mounts stirring up clouds of dust. After fourteen or fifteen rounds, one of the men fell from his horse. Truly, the boldness of heroes is no match for a general's clever plan. Relying on the capture of officers and men, they sought to retake the first prefecture south of the Yangzi.

The 3100 mile long River Yangtze consists in fact of three rivers, the Hanyang River, the Xunyang River and the Yangtze River. From Sichuan to the sea it passes through many places. This is why it is known as the Great River. In the region of Wu and Chu two mountains divert the river's course. One is called Golden Island and the other Burnt Island. On Golden Island there is a temple. It covers the slopes of the mountain, and the place is known as Temple Hill. On Burnt Island there is a temple which is sheltered in a fold of the hill which hides its outline, so it is called the Hill Temple. The two mountains situated in the middle of the river lie exactly on the demarcation line between Wu and Chu. On one side is Yangzhou, east of the Huai, and on the other Runzhou in Zhejiang, today called Zhenjiang.
Now in Runzhou it is Fang La's right-hand man, Marshal Lü Shinang who defends the river bank. Originally a rich man of Shezhou, he contributed to Fang La's finances and was made chief of staff in consequence. His weapon is a long serpent lance and his military prowess is exceptional. He has twelve officers under his command who are known as the Southern Twelve. All are employed in the defence of the river bank in Runzhou. Under Marshal Lü's command is an army of fifty thousand soldiers from the south, spread out along the bank. Three thousand war vessels are moored under the Pavilion of Sweet Dew. On the north bank is Guazhou Crossing, and at this point the river bank is wide open, totally without cover.
Song Jiang's forces, complete with horses and boats, have proceeded by land and water as far as Huai'an, on their way to the assembly point at Yangzhou. Song Jiang is in his command tent, discussing the situation with the Professor: "We're not far from the Yangtze, here. The south bank is held by the rebels. Who is prepared to go on a spying mission for me, to find out what's going on across the river and see whether we can launch our attack?"
Four leaders volunteered. They were Mr. Chai the Little Whirlwind, White Eel, Madcap and Ruan the Seventh.
Song Jiang said: "Divide yourselves into two groups, White Eel go with Mr. Chai and Madcap with Ruan the Seventh. One lot get over to Golden Island and the other lot to Burnt Island. When you find anything out come back and tell us."
The four took their leave of Song Jiang, and each with a companion and dressed as merchants they took themselves off to Yangzhou. All along the way the people had heard that a big army was coming to suppress Fang La and had moved into the country to take refuge. The two groups separated in Yangzhou. Each man carried some provisions. Madcap and Ruan the Seventh and their companions set off for Burnt Island.
As for Mr. Chai, White Eel and companions, they arrived at Guazhou carrying their provisions and equipped with spears, sharp swords and halberds. It was early spring, the day warm and fragrant with blossom. On reaching the Yangtze they looked down from a vantage point and saw white horses on the stream and rolling misty waves. It was a fine sight! Looking across towards North Peak they saw a mass of green and white banners and an armada of war vessels lined up along the shore. On the northern bank, where they were, there was not a single tree.
Mr. Chai said: "We've seen houses along the way here but no people. There is no ferry to cross the river. How are we ever going to find out what is going on on the other side?"
White Eel said: "You find a house to rest in while I swim across to Golden Island and make inquiries."
"That sounds a good idea," said Mr. Chai.
When they reached the river bank, they found a row of huts, all with locked doors which they could not get to open. White Eel went round the side and climbed a low wall and slipped inside the area. A white-haired old woman popped out from behind a stove.

"Why did no one open the door?" he asked her.
"Well sir, since you ask," she said. "We heard tell as how the court be sending a big army to fight Fang La. We're right in the path of the storm here and they're all gone off to hide. They left me to look after the house, 'cos I'm just an old body."
"Where have all the men gone?" White Eel asked.
"Gone to hide in the country, all on 'em," she said.
"There's four of us and we want to cross the river," White Eel said. "Where can we find a boat?"
"You won't find no boats here. When Marshal Lü heard the army were coming to attack he requisitioned all the boats and took them over the river to Runzhou."
"We've got our own food," White Eel said. "We only ask you to give us shelter here for a couple of days. We'll pay you rent and we won't disturb you."
"You can stay here, no problem with that, but there aren't no beds."
"We'll make our own arrangements."
"But listen here, sir, I'm afeared the army be coming!"
"We can cope with that!" White Eel opened the door and let in the others. They leant their halberds against the wall and put down their packs, took out some dry food and pancakes and ate them. White Eel went back to the river bank. He could see Temple Hill in the middle of the stream:
The river arches like a turtle's back, the mountains stand tall as a dragon's crest. Twists of blue are glimpsed through floating wreaths of silver; white funeral scrolls unroll across volumes of liquid jade. Far off the golden halls, exposed to all the winds that blow; in the distance the bell loft rising on its many-storeyed stone base. The pagoda soars upward into the blue empyrean; the sermon hall ripples with the reflected light of green waves. The galleries open to a view of roving sails; the recreational hall is brisk all day with the sound of water. Over Temple Hill at night the will-o'-the-wisps play.
After observing it for a while he said to himself: "Marshal Lü most probably goes there often. If I swim over to it tonight I'm bound to find something out."
He went back and conferred with Mr. Chai. "We're here now, and there isn't a single boat. It's difficult to know what's going on on the other side. Tonight I'll swim across to Temple Hill with my clothes and two big pieces of silver in a bundle on my head. I'll bribe the monks and find out how things stand. Then we'll go back and tell the Leader. You wait here for me."
"Don't be too long about it," Mr. Chai said.
It was a fairly bright night. The wind was soft and the river calm, water and sky were indistinguishable. White Eel stripped and tied his clothes in a bundle. He knotted a white silk sash about his waist and packed two silver ingots in a head band which he wrapped round his head and stuck a cutlass in his sash. He entered the water at Guazhou Crossing and headed out into the middle. The water only came up to his chest, so it was like walking on land. When he reached the island he found a small boat moored at the foot of a cliff. He crept up to it. He lowered the bundle of clothes from his head, took off his wet things, dried himself and put on dry clothes, and sat down in the boat. He heard the Runzhou drum beat for the third watch. As he looked out from his hiding-place he saw a boat approaching over the water. "That boat is moving very suspiciously," he thought to himself. "They must be spies!"
He was going to cast his boat off, but found it was moored with a thick rope and there were no oars. There was nothing for it but to strip off again, take his dagger and commit himself to the water and swim towards the other boat. The two men in the other boat were rowing hard, looking toward the northern shore, and clearly not expecting any danger from the south. White Eel surfaced and swam to the side of the boat. He pulled down on the gunwale and simultaneously made a broad sweep with his cutlass. The two rowers dropped their oars and dived into the river. White Eel immediately hauled himself on board. Two men emerged from the cabin. With one blow of his cutlass White Eel knocked one of them into the water while the other rushed back inside in terror. White Eel shouted: "Who are you? Where is this boat from? If you tell me the truth I'll spare you!"
"If you please, sir," the man replied, "I'm steward to the Chen household in Dingpu village near Yangzhou. They sent me across to Runzhou to make terms with Marshal Lü and offer him provisions and he sent one of his officers back with me. He is asking for fifty thousand catties of rice and three hundred boats as a pledge."
"What is the captain's name and where is he?" White Eel asked.
"He's called Ye Gui and he's the one you just pushed in the river."
"What's your name, when did you take the offer of surrender across and what else have you got in this boat?"
"I'm Wu Cheng, I crossed on the seventh of January. Marshal Lü sent me to Suzhou to see the King's third brother, Fang Mao, and pick up three hundred banners and a letter of appointment for my master, Colonel Chen, making him governor of Yangzhou. His Royal Highness also conferred his own insignia and a thousand uniforms together with a warrant addressed to Marshal Lü."
"Who is this master of yours? How many troops and horses has he?" White Eel asked.
"Around a thousand men and several hundred horses," the other replied. "And he's got two very brave sons by his own wife. Chen Yi is the elder and Chen Tai the second. The Colonel is called Chen Guan."
Having obtained all the information he wanted, White Eel killed the man with one blow of his cutlass and threw the body in the water. Then he began to row and didn't stop till he reached Guazhou Crossing.
Mr. Chai heard the sound of oars and hurried out to see. It was White Eel rowing a boat towards him. He asked what was going on and White Eel gave him an account which pleased him greatly. White Eel disappeared into the cabin and brought out a bundle of papers, three hundred red silk banners and a thousand multi-coloured uniforms, which he made into two piles for carrying. "I'm going back now to get more uniforms," he said. He rowed back to Golden Island and collected uniforms, headgear and some silver. By the time he got back to the Guazhou shore it was getting late and a heavy mist cloaked the earth. He made a hole in the bottom of the boat and pushed it out into the river to sink. When he reached the house he gave two or three taels of silver to the old woman and the two companions carried the rest of the stuff back to Yangzhou. At this time the army was encamped outside the city, and Song Jiang had been invited into the city where the officials had been feasting him all day.
Mr. Chai and White Eel waited until the party broke up and then spoke with Song Jiang in the rest house. They told him how Chen Guan and his sons had gone over to Fang La and planned sooner or later to help the army to cross the river and attack Yangzhou. They told him how a chance encounter on the river had served their turn. Song Jiang was delighted and asked the Professor to work out a plan of action.
"This is a great opportunity," the latter said. "Runzhou is at our mercy! We'll get Chen Guan first and the rest will follow. It just needs this and this...."
A little while later the Prodigy had disguised himself as Captain Ye, while Snake and Scorpion as instructed had dressed as southern soldiers. After inquiring the way to Dingpu, Snake and Scorpion picked up the carrying poles and the Prodigy having received detailed instructions they left Yangzhou and headed for Dingpu. A dozen miles or so from the city they found themselves at the gate of Chen Guan's estate, which was manned by a score or more of smartly dressed retainers, all in the same uniform.
The Prodigy greeted these retainers, putting on a southern accent: "Be your master at home, friends?"
"Where are you from, sir?" they replied.
"I come from Runzhou," the Prodigy answered. "I got lost after crossing the river. I was wandering about all day till they told me to come here."
The retainers invited them inside and told them they could put down their loads. The Prodigy was taken to the back to see Colonel Chen. He prostrated himself and said: "Ye Gui, at your service sir!"
"Where have you come from?" the Marshal asked.
The Prodigy replied in a southern accent as before: "I'd make bold to tell you, Your Excellency, if we might speak alone."
"These men are all in my confidence, you may speak freely before them."
"Well, then, my name is Ye Gui, sir, like I said, and I am on the staff of Marshal Lü. On the seventh of January we received the confidential letter delivered by Wu Cheng. The Marshal was pleased with it and told me to escort Wu Cheng to Suzhou to tell the Third Prince of Your Excellency's proposal. The Third Prince sent word of it to His Majesty, who announced that he was appointing you governor of Yangzhou and that your esteemed sons would also receive honours when they met Marshal Lü. Wu Cheng was about to return when he suddenly caught a chill and became too unwell to travel. Fearing the plan could be compromised, the Marshal sent me to give you the royal letter of appointment, together with his own instructions, the official stamp and badge of office, three hundred banners and a thousand uniforms. He wants you to deliver your supply boats to Runzhou by a certain date." With this he took out the official order and handed it to Colonel Chen.
Colonel Chen was overjoyed. He immediately had an altar set up for burning incense and prostrated himself in thanks toward the south. Next he sent for his two sons. The Prodigy told Snake and Scorpion to fetch the uniforms and banners and bring them to the hall. Colonel Chen asked the Prodigy to be seated. The latter objected: "I am just an ordinary soldier. How can I be seated in the presence of Your Excellency?"
"You are the envoy of the authorities over there," the Colonel replied. "You have brought me the royal mandate. How can I not honour you? Of course you must sit down."
After repeated refusals the Prodigy was persuaded to sit down, which he did at a polite distance. The Colonel ordered wine but when he offered it to the Prodigy, the latter refused, saying: "I am a teetotaller." After two or three rounds, the Colonel's sons arrived to join the celebration. The Prodigy gave Snake and Scorpion a significant look to indicate that it was time to get going. Scorpion took out the drug provided by Doctor An and unseen by the enemy leaders dropped it in the wine jug. The Prodigy rose to his feet and said: "Although I have brought no wine of my own, allow me to participate in offering you congratulations." He filled a beaker with wine and offered it to the Colonel, inviting him to drink it off. Next he offered wine to the two sons, who also drained their cups. There were also some trusted retainers present, and each of them was served a cup of wine by the Prodigy.
At a sign from the Prodigy, Snake went outside, got his tinderbox and took out the signal rockets he was carrying. He let them off in front of the manor. The comrades lying in wait on either side heard the reports and came out to join them. The Prodigy waited till he saw they were coming and then drew his sword. He and Scorpion set to work on the drugged enemy. Soon they had cut them all down. The comrades were now kicking up a row outside the manor and burst in through the main gate. These ten were our friends Monk, Pilgrim, Tattooed Dragon, Morbid, Iron Ox, Eight-Armed Ogre, Winged Ghost, Pluto, Panther and Pill Monger.
What hope had the retainers on the gate of keeping them out? Inside the Prodigy, Snake and Scorpion had seized the heads of the Chens, the father and two sons. Outside more troops were arriving, led by Whiskers and five others. They surrounded the compound with a thousand troops and whole of Colonel Chen's family was slaughtered. Some captured retainers took them to the river bank where they found three or four hundred boats tied up in the harbour and near the estate, loaded up with food supplies. A list was made and a report sent at once to Song Jiang.
On hearing that Colonel Chen had been killed, Song Jiang and the Professor decided to launch their attack. Everything was packed up. They bade farewell to Commissioner Zhang and headed for the Chen estate. The leading commanders were assigned to boats while messengers were sent to urge their own water-borne force to get a move on. The Professor said: "We must select three hundred fast boats and equip each with Fang La's banners. The first thousand troops will dress in their uniforms, the remainder will have to wear whatever is to hand."
Over two thousand troops were hidden in the three hundred transports. The Unstoppable pretending to be the elder Chen and White-Water Dragon as the second brother, were each to go in a big boat. The first squadron was led by Unstoppable and White-Water Dragon and with Unstoppable there were these ten leaders:
Eight-Armed Ogre, Winged Ghost, Pluto, Pill Monger, Panther, Skyscraper, Door-God, Forester, Rhinoceros, the Guv
With White-Water Dragon went these ten leaders:
Cave Dragon, River Rider, Comet, Red Star, Whitey, Executioner, Green-Eyes, the Young Master, the Daytime Rat, Nine-Tailed Turtle
The second squadron was commanded by the Pilot and White Eel. With the Pilot went these four leaders:
Knife, Uglymug, Stripes, Scarface
With White Eel were these four:
Flagpole, Ape, Spots, Nameless
With the third squadron went ten leaders divided between two boats:
Tattooed Dragon, Sergeant Lei, Morbid, Red-Haired Devil, Blossom, Hotshot, Iron Ox, Snake, Scorpion, Mr. Chai
Three hundred vessels, carrying a total of forty-two commanders, made the first crossing. Meanwhile Song Jiang and the others were taking the horses aboard war boats. A thousand boats including fast attack boats and others, all flying Song Jiang's flag and carrying a quantity of infantry and cavalry were prepared for the crossing. Two of the boat commanders, Ruan the Second and Ruan the Fifth were in charge of this operation.
We shall not go with Song Jiang's army to cross the river, but join the southern lookouts on North Peak at Runzhou when they spot the first three hundred boats setting out from the opposite shore. Each boat is flying the red flag signifying transports for clothing and supplies for the advance guard.
The southern soldiers hurriedly reported this to the authorities. Marshal Lü summoned his twelve officers. They put on their armour, strung their bows, unsheathed their swords and went down to the river bank to see what was going on. They saw a line of a hundred boats in front approaching the bank. On the boats the two leaders were surrounded by a throng all wearing golden chain mail. All fine upstanding men. Marshal Lü dismounted and seated himself on a silver throne, while his twelve commanders lined up in two ranks along the river bank. When Mu the Unstoppable and the White-Water Dragon saw Marshal Lü sitting there on the bank they came to attention and saluted. One of the Marshal's aides shouted an order for the boats to heave to and the first hundred dropped anchor in a straight line. The two hundred behind them also came on, propelled by the wind, splitting into two groups, a hundred to one side, a hundred to the other, so they were stationed in three equal squadrons. A southern liaison officer went down to the boats and asked: "Where are you from?"
"My name is Chen Yi," the Unstoppable replied. "This is my brother Chen Tai. My father is Colonel Chen, Governor of Yang-zhou, and he commands us to bring you fifty thousand catties of rice, three hundred boats and five thousand picked troops in return for the Marshal's favour."
The southern officer said: "The other day His Excellency sent Ye Gui to you. Where is he?"
"The Colonel and Wu Chang have both got flu and are being treated at the manor. They couldn't come," said the Unstoppable. "Allow me to give you this letter with the official stamp."
The major-domo took it and went to the river bank and reported to the Marshal: "The two sons of Governor Chen have brought supplies of rice for the troops. They have a letter."
The Marshal looked and saw it was the genuine article, so he ordered the two men to be brought ashore. The major-domo summoned them. As the Unstoppable and the White-Water Dragon went ashore, the other twenty followed. A corporal shouted out: "A minister of the Crown is present. Other persons may not approach." The others halted, while Unstoppable and White-Water Dragon stood some way off, inclining respectfully with crossed arms. After a suitable pause, the southern officer led them forward to make their obeisance, kneeling before the Marshal, who said: "Why hasn't your father come himself?"
"He has had intelligence that Song Jiang and his troops from Mount Liang are on the way," said the Unstoppable. "He fears there may be trouble in the district, so he is waiting at home. He does not dare absent himself."
"Which of you is the elder?" the Marshal asked.
"I am," said the Unstoppable.
"Has either of you had any military training?"
"If it please Your Excellency, we have had quite a bit," said the Unstoppable.
"This rice you are bringing, how is it disposed?"
"The bigger boats are carrying three hundred catties, the smaller ones a hundred."
"I suspect you may have some hidden purpose," the Marshal said.
"Our family are honest and trustworthy. How could we harbour any ill intent?"
"That's as may be, but all those soldiers on your boats look remarkably tough specimens. How can I not be suspicious? You two wait here, while I send four of my officers with a hundred troops to search the boats. If there's the slightest irregularity, you'll be for it!"
"We came here to serve you. Why should we not be trusted?"
Just at that moment, as the Marshal was giving the order for the search party to be sent, a scout reported that a royal messenger had arrived at the southern gate and wanted the Marshal to go and receive him at once. The Marshal quickly mounted and gave the order: "Guard the river bank for me and keep those two here till I return." The Unstoppable exchanged looks with the White-Water Dragon as the Marshal rode off. Then they summoned the others and started to enter the city gate. The guards on the gate shouted: "The Marshal only said those two were to enter. The rest are not allowed in!"
So the Unstoppable and the White-Water Dragon proceeded on in while the others waited at the gate.
When Marshal Lü received the envoy at the south gate he asked: "What is it that's so urgent?"
In hushed tones the envoy, who was one of Fang La's palace aides, told the Marshal: "According to the astronomer royal recent observations of the night sky have revealed numerous stars crossing into the territory of Wu, among them several which lack lustre, meaning that serious disasters impend. His Majesty has published a decree, ordering Marshal Lü to defend the river bank. If any strangers appear from the north they must be thoroughly investigated. If there is anything at all suspicious about them, let them be executed forthwith."
Marshal Lü had a shock. "I was just thinking that this lot look suspicious. Now I have confirmation. But please come into the city to read out the decree."
The envoy accompanied him to the government office and was just about to read out the edict when another messenger rushed in: "There's a messenger from Suzhou with an order from the Third Prince. He says: 'This offer of surrender from the Chens of Yangzhou is not to be trusted. We fear a trap. His Majesty has just informed us that the astronomer royal has observed baleful stars in the territory of Wu. The river bank must be fortified. I will be sending someone to inspect the work'"
Marshal Lü said: "This is just what the Prince is worried about. I must report it to him." He ordered them to lock up the commanders from the boats on the river and not let any of them return to the river bank. He also ordered a banquet to entertain the two envoys.
Meanwhile the men on the three hundred boats found that a long time had passed without any sign of activity, so the Pilot and White Eel with eight subordinates, all armed, disembarked from the boats on the left, as did the ten commanders from the boats on the right, spears and swords at the ready. The southern troops guarding the bank were powerless to stop them. Iron Ox, Snake and Scorpion sped on towards the city. The guards on the gate hurriedly barred their way. Iron Ox whirled his axes and with a cut and a thrust dispatched two of them. There was tumult in the city as Snake and Scorpion forced their way in brandishing their pitchforks. Under these simultaneous attacks the guards had no hope of closing the gate. Iron Ox continued to wreak havoc. The twenty Song leaders already there grabbed their weapons and joined the fray. By the time Marshal Lü's urgent order to fortify the river bank arrived, they had already entered the city. By the time the twelve rebel commanders heard the commotion and found their arms and horses, the Tattooed Dragon and Mr. Chai had already instructed the three hundred troops on the boats to remove their southern uniforms and disembark first, while the troops who had been hidden on the boats soon joined them.
The first two southern commanders arrived with reinforcements at the gate and were knocked off their horses and killed by the Tattooed Dragon and the Pilot. As the rest of the Song forces attacked, the other ten southern commanders fled into the city to protect their families. The Unstoppable and Iron Ox, already in the city, heard what was happening. They got a light from an inn and started setting fire to the place.
Marshal Lü hurriedly mounted and enlisted three commanders to help but by now the town was ablaze, the fire having arisen as if from nowhere. The Song forces over in Guazhou observed the signal and prepared reinforcements. After bitter fighting the four gates at last fell and Song Jiang's flag was hoisted on the walls. The carnage and confusion are difficult to describe ... but you shall see.
Another hundred and fifty boats were assembled near the north bank and the horses loaded aboard. Ten commanders all in full armour, led by Scimitar, were to go with them.

When this force, including a thousand subalterns and two thousand troops, poured into the city, Marshal Lü was routed. He fled with his wounded to Dantu and the Song army occupied Runzhou. The fires were put out and a guard established on the four gates and then the commanders went to the river bank to welcome Song Jiang, who arrived in a paddle boat that came flying over the water towards them, with the wind behind it. They escorted Song Jiang into the city. Notices had already been posted to reassure the people. The commanders paraded to report their successes. The Tattooed Dragon, the Pilot and the Red-Haired Devil each presented the head of an enemy commander, Red Star and Comet handed over a captured enemy commander, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost another, and Hound exhibited the body of the rebel leader he had shot with an arrow. Runzhou had been taken, four of their commanders killed, two more captured, and a host of their junior officers had died.

When Song Jiang's troops were counted, it was found that they had lost three leaders, killed by arrows or trampled by horses during the battle: Door-God, Nameless and Nine-Tailed Turtle. Song Jiang's heart was heavy at this news and nothing could console him. "A man's life and death are fixed by fate," said the Professor. "True, we have lost three of our brothers, but there is the satisfaction of having removed the principle obstacle to our campaign south of the river. Why go on upsetting yourself? If we still aim to make a worthy contribution to our country, we should be discussing affairs of state."

Song Jiang said: "The names of the one hundred and eight are engraven upon the stone tablet, each representing a star. At the foundation of the company on Mount Liang, and again on Mount Wutai, we made a vow: that we would live and die together. The rot set in after we returned to the capital, when Taoist Gongsun left. Then His Majesty retained the Craftsman and Redbeard and the Grand Preceptor wanted Magic Hand. Someone else requisi-tioned Lungs. Now here in Zhejiang we have lost three more of our brothers. I know the Door-God did not have any outstanding achievement to his name, but I cannot forget the part he played in the establishment of Mount Liang. And to think that now he is a shade wandering in the underworld!"

Song Jiang ordered a sacrificial altar to be set up on the spot where the Door-God died and paper money to be offered up, together with a black pig and a white lamb. He poured the libation with his own hands. The two captive commanders were executed there and their blood sprinkled as an offering to the souls of the three dead heroes. Song Jiang then went back to the government office and distributed rewards. He wrote out a report and sent someone with it to Marshal Zhang, inviting him to come and see things for himself. Of this no more.

The dead bodies were removed from the streets and taken out of the city to be burnt. The bones of the three slain warriors were buried outside the east gate.

Marshal Lü had lost the greater part of his force. With six of his commanders he had taken refuge in Dantu and had no intention of coming out to fight. He sent an urgent messenger to Suzhou asking the Third Prince for help. On receiving the message, Suzhou sent General Xing Zheng with reinforcements. Marshal Lü received the general, and after the usual polite inquiries about health, took him to the office and offered a full account of events: "By pretending to be Colonel Chen's surrendering troops, Song Jiang's forces managed to cross the river. Now you are here you must recapture Runzhou for us."

The general said: "The Third Prince had already heard that evil stars had entered Wu territory and sent me here with an army to guard the river. We did not know that you had suffered this reverse. Now, if I can have your support, we will work together to avenge it."

Next day the general led his army out to recapture Runzhou.

Meanwhile Song Jiang had conferred with the Professor in the Runzhou district office and decided to send the Tong brothers, Cave Dragon and River Rider, with a hundred men to search for Madcap and Ruan the Seventh, the two who had gone to Burnt Island, you remember. They also ordered troops out to attack Dantu. There were five thousand of these, under ten commanders headed by Scimitar. As they headed for Dantu they encountered General Xing Zheng's army. The battle commenced with an exchange of arrows as both forces manoeuvred into position. On the side of the southern troops General Xing rode out with levelled spear and six of his commanders in two groups. Scimitar responded by drawing his crescent blade and riding at the opposing general. After a dozen bouts or more, one of the two was knocked from his horse. It was a case of

After only fourteen or fifteen rounds, Guan Sheng swung his halberd and cut Xing Zheng from his saddle. Poor southern hero, his life vanished like a dream! At this, Huyan Zhuo urged his men into the fray. The six commandants fled southwards. Minister Lu abandoned Dantu and led his broken contingents in the direction of Changzhou County.

The ten chieftains occupied Dantu and notified Song Jiang of their victory. He moved a large force into the county and there made camp. After rewarding the troops, he rushed a dispatch to Military Governor Zhang reporting that he now was in control of Runzhou. The following day, staff officers Zong and Geng arrived in Dantu with rewards from the governor. Song Jiang distributed them among his commanders.

Conferring with Lu Junyi, Song Jiang said: "Xuanzhou and Huzhou prefectures are also being held by Fang La's brigands. Let's divide the army into two columns, and each of us lead one. We can draw lots to determine who goes where."

Song Jiang drew Changzhou and Suzhou, Lu drew Xuanzhou and Huzhou. Song directed Ironclad Virtue Pei Xuan to divide the officers and men. With the exception of Yang Zhi who was ill and remained in Dantu, the others were assigned to the different columns.

In Song Jiang's contingent there were thirteen senior commanders, who, apart from Song Jiang himself, were Wu Yong the Wizard, who served as the chief of staff; Li Ying the Heaven-Soaring Eagle; Guan Sheng the Big Halberd; Hua Rong the Lesser Li Guang; Qin Ming the Thunderbolt; Xu Ning the Metal Lancer; Zhu Tong the Beautiful Beard; Lu Zhishen the Tattooed Monk; Wu Song the Pilgrim; Shi Jin the Nine Dragons; Li Kui the Black Whirlwind; and Dai Zong the Marvelous Traveler. And there were twenty-nine lieutenant commanders, who are: Huang Xin the Suppressor of Three Mountains; Sun Li the Sickly General; Hao Siwen the Wild Dog; Xuan Zan the Ugly Son in Law; Han Tao the Ever-Victorious General; Peng Qi the Eyes of Heaven General; Fan Rui the Demon King Who Roils the World; Ma Lin the Elfin Flutist; Yan Shun the Elegant Tiger; Xiang Chong the Eight-Armed Nezha; Li Gun the Flying Divinity; Bao Xu the God of Death; Wang Ying the Stumpy Tiger; Hu Sanniang the Ten Feet of Steel; Yang Lin the Elegant Panther; Shi En the Golden-Eyed Tiger Cub; Du Xing the Demon Face; Kong Ming the Comet; Kong Liang the Flaming Star; Ling Zhen the Heaven-Shaking Thunder; Cai Fu the Iron Arm; Cai Qing the Single Blossom; Duan Jingzhu the Golden Dog; Hou Jian the Long-Armed Ape; Jiang Jing the Magic Calculator; An Daoquan the Skilled Doctor; Yu Baosi the Spirit of the Dangerous Road; Song Qing the Iron Fan and Pei Xuan the Ironclad Virtue.

These senior and lieutenant commanders led a force of thirty thousand crack troops.

In Lu Junyi's contingent there were fourteen senior commanders, who, in addition to Lu Junyi himself, were: Zhu Wu the Miraculous Strategist; Chai Jin the Small Whirlwind; Lin Chong the Panther Head, Dong Ping the General Two Spears; Huyan Zhuo the Two Rods; Suo Chao the Urgent Vanguard; Mu Hong the Unrestrained; Yang Xiong the Pallid; Lei Heng the Winged Tiger; Xie Zhen the Two-Headed Snake; Xie Bao the Twin-Tailed Scorpion; Zhang Qin the Featherless Arrow; Liu Tang the Red-Haired Demon and Yan Qing the Prodigy.

The thirty-three lieutenant commanders were: Shan Tinggui the Water General; Wei Dingguo the Fire General; Lu Fang the Little Duke; Guo Sheng the Second Rengui; Ou Peng the Golden-Winged Hawk; Deng Fei the Fiery-Eyed Lion; Li Zhong the Tiger-Fighting General; Zhou Tong the Little King; Chen Da the Gorge-Leaping Tiger; Yang Chun the White-Spotted Snake; Xue Yong the Sick Tiger; Du Qian the Skyscraper; Mu Chun the Slightly Restrained; Zou Yuan the Dragon from the Forest; Zou Run the One-Horned Dragon; LiLi the Hell's Summoner; Li Yun the Black-Eyed Tiger; Shi Yong the Stone General; Zhu Gui the Dry-Land Crocodile; Zhu Fu the Smiling Tiger; Sun Xin the Junior General; Gu Dasao the Tigress; Zhang Qing the Vegetable Gardener; Sun Erniang the Witch; Zheng Tianshou the Fair-Faced Gentleman; Tang Long the Gold-Coin Spotted Leopard; Cao Zheng the Demon Carver; Bai Sheng the Daylight Rat; Gong Wang the Flowery-Necked Tiger; Ding Desun the Arrow-Struck Tiger; Wang Dingliu the Lightning and Shi Qian the Flea on the Drum.

This column also contained thirty thousand crack troops. Still another group of chieftains captained the naval units.

Tong Wei and Tong Meng, who had been sent to Jiaoshan Hill to look for Shi Xiu and Ruan the Seventh, returned and said: "They killed a whole family at the river bank, seized a light craft and went over to the monastery on the island. When the abbot heard that they were bold fellows from Liangshan Marsh, he invited them to a vegetarian meal. Later, after learning what Zhang Shun had accomplished, they got a boat at the foot of the hill and captured Maogang. That's a good place for an assault on Jiangyin and Taicang on the sea coast. They've sent a written request for naval chieftains and warcraft."

Song Jiang directed Li Jun and seven other chieftains to join Shi Xiu and Ruan the Seventh with a fleet of a hundred vessels and five thousand men. Reader, please note, when Song Jiang divided his army into two columns at Dantu he had less than a hundred chieftains—ninety-nine, to be exact, including himself. The large boats sailed with the naval chieftains to assault the seaports of Jiangyin and Taicang, the smaller entered the streams around Dantu and went with Song Jiang for the attack on Changzhou.

Meanwhile, Lu Shinang, Fang La's minister of military affairs, withdrew to Piling Shire—major defense sector of Changzhou. The governor of Changzhou was Qian Zhenpeng, and under him were two generals. One was Jin Jie, from Shanghao in Miug County. The other was Qian's trusted associate Xu Ding. Qian originally had been a constable in Qingxi County. But he had helped Fang La capture several cities and had been given charge of governing Changzhou.

When Qian heard that Lu had retreated to Changzhou after having been defeated and losing Runzhou, he went with Jin Jie and Xu Ding, opened the gates, and invited him into the city. He entertained Lu courteously and discussed future measures.

"Set your mind at ease, Minister," said Qian. "I am a man of no talents but, thanks to the emanations of His Majesty's good fortune and Your Excellency's prestige, I shall gladly give my all to drive Song Jiang and his gang back across the Yangzi and recover Runzhou. Those rogues will never dare to so much as look south of the river again!"

Reassured, Lit said: "With you exerting such efforts, Governor, our country has no reason to be alarmed. After you have expelled the foe and restored Runzhou to us, I shall earnestly urge the king to bestow on you the highest honors."

That day Lu gave a feast. Of that we need say no more. In his expedition against Changzhou and Suzhou, Song Jiang now neared Piling Shire with a large force. Under him were eleven commanders headed by Guan Sheng, and three thousand troops. At the outskirts of Changzhou they waved their banners and thundered a challenge on their drums.

"Who dares to drive back the enemy?" queried Lu.

"Permit me to offer my services," said Qian, from the saddle of his charger.

The minister assigned six commandants to assist him. They mustered five thousand men, opened the city gate, lowered the drawbridge, and marched forth. Qian, gale-stirring sword in hand, astride a curly-maned swift roan, rode in the van.

Guan Sheng pulled his men back a short distance and allowed Qian Zhenpeng to deploy in battle position. The six commandants flanked Qian on either side. Guan Sheng reined in his steed and brandished his sword.

"Hear me, bandits," he shouted. "You're aiding a rebel who destroys life and angers the Heavenly Spirits. Our imperial army has arrived, but instead of realizing your deadly danger, you dare to resist! We'll not leave until we've slaughtered every last one of you knaves!"

Qian was furious. "You're just a bunch of scruffy robbers from Liangshan Marsh who don't know the will of Heaven! Instead of supporting a rightful king, you surrender to an immoral moron of a sovereign and come to vie against our great kingdom! We're going to pulverise you till there's nothing left of you or your armor!"

Guan Sheng, raging, charged waving his dragon-engraved halberd. Qian met him, wielding his gale-raising sword. Evenly matched, they clashed in a battle worthy of record in book or painting. Blades flashed icily in an atmosphere heavily lethal. The horses pranced and neighed as the contestants struck and parried. Like a streaking meteor was the gale-stirring sword, like lightning across the plain was the dragon-engraved halberd. Hoofs churned the dust, bridle bells jingled into the clouds. Weapons darted, the murderous intensity terrified the celestial spirits.

More than thirty rounds the warriors fought and Qian gradually was forced on the defensive. Two commandants on the southern side, seeing him weaken, galloped out with levelled lances and attacked Guan Sheng in a pincers. They were Zhao Yi and Fan Chou. This angered two chieftains in the Song army. One brandished a lethal sword, the other clutched a tiger-eyed cudgel, as they raced out on their horses. They were Huang Xin the Suppressor of the Three Mountains and Sun Li the Sickly General. Six warriors, three pairs, fought desperately on the field of combat.

Minister Lu hastily sent generals Xu Ding and Jin Jie from the city to join the fray. Weapons in hand, they rode forth.

Zhao Yi versus Huang Xin, Fan Chou versus Sun Li—they were at first evenly matched. But as the battle intensified, southern commandants Zhao and Fan began gaining the advantage. And now Xu Ding and Jin Jie, each wielding a big halberd, were also in the field. The Song army sent Han Tao and Peng Qi to engage them. It was Jin Jie against Han Tao, Xu Ding against Peng Qi. The five pairs battled in deadly earnest.

Actually, General Jin Jie had secretly made up his mind to surrender to the Song forces. In order to create confusion in his own ranks, he retreated to them after desultorily fighting only a few rounds. Han Tao pursued him. At this, southern commandant Gao Keli quickly fitted an arrow to his bow, pulled it to the full, and let fly. The feathered missile struck Han Tao in the cheek, knocking him from his steed.

Qin Ming hastily clapped his horse and raced to the rescue, flourishing his wolf-toothed cudgel. But southern commandant Zhang Jinren, with one thrust of his lance, pierced Han Tao's throat and killed him. Peng Qi and Han Tao had been first and second in command of the same unit, and close as brothers. Burning to avenge Han, Peng broke off from Xu Ding and rode directly towards Gao. Xu Ding galloped after him, but was intercepted by Qin Ming. Gao levelled his lance and prepared to meet his assailant. But Peng Qi was taken unawares by a thrust of Zhang's lance from the side and tumbled from his saddle.

Infuriated by the loss of two chieftains, Guan Sheng couldn't wait to charge into Changzhou. Concentrating his remarkable strength, he sliced Governor Qian to the ground. He was about to capture the governor's curly-maned roan when his own mount stumbled and tossed him off. Gao and Zhang galloped forward to seize Guan Sheng, but Xu Ning, Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen raced ahead and snatched their fallen brother back to the Song position.

Minister Lu's entire army then came pouring out of the city. Guan Sheng and the chieftains had lost the initiative. They retreated north. The southern contingent pursued them for more than twenty //before giving up the chase.

Guan Sheng returned with his beaten forces to Song Jiang and told him of the death of Han Tao and Peng Qi. Song Jiang wept bitterly.

"Who would have thought that after crossing the Yangzi I would lose five brothers? Can I have angered Heaven? Am I not to be allowed to capture Fang La? Am I destined for defeat?"

"You're wrong, Commander-in-Chief," said Wu Yong. "Victory and defeat are common in warfare, and man's birth and death are predestined. They're nothing to wonder about. Today, our two chieftains were fated to die, and that's all there is to it. Please don't upset yourself. Concentrate on our important affairs."

Li Kui came to the tent and said: "Let a few fellows who recognize my brothers' murderers point them out and I'll kill the rogues and avenge them!"

Song Jiang ordered his units to fly white mourning banners on the morrow, and said: "I'll lead you all to the city personally! We'll have a showdown with those bandits!"

The next day Song Jiang and his entire army, on water and on land, in boats and on horse, left camp and set forth. Li Kui the Black Whirlwind, leading chieftains Bao Xu, Xiang Chong, Li Gun and five hundred tough brave infantry, moved up as a vanguard to the walls of Changzhou.

Minister Lu, depressed by the loss of Governor Qian, had dispatched three urgent messages in a row to the Third Great Prince in Suzhou, begging for assistance. He also had sent a plea to the throne. Now, he received a report.

"Five hundred infantry are advancing on the city. Their banner says they are led by Li Kui the Black Whirlwind."

"That lout is the fiercest man in Liangshan Marsh. He's a born killer. Who will take him on?"

Gao Keli and Zhang Jinren, two distinguished commandants, stepped forward.

"If you capture the rascal," said Lu, "I will see to it that the king raises you in rank and rewards you handsomely."

The two took their lances, mounted, and marched from the city with a thousand infantry and cavalry. Li Kui stretched his troops before them in a line. He stood in front, grasping his two battle-axes. By his side was Bao Xu, a broad cutlass in hand. Xiang Chong and Li Gun, nearby, held barbed shields. In their right hands they gripped steel javelins. Chests and backs protected by armor plate, the four chieftains stood in a line at the front.

Southern commandants Gao and Zhang, wildcats who were stronger than tigers, ravens who could bully eagles, deployed their thousand soldiers near the city walls.

A few of Song Jiang's scouts recognized Gao and Zhang as the killers Of Han Tao and Peng Qi. They pointed them out to Black Whirlwind. Dispensing with any challenges, Li Kui charged across the field with his axes. Bao Xu hastily called Xiang Chong and Li Gun, who were waving their barbed shields, and all four swept into the enemy position.

The astonished Gao and Zhang were completely unprepared. They turned their horses to flee, but the barbed shields were already twirling under the animals' muzzles. Gao and Zhang lunged with their lances, but the shields warded off the thrusts. Black Whirlwind hacked the legs of Gao's mount and brought the rider tumbling to the ground.

"Take him alive," cried Xiang Chong. But Li Kui was a killer. He couldn't be stopped. He decapitated Gao with a single blow of his ax. Bao Xu pulled Zhang from the saddle and cut off his head as well.

The four then ripped into the southern troops. Li Kui tied Gao's head to his belt and, with both hands free, swung his axes left and right. A thousand enemy infantry and cavalry ran pell-mell back into the city, but not before Black Whirlwind had mowed down three or four hundred of them.

At the drawbridge Li Kui and Bao Xu wanted to fight their way into Changzhou. They were restrained only by the strenuous efforts of Xiang Chong and Li Gun. Cannon balls pelted down on them from the city walls, and the four withdrew. They found their five hundred men still standing in a line exactly where they had left them. The soldiers had wanted to join in the fighting, but no one dared to get near Li Kui when his blood lust was aroused and he was slaughtering indiscriminately.

By then Song Jiang had come riding up. Li Kui and Bao Xu presented the heads. The other chieftains were amazed.

"How did you do it?" they asked.

"We destroyed many of the foe and intended to take these two alive. But our hands itched. We couldn't control ourselves. So we killed them."

Song Jiang said: "Since we have the heads of the murderers of Han Tao and Peng Qi, we can look up at the sky from under the white mourning banners and offer them as sacrifices."

Again he wept bitterly. Then he had the white banners taken down, rewarded the four raiders and marched with his troops to the walls of Changzhou.

Inside the city, Minister Lu was highly alarmed. He conferred with Jin lie, Xu Ding and the four commandants on how to drive Song Jiang back. They all had seen Li Kui's one-man massacre, and their hearts were chilled. No one would venture out. Again Lu called for volunteers but, like geese whose beaks had been pinned shut by arrows, like fish hooked through the gills, they couldn't utter a sound. Not a man dared to respond.

Sunk in gloom, Lu sent observers up on the walls. Song Jiang's army had surrounded the city. They were pounding drums, waving banners, yelling challenges. Lu ordered all his generals to man the ramparts. They left his headquarters. Alone, he pondered fruitlessly. Finally, he summoned his closest confidants. Their only wish by then was to escape. Of that we'll say no more.

Meanwhile Jin Jie returned home and said to his wife Jade Orchid: "Song Jiang has ringed the city and is pressing from three sides. Changzhou is short of grain. It can't hold out for very long. Once they break in, their blades will turn us all into ghosts!"

"You're loyal to the emperor and want to surrender. When you were a Song official the imperial court treated you well. Since you're willing to abandon evil and return to righteousness, why not capture Minister Lu and turn him over to Song Jiang? That will ensure your welcome."

"Lu has four commandants under him, each with his own troops. That oaf Xu Ding and I have never got along, and he's one of Lu's most trusted associates. A single strand can't spin a thread, a single hand can't clap alone. I'm afraid I couldn't bring it off. It would only end in disaster."

"Write a secret message, bind it to an arrow, and shoot it out of the city tonight. Let Song Jiang know what you're planning. By coordinating from within and without, he'll be able to take Changzhou. Go forth tomorrow and pretend to be defeated. Let the Song forces follow as you retreat into the city. It will be a splendid deed."

"Very clever, my dear wife. I'll do as you say."

The next day Song Jiang stepped up his assaults on the city and Minister Lu called his generals into conference. Jin Jie spoke.

"Changzhou is on high terrain. It's easy to defend but not a good place from which to attack. We should hang on until relief comes from Suzhou. Then we can all go into battle together."

Lu agreed. "Well said." He instructed Ying Ming and Zhao Yi to hold the East Gate, Shen Bian and Fan Chou the North Gate, Jin Jie the West Gate, and Xu Ding the South Gate. The generals and their soldiers took up their respective posts.

That evening Jin Jie wrote a secret letter and attached it to an arrow. In the still of the night he sped it from atop the wall towards an enemy patrol outside the West Gate. The officer in charge hurriedly delivered it to Lu Zhishen the Tattooed Monk and Wu Song the Pilgrim, who commanded the western camp. They had Du Xing rush it to the main camp to the northeast, where Song Jiang and Wu Yong were conferring by candlelight in the headquarters tent. Song Jiang read the letter with joy. He had its contents immediately transmitted to all three camps.

The following day they launched an offensive from three sides. Minister Lu, in the command tower on the wall, heard an earth-shaking explosion in Song Jiang's position, and a fiery cannon ball flew over and struck a corner of the tower. Half of it collapsed with a crash. In mortal fear, Lu hurried down from the wall. He exhorted the generals guarding the four gates to go out and repel the foe.

Three rolls on the battle drums, and the city gates were opened wide and the drawbridges lowered. From the North Gate Shen Bian and Fan Chou marched forth with their men. Guan Sheng the Big Halberd rode out to meet them on Governor Qian's curly-maned roan.

He was just about to engage Fan Chou in combat when Jin Jie and his troops emerged and challenged the enemy to fight. Sun Li cantered forward and took on Jin Jie. Before they had fought three rounds, Jin Jie, feigning defeat, turned and galloped away. Sun Li pursued, closely followed by nine more chieftains. Jin Jie retreated into the city, and the chieftains pushed in after him, capturing the West Gate.

The news that Song Jiang's army was pouring in through the West Gate put Changzhou in a turmoil. Fang La had cruelly oppressed the people, and their hatred knew no bounds. They rushed out in full force to help the Song attackers. Song Jiang's banner was already flying on the city ramparts.

Fan Chou and Shen Bian, seeing that the tide had turned, hastily started back to Changzhou to protect their families. But Wang the Stumpy Tiger and woman warrior Ten Feet of Steel cut in from the left and grabbed Fan Chou. Xuan Zan and Hao Siwen dashed up on the right and knocked Shen Bian from his saddle with their lances. The Song soldiers captured him.

Now the entire army under Song Jiang and Wu Yong surged into the city, seeking out southern troops and killing them in great number. Minister Lu and Xu Ding fled desperately through the South Gate. Pursuing Song troops were unable to catch them, and returned to Changzhou. While awaiting further orders, they discussed the awards they would claim.

Zhao Yi, who had been hiding in the home of one of the local populace, was seized by his host and handed over. Ying Ming had been killed in battle. His head was presented as proof.

Song Jiang, on entering Changzhou, posted notices reassuring the masses. They crowded to the prefectural center, supporting the old and carrying the infants, to express their thanks. Song Jiang comforted them, and promised they would be considered as good, law-abiding citizens. The chieftains also came to claim their awards.

When Jin Jie arrived to pay his respects, Song Jiang descended the steps to greet him personally and invite him into the hall. Kowtowing at the foot of the steps, Jin Jie voiced his gratitude. He said his wife deserved the credit for his return to the Song regime as a loyal official.

Song Jiang directed that Fan Chou, Shen Bian and Zhao Yi be locked in cage carts and escorted by Jin Jie to Governor Zhang in Runzhou. He wrote a covering document which he gave to Jin Jie. At the same time he instructed Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller to fly on ahead with a letter vouching for Jin Jie and urging that he be accepted into the main Song army. Song Jiang praised his loyalty so highly that Zhang received him when he arrived at Runzhou. The Governor was very favorably impressed. He presented Jin Jie with gold and silver and silks, a fine horse and ceremonial wine.

Deputy District Commander Liu Guangshi appointed him an expeditionary commander. Later, when they broke the Golden Tartars under Fourth Prince Wushu, Jin Jie distinguished himself many times in battle. He eventually was given his own command, and died while fighting at Zhongshan.

But to get back to that day in Runzhou, Zhang and Liu, after rewarding Jin Jie, had the three rebel commanders killed, their bodies pulverised and their heads hung up on public display. They also sent lavish rewards to Song Jiang and his forces.

After settling his army at Changzhou, Song Jiang dispatched Dai Zong to learn the results of Lu Junyi's campaign against Xuanzhou and Huzhou. Meanwhile, a mounted scout arrived with a report.

Song Jiang selected ten infantry and cavalry chieftains and ordered them south with ten thousand men to meet the foe. Guan Sheng and other chieftains commanding the advance contingent bid Song Jiang farewell and left the city.

Dai Zong returned with Chai Jin and told Song Jiang: "General Lu Junyi's captured Xuanzhou. He's sent Chai Jin to tell you about it." Song Jiang was delighted. He greeted Chai Jin with wine and conducted him to the rear hall. Chai Jin handed him a detailed written report that read:

Fang La's garrison general of Xuanzhou, Jia Yuqing, had under him six commandants, all natives of Shezhou and Muzhou. Jia sent them forth with three columns. Our chieftains killed four in personal combat, and their columns retreated into Xuanzhou. Lu Junyi ordered an all-out assault. When we neared the city gates, enemy soldiers on the walls threw down a grind stone, killing one of our chieftains. Their arrows flew like rain. All were poison-tipped. Two more of our chieftains were hit. Both died when we got them back to camp. General Lu, angered, pushed the attack through the night. The East Gate was not very well defended, and so we took Xuanzhou. We killed their fifth commandant during the assault. Garrison General Jia fled with his remnant troops towards Huzhou. We don't know where Cheng Shengzu, the sixth commandant, has gone. The grindstone killed Zheng Tianshou the Fair-Faced Gentleman. Slain by poison arrows were Cao Zheng the Demon Carver and Lightning Wang Dingliu.

On hearing that he had lost 3 more brothers, Song Jiang wept wildly and collapsed in a faint. His skin was yellow, lips purple, fingernails blue, and eyes lustreless. There was no telling about the state of his 5 organs but his 4 limbs were paralysed. Truly, flowers open, only to be blown down by the wind. Can the moonlight withstand dark gathering clouds? Could Song Jiang recover after falling unconscious?

Now when General Xing and Scimitar fought, they had not completed fifteen bouts before the latter raised his weapon and with a great slash sent his opponent tumbling from his horse. Twin Rods immediately led a mighty charge and the six enemy commanders turned and fled southwards. When Marshal Lü saw his troops had been routed he retreated with his wounded to Changzhou. The ten Song commanders took over the town of Dantu and sent word to Song Jiang. The main army soon arrived and pitched camp outside the town. The army was rewarded and a message was sent to Marshal Zhang requesting him to assign troops to garrison Runzhou. Next day two staff officers arrived with a reward for the troops in Dantu, which Song Jiang accepted and distributed.

Song Jiang now called the Unicorn in to discuss plans for the campaign. "At present," he said, "Xuanzhou and Huzhou are both in the hands of the rebel Fang La. You and I will divide the army into two columns, and draw lots to decide who goes where." Song Jiang drew Changzhou and Suzhou, while the Unicorn drew Xuanzhou and Huzhou. Song Jiang called on Sterling to split the army into two equal divisions. Except for Blue-Faced Beast, who could not take part in the campaign because he was sick and was left behind at Dantu, all the leaders were allotted to one or the other column, forty-two of them with Song Jiang and forty-seven with the Unicorn.

Now keep this firmly in mind, everyone, that the Unicorn was to attack Xuanzhou and Huzhou with forty-seven commanders, while Song Jiang was to attack Changzhou and Suzhou with forty-two commanders. The boat commanders were a separate unit with their own plan of campaign, on account of Cave Dragon and River Rider having been sent to Burnt Mountain to find Madcap and Ruan the Seventh. They had come back and reported: "Madcap and Ruan the Seventh got to the river, killed a family there, stole a fast boat and went over to the Hill Temple on Burnt Island. When the abbot learnt they were from Mount Liang he invited them stay there and entertained them. After hear-ing about White Eel's exploits, they made further inquiries and found that Maogang would be a good base from which to attack down the coast. They send a report and are requesting boat commanders and boats prepared for battle." Song Jiang sent the White-Water Dragon and the other seven boat commanders with five thousand sailors to back up Madcap and Ruan the Seventh. There were thus ten leaders in this attack, with a hundred boats.

You understand, friends, that when Song Jiang divided up his army in Dantu he had only ninety-nine leaders, not even a full hundred.

The water-borne leaders had all the large boats for the assault on Jiangyin and Taicang along the coast, while the small boats gathered in the narrow waterways around Dantu ready to join the attack on Changzhou.

Now Marshal Lü and his six staff officers had fortified themselves at Piling in Changzhou. The governor of this place was Qian Zhenpeng and under him were two generals: one was Jin Jie, and the other Xu Ding, who was a close friend of the Governor. The Governor himself had originally been police chief of Clearwater, but after helping Fang La to gain control there he had received advancement. When he heard that Marshal Lü had been defeated and that Runzhou was lost and the army retreating on Changzhou, he told his generals to open the gates and let them in. He received them in the government office and entertained them, and then they discussed the question of defence. The Governor said: "Don't worry, Marshal. I know I am not especially talented, but I will work like a horse to bring about the downfall of Song Jiang and his villainous gang and send them scuttling back across the river. I will recapture Runzhou. They shall submit to my will!"

Marshal Lü's response was fulsome: "When you show such determination, how can order fail to be restored to the country? After your triumph, I will petition His Majesty for you myself and honours will be heaped upon you." A big banquet followed. Of this no more.

Meanwhile Song Jiang was leading out the troops allotted to him to attack Suzhou and Changzhou in a major offensive against Piling. His commander-in-chief was Scimitar, and under him were Thunderclap and nine others. This made eleven of them, who with three thousand troops halted before the walls of Changzhou amid a forest of banners and thundering drums to issue their challenge to battle. When he saw them, Marshal Lü said: "Who is going to drive them off for me?"

The Governor had his horse saddled and said: "I shall give it my all!"

The Marshal appointed six staff officers to go with him and five thousand troops. The gates were opened, the drawbridge lowered and the Governor sallied forth, brandishing a mighty blade and riding a chestnut stallion.

Scimitar responded by withdrawing his forces somewhat, until the enemy had taken up their battle positions, with the six commanders divided equally on either side of the Governor. Then Scimitar rode forward, resting his weapon, and bellowed: "Hear this, you rebels! You are fighting on the side of a traitor, whose actions offend against natural law and incur the wrath of gods and man! The forces of righteousness are at hand. Have you no fear of death that you dare oppose us? I swear to you that if we do not make you pay for it with your lives I shall never take up arms again!"

The Governor replied furiously: "You rabble are just robbers from Mount Liang! You have no understanding of heaven's will since you ignore the cause of a strong prince and choose to bow down before a foolish and unprincipled lord. You have the nerve to pick a fight with our great country. We shall give you such a beating that not even a scrap of your armour will be left whole!"

Enraged, Scimitar charged forward, his crescent blade flashing, while the Governor likewise drew his sword and charged to meet him. They fought over thirty bouts, till the Governor's strength began to fail him and he could scarcely hold out. Then from the ranks of the southerners two commanders, seeing his plight, levelled their spears and rode out side by side. These two came at Scimitar, one from either side. Two commanders from the Song ranks were provoked by this and charged, one wielding a deadly sword, the other a tiger's eye chain. They were the Tamer and Colonel Sun. The other southern commanders were waiting in two ranks in front of their lines. Marshal Lü hurriedly ordered two more of them to their general's assistance.

Now in fact one of these southern commanders, Jin Jie, had already formed the intention of surrendering to the Song and was really interested in creating disorder among his own side, so after only a few bouts he turned his horse and galloped back towards his own ranks. Victorious was not going to let this opportunity slip and gave chase. When the southern commander Gao Keli saw Victorious hard on his comrade's heels, he took up his decorated bow, fitted an arrow to the string, took careful aim and let fly. The arrow hit Victorious full in the face and he fell from his horse. Thunderclap hurriedly slapped his horse and whirling his wolf's-tooth mace charged to the rescue. But already another southerner, Zhang Jinren, had thrust his spear into Victor-ious and finished him off. Victorious and the Supremo were sworn brothers, and when the latter saw his friend die he was determined to avenge him. He shook off his opponent and charged back towards the main southern army to search out Gao Keli. The man he had been fighting gave chase but Thunderclap stood in his way. Gao Keli saw the Supremo coming and levelled his lance to receive him. Intent only on revenge, the Supremo failed to protect himself and received a thrust to the ribs from Zhang Jinren's spear, which spitted him and hurled him from his horse.

Seeing two of his commanders killed was intolerable to Scimitar and in a blazing fury he charged towards Changzhou. With a display of awesome might he dealt the enemy commander, Governor Qian, one blow which knocked him lifeless from his beautiful long-maned chestnut stallion. Scimitar was about to seize the horse when his own, hit in the leg by an arrow, stumbled and threw him. The southern commanders Gao Keli and Zhang Jinren galloped towards Scimitar, but he was rescued by Spearsman, the Ugly Son-in-Law and Hound who got him back to their own lines. Marshal Lü now led a ferocious sally from the city and Scimitar was forced to retreat northwards with heavy losses. The southerners pursued them for more than six miles.

After his losses that day, Scimitar decided to head back and report to Song Jiang. When he heard of the deaths of Victorious and the Supremo, Song Jiang wept. "I never thought when we crossed the river that we would lose five of our brothers!" he lamented. "It must be that heaven is angry with me and does not wish me to defeat Fang La, otherwise why should we suffer these reverses?"

The Professor said: "You're talking nonsense! Winning and losing, victory and defeat, these are normal events for a soldier, there's nothing unusual about them. Today was the day these two leaders were destined to die, that's all. Put aside your grief and let us discuss tactics."

At this moment Iron Ox rushed into the tent and said: "Let someone who knows the killers of those two lead me to the swine and let me kill them, to avenge my two brothers!"

Song Jiang ordered a white flag of mourning to be raised the following day and announced that he would personally lead the whole army against the city to do battle and achieve final victory. Next day he led a huge attack by land and water, setting out as soon as the boats had arrived. Iron Ox with Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost and five hundred brave infantrymen went ahead to reconnoitre and arrived before the walls of Changzhou.

Marshal Lü having lost Governor Qian of Changzhou was greatly disturbed and had sent three urgent messages to Third Prince Fang Mao in Suzhou asking for help. He also sent a report to the court. Now he heard that five hundred infantry were at the city gates and that according to the banner their leader was the Black Whirlwind Li Kui, alias Iron Ox. "That blackguard is Mount Liang's most vicious bandit, a notorious killer," said the Marshal. "Who will go and capture him for me?"

Two distinguished generals presented themselves: Gao Keli and Zhang Jinren. The Marshal said to them privately: "If you capture the bandit for me, I shall use all my influence to secure your promotion." The pair of them grasped their lances and mounted and led out a thousand cavalry to do battle. When he sighted them, Iron Ox deployed his infantry in a straight line and grasping his two axes placed himself in front of them. Pluto was to one side of him, armed with a broad long-handled sword. On the other side were Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost with their spiked shields and steel javelins in their right hands.

So there they were, these four, wearing armour plating to protect chest and back and standing at the head of their men. The two southern leaders were like mountain cats that think they have got the better of a tiger, or magpies taunting an eagle. They had a thousand troops and had deployed them just outside the city.

There were several scouts among the Song army who recognized those two southern generals as the ones who had killed Victorious and the Supremo and pointed them out to Iron Ox. "See them two commanders? They're the ones as killed our two."

Iron Ox said not a word but took up his two axes and charged straight at the enemy ranks. Pluto, calling to Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost to follow with their whirling shields, rushed off to help him. All shouting in unison, the four of them fell on the enemy. Gao Keli and Zhang Jinren were shaken and turned their horses without even waiting to strike a blow. But the two shield-bearers were already under the horses' noses. When Gao and Zhang tried to strike downwards with their lances, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost parried with their shields, and at the same moment Iron Ox swept Gao from his horse with a blow of his axe. Gao fell under the horse's feet and Eight-Armed Ogre shouted out: "Keep him alive!" But killing was in Iron Ox's nature and he could not restrain himself. One more blow and Gao's head was off. Pluto likewise had knocked Zhang from his horse and cut off his head with a single blow. All four now continued to rampage through the enemy ranks. Iron Ox had tied Gao's head to his belt and whirling his two axes, plunged into the thick of it, giving no quarter.

1000 southern troops died on the field of battle, and then as they fled into the city three or four hundred more, till Iron Ox and Pluto had reached the drawbridge. They wanted to fight on into the city, but Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost insisted they hold back. By now missiles were raining down from the city walls. The four warriors withdrew a little. They found their five hundred troops drawn up as before in a straight line. They had not dared to go into action. They had thought about joining the battle, but since Iron Ox was laying about him indiscriminately they feared he would not distinguish between friend and foe and preferred to keep their distance.

Now a cloud of dust announced the arrival of Song Jiang's army. Iron Ox and Pluto presented the heads, which were recognized as being those of Gao and Zhang. The others were critical: "Why did you take their heads?" they said.

"We killed a good many more. We intended to take these two alive, but our hands itched to do it and we couldn't resist," they replied.

"Since we've got the heads now, we'll put them under the white banner, to propitiate the spirits of Victorious and the Supremo," Song Jiang said. He wept a while as the heads were placed under the banner, and then rewarded Iron Ox and the other three. Then they all headed for Changzhou.

Back in that city Marshal Lü was exceedingly concerned. He discussed with Jin Jie, Xu Ding and the remaining four staff officers how to repel Song Jiang's force. All his generals had seen how Iron Ox fought and were quaking in their boots. None of them wanted to lead a counter-attack. The question was put to them several times, but they were as if struck dumb. No one spoke, no one dared offer a suggestion. With a heavy heart Marshal Lü ordered someone up onto the battlements to observe, as Song Jiang's army took up positions on three sides of the city and with drums and banners issued their challenge right under the city walls. Marshal Lü ordered all his commanders up onto the walls to organize the defence. They departed, leaving him alone in the inner chamber to contemplate his situation. He had no plan. He summoned some of the most trusted members of his entourage for further discussions. Their only suggestion was to abandon the city and run for it. Of this no more.

Meanwhile guard commander Jin Jie went home and said to his wife, Jade Orchid: "Song Jiang's army is camped on three sides of the city and we are short of provisions, we won't be able to hold out long. If the city falls, we are all destined for slaughter."

Jade Orchid said: "You are a loyal soul. I know you really want to return to your allegiance to the Emperor. There's the added motive that you used to hold an important post under the Song. The court never found fault with you. Wouldn't it be best to turn over a new leaf, capture Marshal Lü and hand him over to Song Jiang? I'm sure it's the most advantageous policy."

"But he's got four bodyguards, each with his own troops," her husband objected. "And that bastard Xu Ding, who is no friend to me, is very close to the Marshal. I fear the scheme could misfire and only invite disaster."

"You must act with secrecy," his wife said. "Wait till dark, attach a sealed letter to an arrow and fire it out of the city to inform Song Jiang that he can have the city with inside help. Go out to fight tomorrow and feign defeat. Then you can be credited with leading them into the city."

"That's a brilliant idea, my love," he said. "That's exactly what I'll do." The poem says:

Flee the dark and seek the light,
That's the way to put things right.
A woman with a loyal heart,
Helps a man to see his fault!

Next day Song Jiang launched a fierce assault on the city. Marshal Lü called a meeting. Jin Jie said: "Our defences are strong. We should concentrate on defence and not think of attacking. If we are firm in our defence we can wait till Suzhou sends reinforcements. Then we can join together to fight them."

"That makes good sense," the Marshal said. It was agreed that two of them should defend the east gate, two of them the north, Jin Jie would take the west and Xu Ding the south. They all went off to organize their guard. That evening Jin Jie wrote his confidential letter and tied it to an arrow. He waited till it was fully dark and all was quiet and then one of his scouts went up onto the battlements and fired it off towards the west. One of Song Jiang's men picked it up and hurriedly reported with it to the camp. The western camp was under the command of Monk and Pilgrim. When they saw the letter they hurriedly sent their subordinate Uglymug to report with it to the headquarters in the north-east camp. Song Jiang and the Professor were discussing matters and the tent was brightly lit when Uglymug presented Jin Jie's letter. Song Jiang was delighted and ordered all three camps to be informed.

Next day the leaders in all three camps attacked the city simultaneously. Marshal Lü was watching from a tower as Song Jiang's Thunderer prepared his guns and fired off an explosive shell which landed beside the tower and brought the corner of the tower crashing down. Marshal Lü fled from the walls in panic and ordered the commanders of the four gates to make a desperate sally. Three beats of the drum sounded and the city gates opened, the drawbridge was lowered. The two generals from the north gate advanced. Scimitar, mounted on the horse of the dead governor rode out from the Song ranks and took on one of them. As the two were going at it, Jin Jie led some bold troops out from the west gate. Colonel Sun engaged him. Before completing three bouts Jin Jie feigned defeat and galloped back. Colonel Sun, charged forward, with the Dandy and the Flautist close behind him, followed by Monk, Pilgrim, Red Star, Comet, the Young Master and Uglymug.

As Jin Jie retreated into the city Colonel Sun reached the west gate behind him and proceeded to seize it. Fighting broke out within the city and it became evident that the Song forces had got in by the west gate. At this point the people, who had been persecuted by Fang La beyond their enduring and had reached a point where their pent-up anger was ready to explode, hearing that Song forces had entered the city poured out to join in the fight. Song Jiang's flag was soon flying over the walls. Two of the southern commanders realized the city had changed hands and were rushing back to defend their families when Short-Arse and Steelbright cut them off from the left and caught one of them, while the Son-in-Law and Hound charging in from the right knocked the other from his horse and took him and his men prisoner. Song Jiang and the Professor led the main army into the city. On all sides southern soldiers were captured and promptly executed. Taking his friend Xu Ding with him, the Marshal left by the southern gate and fled for his life. Song Jiang's army could not catch up with him so they returned to the city to await orders and reward for their exploits. A third southern commander tried to hide in a commoner's house and was caught by the people and handed over. A fourth was killed by his own troops and his head taken. Song Jiang went to the government office and published a proclamation to calm the people, who flocked there, young and old alike, to give thanks. Song Jiang reassured them, saying that he recognized them as loyal citizens. The leaders were all invited to apply for their rewards.

When Jin Jie went to the government office to pay his respects to Song Jiang, the latter stepped down to receive him personally and invited him to take a seat. Jin Jie's relief was boundless, and he became again a loyal subject of the Song Emperor. This was all thanks to the good advice of his wife, as we already know.

Song Jiang had the three captured commanders placed in prison carts and ordered Jin Jie to take them himself to Marshal Zhang's headquarters in Runzhou. Bearing the order and with the prisoners under close guard Jin went to Runzhou and handed them over. Before he left, Song Jiang sent Magic Messenger with an urgent letter recommending Jin to the army. Learning from this letter how highly Song Jiang rated Jin, the Marshal received him most hospitably and heaped upon him gifts of gold and silver, silk, a horse and wine. The Marshal's deputy, Liu Guangshi, retained Jin on his staff and gave him military rank to serve with the army. Later he was with Liu Guangshi at the defeat of the Jin and fought with distinction. Later still he was given his own command and died in the action at Zhongshan. That is the story of Jin Jie.

Marshal Zhang and his deputy rewarded Jin Jie that day and had the three prisoners hacked to pieces and their corpses exhibited as a ghastly example to all, following which someone was sent to Changzhou with the reward for Song Jiang's troops.

Meanwhile Song Jiang, after settling his troops in at Changzhou, had sent Magic Messenger to find out about the Unicorn's campaign against Xuanzhou and Huzhou. He had also received reports that Marshal Lü had taken refuge in Wuxi and had linked up with the reinforcements sent from Suzhou and was ready to attack again. To meet this threat he moved a force of cavalry and infantry south, consisting of Scimitar and nine others and ten thousand men. They set off at once. The Magic Messenger now returned, together with Mr. Chai, to bring news of the Unicorn's campaign. He announced that Xuanzhou had been taken and that Mr. Chai was with him to report on the action. Song Jiang was delighted, and after Mr. Chai had paid his respects he got out the wine to celebrate and they went into an inner room, where Song Jiang asked for a detailed description. Mr. Chai produced the despatches and gave his own oral account. Fang La's governor of Xuanzhou was Jia Yuqing. He had six lieutenants, whom he ordered to advance from the city in three columns. The Unicorn divided his forces into three columns to meet them. In the centre Twin Rods took on one of the enemy commanders and Twin Spears another. After ten bouts Twin Spears killed his opponent and the other enemy commander fled. Their forces were routed. On the left Leopard's Head and Hasty took on their opposite numbers. Leopard's Head's halberd dispatched his opponent and Hasty finished his with the axe. On the right Hotshot and the Unstoppable were fighting. The former knocked down his adversary with a stone and the Tiger-Killer hastened to finish him off. The Unstoppable's opponent fled. Four enemy leaders were killed that day and the rest of them took refuge in the city. The Unicorn immediately ordered his commanders to take the city. They got to the gate but had no protection against the enemy soldiers on the walls. One of the leaders was struck and killed by a millstone that hurtled down. A hail of arrows also rained down on them, all with poisoned tips, hitting two more commanders, who both died when they got them back to the camp. After losing these three leaders, the Unicorn persisted all night in the attack. The guards on the east gate could not hold out and the city was taken. One enemy commander was killed in the fighting and the other escaped and led the shattered remnants of their troops towards Huzhou. Monk had got into trouble during this battle and his whereabouts were unknown. The leader killed by the millstone was Whitey, and the two hit by poisoned arrows were Knife and Fleetfoot. The news that he had lost three more leaders grieved Song Jiang sorely. Whatever may have been the state of his five internal organs, his 4 limbs suddenly would not respond. One might indeed say that:

Song Jiang fell senseless to the floor.

Turbulent River Dragon Pledges Brotherhood in a small gathering of heroes on Taihu Lake; Song Jiang Convenes a major Large Meeting in Suzhou City

It was some time before the chieftains were able to revive Song Jiang. When at last he could speak, he said to Wu Yong: "We'll never take Fang La. We've been very unlucky since crossing the river. We've lost eight brothers, one after another!"

"Talking like that will only discourage our forces," said the military advisor. "We returned to the capital intact after defeating the Liao because that was Heaven's will. Some of our brothers' time was up, and we lost them. But we've captured three big prefectures—Runzhou, Changzhou and Xuanzhou, thanks to the emperor's fortunate emanations and your own splendid prestige. What's unlucky about that? You've no reason to be discouraged."

"You're right, of course. I guess I was counting too heavily on the hundred and eight of us being star spirits and our names appearing on the stone tablet. We've all been as close as arms and legs to a single body. I couldn't help feeling grieved by the bad news today."

"Please don't upset yourself. You must preserve your health. Concentrate on the disposition of troops and the Wuxi offensive."

"I'll keep Lord Chai Jin with me. Have Dai Zong notify Lu Junyi to attack Huzhou and meet us in Hangzhou as soon as possible."

Wu Yong had Pei Xuan write the dispatch and sent Dai Zong off with it to Xuanzhou. Of that we'll say no more.

Meanwhile, Minister Lu and Xu Ding, fleeing to Wuxi, met the relief army sent by the Third Great Prince from Suzhou. It was headed by General Wei Zhong, and under him were a dozen or more commanders and ten thousand men. The two contingents joined forces and prepared to defend Wuxi. Lu told how Jin Jie had virtually made a gift of Changzhou to the enemy.

"Don't worry, Minister," said Wei Zhong. "We'll get it back for you."

A cavalry scout reported! "Song Jiang's army is nearly here. Better get ready." Wei Zhong mounted his steed and led his troops out of the North Gate to confront the foe. But when he saw how strong Song Jiang's army was, with Li Kui the Black Whirlwind, followed by Bao Xu, Xiang Chong and Li Jun, charging directly towards him, he knew his army couldn't withstand them, and pulled back in disorder, completely routed. As he hastily retreated into the city, the four chieftains were right behind him. Lu fled through the South Gate. Guan Sheng and his troops by then had captured Wuxi, and the city was in flames. Wei Zhong and Xu Ding also escaped through the South Gate, returning to Suzhou.

Guan Sheng rushed a report of the victory to Song Jiang, who soon arrived with the other chieftains. Notices were posted reassuring the local populace that they would be treated as good citizens. The army made camp in the county, and a request was sent to Governor Zhang and Deputy District Commander Liu that they retain control over Changzhou.

Minister Lu, with Wei Zhong and Xu Ding, leading their defeated forces, hurried to Suzhou city and begged succor from the Third Great Prince. They said they had been unable to hold Wuxi because Song Jiang's army was of overwhelming strength. Infuriated, Fang Mao ordered his guards to execute Minister Lu at once.

"Song Jiang's commanders are experienced warriors, men of remarkable Courage," said Wei Zhong, "and their soldiers are all Liangshan Marsh bandits with plenty of battle experience. They're hard to beat."

"I'll withhold the sword from your neck for the time being," Fang Mao said to the minister. "You can have five thousand more troops. Go out first and patrol. I'll also assign some more generals. We'll make farther plans later."

Lu bowed and thanked him. Dressing in full armor, he took his snake lance, eighteen feet long, mounted and led his soldiers from the city.

Fang Mao summoned eight more generals, each tall and strong and highly skilled with weapons. A sickle-bladed lance in hand, he rode out with them personally to observe the combat. Preceded by the eight generals, and followed by thirty-two commanders in neat ranks, he led fifty thousand soldiers through the city's Changho Gate. Minister Lu, with Wei Zhong and Xu Ding, who had left earlier, by then had passed the Cool Hill Monastery and were advancing towards Wuxi.

Already informed by his scouts, Song Jiang had marched more than ten //from Wuxi County with a large contingent under several generals. The two armies sighted each other and deployed into battle positions. Minister Lu angrily cantered forward, lance in hand, and challenged Song Jiang to do combat.

Song Jiang was standing beneath an arch of pennants. He turned his head and called: "Who will capture this knave for me?" Before the words were out of his mouth, Xu Ning the Metal Lancer galloped out with his golden lance and engaged Minister Lu. To the encouraging shouts from their respective sides, they fought more than twenty rounds. Then Lu tried a feint, and Xu ran him through the ribs. The minister fell dead to the ground. Both armies yelled. Li Kui the Black Whirlwind brandishing his axes, and Bao Xu the God of Death flourishing his sword, plus Xiang Chong and Li Gun each twirling his barbed shield, tore across the field. The southern soldiers were thrown into confusion. Poised for a charge, Song Jiang's forces found themselves confronted by Fang Mao's main army. They halted each other's advance with swarms of arrows, and both contingents took up battle positions. The eight southern generals spread out in a straight line. Fang Mao was enraged to learn that Minister Lu had been killed. He rode forth, lance athwart his saddle, and reviled Song Jiang.

"You're only a gang of petty robbers from Liangshan Marsh! The doomed Song court has named you a Vanguard General and sends you to invade our land of Wu! I'll not withdraw my soldiers till we've slaughtered you, every one!"

Song Jiang, also on horseback, retorted: "You're just a bunch of rustics from Muzhou! What chance have you of ever winning sovereignty! Surrender and save your necks. We are the imperial army. How dare you resist us with tricky words? We're not leaving till we've killed you all!"

"Enough of this chatter. I have here eight fierce generals. Dare you select eight to do them battle?"

Song Jiang laughed. "We'd be no true gallants if we pitted two against one. We'll match you eight for eight. But no man knocked from his horse is to be killed. He must be carried back to his own side. There must be no sniping with arrows and no seizure of corpses. If there is no clear victor, no general melee shall be allowed, and the contest must be continued the following day."

Fang Mao agreed. At his order, his eight generals rode forward, weapons in hand. Song Jiang spoke to his own officers. "Let eight cavalry commanders enter the field." Through the arch of pennants, from the left and from the right, eight chieftains moved forward on their steeds in formation. Drums thundered, banners fluttered, each side fired a signal cannon, and shouts rose from the two armies as the sixteen mounted figures lined up against their opposites.

For more than thirty rounds they fought, until a man was downed. And who was the victor? Zhu Tong the Beautiful Beard. His lance had stabbed his opponent from his saddle. Trumpets in both armies sounded the withdrawal. The remaining seven pairs disengaged and returned to their original positions.

Fang Mao the Third Great Prince, due to the loss of his general, felt at a disadvantage. He pulled his forces back into the city of Suzhou. Song Jiang praised his cavalry chieftains and made camp near the Icy Hill Monastery. He raised Zhu Tong in rank. Pei Xuan wrote a report of the matter to Military Governor Zhang. Of that we'll say no more.

The Third Great Prince held the city but wouldn't come out and fight. He posted his generals at the gates, laid a field of barbed branches in depth, lined the walls with bowmen and cannon, prepared to heat molten metal, and piled bottles of lime along the ramparts. He would defend Suzhou stubbornly.

Song went to view the situation with four chieftains and thirty some-odd cavalry. The city was surrounded by water and the walls were strong. "We won't take this place in a hurry," he thought. He returned to camp and conferred with Wu Yong.

Li Jun the naval chieftain was announced. He had just arrived from Jiangyin. Song Jiang directed that he be invited into the headquarters tent. He entered and Song Jiang asked him about the situation along the coast.

"We sailed against Jiangyin and Taicang and they battled us with naval craft," said Li Jun. "Ruan the Second finished one of their commanders with a thrust of his spear, another was killed by our arrows, and we captured both towns. Then Shi Xiu, Zhang Heng and Zhang Shun took Jiading, and the three Ruan brothers occupied Changshu. I've come specially to report."

Delighted, Song Jiang rewarded Li Jun. He sent him on with a dispatch concerning the victories to Governor Zhang and Deputy District Commander Liu in Changzhou. There, the two officials further rewarded Li Jun and instructed him to return to the camp at Icy Hill Monastery.

Realizing that only a naval offensive could crack the watergirt Suzhou, Song Jiang kept Li Jun with him, and directed that he prepare vessels for the assault.

"Better let me go and have a look, so that I'll know what I'm doing."

"Right."

Li Jun was gone two days. When he returned he said: "The southern side of the city is near Taihu Lake. I'll need a boat that will take me into the lake from the Yixing tributary. From there, I'll cross over to Wujiang and see what news I can pick up about the southern end. Then we'll be able to attack from four sides and break in."

"An excellent idea. Just what I've been thinking. But I must get some good assistants to go with you."

Song Jiang appointed four chieftains to aid in capturing more coastal towns and directed the recall of Tong Wei and Tong Meng. Li Jun took the order and the replacements to Jiangyin and returned with Tong Wei and Tong Meng two days later. Song Jiang greeted them, and instructed them to go with Li Jun and spy out the southern end of Suzhou.

The three set sail in a little craft. Two boatmen plied the sweep oars. They followed Tixing Creek around to Taihu Lake, a broad body of water of beautiful emerald green. Crossing the lake, they neared Wujiang and saw in the distance forty or fifty fishing boats.

"We'll pretend we're fish buyers," said Li Jun, "and ask some questions."

They rowed over to the first vessel and Li Jun queried: "Got any carp?"

"If it's carp you want, come home with me and I'll sell you some."

Li Jun's boat accompanied a few of the fishing craft. Before long they sighted a hamlet of twenty or so households in a grove of bent-backed weeping willows. There the fishermen moored their boats and led Li and his party to a compound on the bank.

The moment he set foot inside the compound gate, the first fisherman whistled. Seven or eight big fellows with hooked poles immediately closed in from both sides, snagged Li and his two companions and dragged them further into the compound. They tied each of the three to a big stake without a word.

Li Jun looked around. He saw four bold gallants sitting in a thatched hall. The first of these had a red beard and brown hair and wore a blue quilted silk tunic. The second, a tall thin fellow with a short mustache was dressed in a dark green cotton shirt with a round collar. The third was swarthy and had a long beard. The fourth had a broad bony face, a curly spade-shaped beard and, like the third fellow, was dressed in a blue quilted tunic. All wore broad-brimmed hats of black felt and carried weapons. The leader shouted at Li Jun.

"Where are you rogues from? What are you doing on our lake?"

"We're traders from Yangzhou. We've come to buy fish."

"Don't bother to question him, brother," advised the bony faced man. "He's obviously a spy. Just let me cut his heart out to go with my wine!"

Li Jun said to himself: "I was a smuggler on the Xunyang River for a long time, and for several years a gallant in Liangshan Marsh. Who would have thought I'd end my life here. Well, if I'm finished, I'm finished!" He sighed, looked at Tong Wei and Tong Meng and said: "I got you two into this. We'll all become ghosts together!"

"Don't talk like that," the brothers replied. "Death doesn't matter. It's only a pity that dying here like this will reflect on Big Brother's prestige."

The three gazed at each other. Chests high, they waited for death.

The four bold gallants observed them and heard what they said. They exchanged glances. "That leader of theirs is clearly no lowly person," they remarked.

"Who are you, really?" Red Beard demanded. "What are your names?"

"If you're going to kill us, then kill us," Li Jun retorted. "Though we die, we're not going to tell you, lest we be shamed before the whole gallant fraternity!"

Convinced that the three were bold fellows like himself, Red Beard jumped up, cut their bonds and released them. The four escorted them into the hall and invited them to be seated. The leader kowtowed before them.

"We have been robbers all our lives," he said, "but we never have met such chivalrous men as you. Where are you from, gallant sirs? We would be pleased to learn your names."

"We can see that you four elder brothers must be bold fellows, so we'll tell you. Then you can take us wherever you wish," said Li Jun. "We are chieftains under Song Jiang of Liangshan Marsh. I am Li Jun the Turbulent River Dragon. These two are brothers—Tong Wei the Dragon from the Cave and Tong Meng the River Churning Clam. Our band has been amnestied by the imperial court. After breaking the Liao Tartars we returned to the capital and were ordered to destroy Fang La. If you are his men, you can turn us in and claim your rewards. We won't offer any resistance."

The four gallants promptly kowtowed. Kneeling, they said: "We have eyes but couldn't recognize Mount Taishan! Please forgive our rude blunder. We four have nothing to do with Fang La's bandits. Originally we were robbers in the forest, but now we live here in Willow Hamlet. On all sides are deep coves. No one can get in without a boat. Our fishing is only a pretext. Actually, we grab whatever we can on the lake. Last winter we learned how to swim, and now no one dares to interfere with us. We heard long ago that Song Jiang had gathered some of the boldest gallants under the sky in Liangshan Marsh. His name is well known. We've heard too about Zhang Shun the White Streak in the Waves. We never dreamed we'd meet you here today!"

"Zhang Shun is one of us," said Li Jun. "He also is a naval chieftain. Right now he's chasing bandits around Jiangyin. I'll introduce you to him. May we ask you four your names?"

"Because we were operating in the greenwood, they're kind of odd," said the leader. "Don't laugh! I'm Fei Bao the Red-Beard Dragon. This is Ni Yun the Curly-Haired Tiger, this is Pu Qing the Taihu Python, and that's Di Cheng the Thin-Faced Bear."

Li Jun was very pleased. "Now we need have no doubts about one another." And he explained: "Big Brother Song Jiang is vanguard general of an expedition against Fang La. He wants to take Suzhou but he has no plan. He's sent us three to spy out the terrain. If you four bold fellows will come with us to Song Jiang, I guarantee you'll be made officials. After we've finished Fang La, the emperor will raise you still higher."

"If we wanted positions, we could have become commanders under Fang La long ago," said Fei Bao. "But we seek only a free life, not rank. We'll go through fire and water if you need our help. But if you want to make us officials, we're not interested."

"In that case," said Li Jun, "how about pledging ourselves as blood brothers?"

The four bold fellows gladly agreed. They slaughtered a pig and a sheep, poured cups of wine, and vowed to consider Li Jun their elder brother. Li instructed Tong Wei and Tong Meng to make the same pledge to the others.

Li Jun told of Song Jiang's desire to take Suzhou. "But Fang Mao won't come out and fight," he said, "and the city is surrounded by water. There are no roads we can advance on, and the creeks are narrow and difficult to navigate. How can we break in?"

"Stay here and relax a couple of days, brother," Fei Bao advised. "Functionaries from Fang La in Hangzhou go to Suzhou often on government business. We can use this as a means of getting into the city. I'll send a few fishermen to inquire. If any Fang La people are en route, we can decide what to do next."

Li Jun agreed, Fei Bao sent off the fishermen, and the seven remained in the hamlet, chatting and drinking. Two or three days later, the fishermen returned and reported.

"In Pingwang Town there are about a dozen cargo vessels flying yellow banners from their stern which read Royal Armor. They're obviously from Hangzhou. Only six or seven people man each boat."

"This is our chance," said Li Jun. "We hope you brothers will help."

"Let's go," said Fei Bao.

"Don't worry," said Fei Bao. "We take full responsibility." Sixty or seventy small craft were gathered and set sail. The seven gallants sat in seven boats. Fishermen manned the others. All were laden with concealed weapons. The little vessels slipped from the creeks into the river, then spread out.

That night the moon and stars filled the sky. The ten government craft were moored neared the Dragon King Temple at the eastern end of the river. Fei Bao's boat got there first. He whistled shrilly, and the sixty-odd fishing craft closed in and affixed themselves to the government vessels.

Startled sailors rushed out of their cabins, only to be hooked by the grappling poles and tied up in batches of four or five. Those who jumped in the water were fished out and hauled on deck. The little craft pulled the big vessels into the lake, and across to Willow Hamlet.

By then it was the fourth watch. The batches of bound prisoners were weighted with big rocks and thrown into the lake and drowned. Questioning of the two leaders revealed that they were store-house keepers of Fang La's eldest son, Fang Tianding the Prince of Southern Peace. On his orders they had been delivering three thousand suits of armor to Fang Mao the Third Great Prince in Suzhou. Li Jun asked the leaders their names, confiscated their documents, then had them killed.

"Before we take any action, I must consult with Big Brother about this," he said.

"I'll have you ferried across," said Fei Bao. "We'd better sneak you through the creeks past the enemy positions." He directed two fishermen to take Li Jun in a fast boat.

"Conceal the captured vessels and armor in the creek behind the hamlet," he instructed Fei Bao and the Tong brothers. "Don't let anyone know about them."

"No problem," said Fei Bao. He went to attend to it personally.

Two fishermen, propelling a little craft through the creeks, conveyed Li Jun past the enemy positions. He disembarked at Icy Hill Monastery and returned to camp. He told Song Jiang what had happened. Wu Yong, also listening, was overjoyed.

"Capturing Suzhou will be as easy as spitting on your hands. Let Li Kui, Bao Xu, Xiang Chong and Li Gun take two hundred shield bearers and go to the hamlet on Taihu Lake. There they can work out a plan with Fei Bao and his three gallants. Tomorrow, they can go into action."

Li Jun crossed the lake with the two fishermen, got more boats, fetched Li Kui and the others, then proceeded to the hamlet and introduced the four chieftains to Fei Bao, who was somewhat startled by the appearance of the Black Whirlwind. He wined, and dined them, as well as the two hundred shield bearers.

The next day, after conferring, Fei Bao and Ni Yun dressed as the store-keepers of the armor, put on southern official uniforms, and pocketed their documents. The fishermen disguised themselves as sailors on the government boats. Li Kui and the two hundred shield bearers hid in the holds. Pu Qing and Di Cheng captained the rear vessel, which carried incendiary equipment.
They were about to sail when a fisherman came and announced: "A boat out there is zig-zagging across the lake."
"Something's up," exclaimed Li Jun. He hurried to have a look.
Two men were standing on the prow of the vessel—Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller and Ling Zhen the Heaven-Shaking Thunder. Li Jun whistled sharply, and the boat flew towards the hamlet. The two men came ashore.
"What brings you here? Is there any news?" asked Li Jun.
"In his rash to get Li Kui to you, Big Brother forgot something important," said Dai Zong. "He's dispatched me and Ling Zhen specially with a hundred cannon. We couldn't catch you when you were on the lake, and we didn't dare land on these unknown banks. He wants you to enter the city at dawn. Once you get in, fire the cannon as a signal."
"Perfect!" said Li Jun. He had the cannon barrels and carriages shifted over to his craft and concealed beneath the armor.
When Fei Bao heard that it was Dai Zong, he entertained him with food and wine. Ling Zhen and the ten gunners who had accompanied him hid themselves inside the third boat.
They sailed for Suzhou that night at the fourth watch. They arrived after the fifth. Soldiers on the walls, seeing the southern flags they flew, quickly reported. The official in charge of the gate was General Guo Shiguang the Flying Panther. He mounted the wall, questioned the commanding officer, and demanded the convoy's documents. They were hauled up and examined, then sent to the headquarters of the Third Great Prince for certification. Only after Guo posted observers below did he open the gate. But he also sent men down to inspect the boats. They reported that they were piled high with armor. Guo let them sail in, one by one, but when ten had entered he had the gate closed again.
An observer dispatched by the Third Great Prince arrived—an official accompanied by five hundred soldiers who took positions along the bank and moored the craft. Li Kui, Bao Xu, Xiang Chong and Li Gun emerged from the cabins. Their rough appearance startled the official, and he hastily inquired who they were.
By way of answer, Xiang Chong and Li Gun charged, with twirling shields. A sword flew, cutting the official down from his horse. Li Kui leaped ashore, swinging his axes. He ploughed into the five hundred soldiers, hacking chunks out of a dozen in a row. The others fled.
Two hundred shield bearers poured from the cabins and swarmed upon the shore. They began setting fires. Ling Zhen positioned his gun carriages, mounted the barrels, and loosed a dozen in a volley that rocked the tower on the wall. From 4 sides, attackers closed in on the city. Fang Mao the Third Great Prince, planning in his palace, nearly jumped out of his skin at the sound of the signal cannon. Commanders guarding the various gates rushed with their men towards where the salvoes were thundering without cease. From all of the gates came the report: "Snipers' arrows are mowing down our men! Song soldiers are already on the walls!"
Suzhou was thrown into a turmoil. No one knew how many Song troops had got in. Li Kui the Black Whirlwind and Bao Xu were tearing around the city with two shield bearers slaughtering southern soldiers. Ling Zhen, protected by Li Jun, Dai Zong and the four bold rustics, continued to fire his cannons. Song Jiang sent all three columns against Suzhou. As these fought their way in, the southern troops scattered and fled for their lives. The Third Great Prince hastily donned his armor and mounted his horse. With 600 or 700 armored troops he attempted to break out of the South Gate. But he bumped into Li Kui and his cohorts, who wreaked havoc among them. The Southerners broke and ran, at a moment when Lu Zhishen barged out of a lane, brandishing his iron staff. Fang Mao knew he couldn't resist. He turned his steed and galloped back towards his palace. But Wu Song suddenly emerged from beneath Raven Bridge, chopped the animal's leg with his sword, and brought the prince tumbling to the ground. Another swing cut off Fang Mao's head. Wu Song presented his trophy to Song Jiang in his new headquarters in the prince's palace. The order was to destroy the southern army and capture as many of the foe as possible. Only Liu Yun managed to get away. With some remnant troops, he fled towards Xiuzhou. Seated in the palace, Song Jiang ordered a halt to the killing of civilians and directed his men to put out the fires. He also issued a proclamation reassuring the populace. Then he summoned his chieftains to the palace to claim their rewards. He already knew that Wu Song had slain Fang Mao, Zhu Tong had caught Xu Fang, Shi Jin had captured Zhen Cheng, Sun Li had killed Zhang Wei with his staff, Li Jun had run Chang Sheng through with his lance, and Fan Rui had destroyed Wu Fu. Xuan Zan and Guo Shiguang had inflicted such grievous wounds on each other that both had died beneath Horse Watering Bridge. Many subordinate enemy officers had been made prisoner, and their captors also came forward, seeking recognition. Song Jiang directed that Xuan Zan's body be laid in a fine coffin with full mourning decorations and that he be buried at the foot of Tiger Mound Hill. The head of Fang Mao and the prisoners Xu Fang and Zhen Cheng were sent to Changzhou for disposition by Governor Zhang. The governor had the 2 captives sliced to pieces in the public square. Fang Mao's head was dispatched to the capital. Substantial rewards were sent to Suzhou for distribution among the commanders. Zhang then issued an order that Deputy District Commander Liu take over control of Suzhou and that Song Jiang continue with his expedition against the rebels. Before long, a mounted scout arrived in Suzhou with the news: "Deputy District Commander Liu and staff officer Geng are here to assume command." Song Jiang and his chieftains went out to greet them and escort them into the city. They were moved into the palace and formally congratulated. In the prefecture office, Song Jiang conferred with his chieftains. He dispatched scouts to learn what progress his navy was making along the coast. They returned and reported that when the rebel officials in the coastal counties heard that Suzhou had fallen, they had scattered and fled, and that in these counties all was now peaceful. Very pleased, Song Jiang reported the victory in writing to the Central Army and requested the governor to restore all former Song officials to their posts. He then ordered various commanders to take over control of the captured coastal counties and let the naval chieftains who had been holding them return to Suzhou. Within a few days, this was done. The naval chieftains told Song Jiang that when the three Ruan brothers attacked Changshu, Shi En had been lost. Kong Liang died in the assault on Kunshan. Neither of them knew how to swim, and each had fallen into the water and drowned. Shi Xiu, Li Ying the others had all come back. Another two chieftains gone. Very unhappy, Song Jiang sighed without end. Fei Bao and his three gallant companions came to bid him farewell. They were leaving for home. When his pleas that they stay proved in vain, he rewarded them and instructed Li Jun to escort them to Willow Hamlet. With Tong Wei and Tong Meng, Li Jun saw them home, and there the four bold rustics wined and dined the three chieftains. Fei Bao rose and, handing a cup of wine to Li Jun, said a few words. And as a result, Li Jun's fame spread across the seas, his name was known throughout the world. He became king of a foreign land, but never encroached upon the borders of China. Truly, realizing its fate the toad sloughs off its skin, performing great deeds a fish becomes a dragon.

The other leaders rushed to revive Song Jiang and after what seemed an age he came to and said to the Professor: "I fear that we are not going to prevail over Fang La. Ever since we crossed the river we have suffered misfortune. One after the other, we have lost eight of our brothers."
The Professor tried to rally him: "Do not speak like this or you will ruin our morale. Before, when we defeated the Tartars, we all returned safely and that was all according to heaven's plan. If this time some of our brothers have died, it simply means that they have completed their allotted span. You can't deny that since we crossed the river we have captured three important cities: Runzhou, Changzhou and Xuanzhou. Clearly this is due to the Emperor's standing with heaven and your reputation. Who says our cause does not prosper? You have no reason for this despondency."
Song Jiang said: "Of course it is heaven's will, yet still I think of the one hundred and eight, come together in correspondence with the heavenly stars and according to what was inscribed on the celestial tablet. We are close to one another as hand and foot. How can I not grieve when I hear such terrible news?"
The Professor insisted: "Stop worrying about it. You will only do yourself injury. Please think about how to send reinforcements to attack their Marshal Lü in Wuxi."
Song Jiang said: "Leave Mr. Chai to keep me company. Write out another order for Magic Messenger to take to the Unicorn asking him to attack Huzhou and then unite with us again as soon as possible in Hangzhou."
The Professor got Sterling to write out the order and sent Magic Messenger to Xuanzhou with it. Of this no more.
Meanwhile Fang La's Marshal Lü and Xu Ding had retreated to Wuxi where they met up with the reinforcements sent by Third Prince Fang Mao from Suzhou. These were under a senior general called Wei Zhong with ten lieutenants and a thousand men. They had been sent to relieve Changzhou but now joined in the defence of Wuxi. Marshal Lü explained how Jin Jie had delivered Changzhou to the enemy. Wei Zhong said: "You may rest easy, Marshal. I am going to get the city back for you."
At this very moment a scout reported: "The Song army is approaching. We need to prepare."
Wei Zhong rode out of the north gate at the head of his troops to encounter the enemy. They saw a huge Song force bearing down on them, led by Iron Ox, together with Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost. Wei Zhong's spirits quailed and before they had even had time to form up his troops began to run. As they scurried back into Wuxi, the four foremost pursuers rushed into the town behind them. Marshal Lü fled through the south gate. Scimitar occupied the town. Wei Zhong and Xu Ding also made it out through the south gate and returned to Suzhou. Scimitar and his men now had Wuxi and sent a messenger to Song Jiang to report the fact. Song Jiang and the other leaders came to Wuxi and issued a proclamation reassuring the people and accepting them as loyal citizens. The army was stationed there and a message was sent requesting Marshal Zhang and his deputy to take over the defence of Changzhou.
Meanwhile Marshal Lü with Wei Zhong and Xu Ding had taken the remnants of their beaten army back to Suzhou to request help from the Third Prince, explaining that the Song forces were too strong for them and telling how his troops had been rolled back like a mat and the city lost. The Prince flew into a passion and ordered his military council to strip Lü of his command and execute him. But Wei Zhong and the others protested, saying: "Song Jiang's commanders are all battle-hardened, bold and skilful warriors. What's more, his soldiers are bandits from Mount Liang, well versed in fighting. It makes them extremely hard to defeat."
"I will suspend the sentence, then," said the Prince. "You can have five thousand men to spearhead an attack. I will command the main force myself and follow on behind you."
Lü prostrated himself in thanks. Then he put on full armour and grasping his long serpent lance rode out of the city.
The Third Prince mustered eight generals, all strong well-built men with plenty of battle experience. He put on his armour, grasped his square halberd, mounted his horse and after inspecting his troops advanced to do battle. With the eight generals riding in front, and twenty or thirty subalterns with fifty thousand southern troops drawn up in orderly ranks behind, he rode out through the palace gates to encounter Song Jiang.
By the time the vanguard under Marshal Lü, followed by Wei Zhong and Xu Ding, had passed the Temple on Cold Mountain and were approaching Wuxi, Song Jiang had received reports from his scouts and with some of his junior commanders had moved troops a few miles in front of the town. The two armies confronted each other, banners waving and drums sounding, drawn up in battle formation. Marshal Lü, boiling with anger, settled himself on his horse, took a firm grip on his lance and rode forward to challenge Song Jiang. Song Jiang in response turned and asked his commanders: "Which of you will capture that bandit for me?"
He had hardly finished when the Spearsman, firmly grasping his gold lance and settling himself on his horse, rode forward and engaged Marshal Lü. A shout went up on either side as the spears clashed. They fought more than twenty bouts. Then Marshal Lü parried and Spearsman's lance came in under his guard and knocked him from his horse. A roar went up from both armies. Iron Ox with his axes, Pluto with his javelins, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost with their barbed shields rushed forward, throwing the southern contingent into utter confusion.
Song Jiang's army now met the Third Prince's troops head on. There was an exchange of arrows as both armies formed up for battle. On the southern side the eight commanders were drawn up in line. The Prince in the centre heard that Marshal Lü had been killed and was enraged. He rode out in front and abused Song Jiang: "To me you are just a bunch of burners and looters, bandits from Mount Liang. The luckless court made you a general and told you to invade our land. Well, I'm going to teach you a lesson, when I've finished with you you'll know what fighting really is!"
Song Jiang pointed and said contemptuously: "And you're just a bunch of peasants! What makes you think you have a destiny? You a ruler? What a hope! Why not surrender right away and save your life? We are the imperial army! I'm going to finish you off, or I vow never to fight again."
The Prince roared: "I'm not going to waste my breath on you. I've got eight brave commanders here. Have you got eight you'd dare to pit against them?"
Song Jiang laughed scornfully: "I could certainly find two for each one of yours, but it wouldn't be honourable. Send out your eight and I'll send out eight of mine. We'll compare our fighting skills and see who comes off best. But let the rules be these: anyone who loses his mount shall be taken back to his own ranks, there are to be no snipers with arrows and no body snatching. If there is no clear victory, it must not degenerate into a brawl: the contest will be renewed tomorrow."
Fang Mao sent out his eight commanders, armed and mounted. Song Jiang said to his champions: "Hand over your commands before you go out to fight." Barely had he finished speaking when the eight rode forth. They were Scimitar, Colonel Hua, Spearsman, Thunderclap, Whiskers, Tamer, Colonel Sun and Hound. The pennants gates opened right and left to let them through. The drums set up a rapid rhythm on either side, while flags of many colours were waved and signal rockets sent up. With both armies shouting encouragement the sixteen met, each seeking out his own opponent and falling on him.
All the sixteen were brave men and they fought with great determination. After thirty bouts, one of them fell head over heels from his horse. Who was the unlucky one? It was the southerner Gou Zheng, whom Whiskers with a thrust of his spear had knocked from his horse. Gongs sounded on either side and the other seven pairs of contestants separated and returned to their own ranks.
When Fang Mao saw that he had lost one of his commanders, he felt things would go against him and withdrew with his army into Suzhou. Song Jiang urged his men forward and made camp close to the Temple on Cold Mountain. He rewarded Whiskers with promotion. Sterling wrote out a despatch which was sent to Marshal Zhang. Of this no more.
The Prince fortified himself in the city. He ordered his leaders to strengthen the defences on all the gates, setting out deer's antlers, positioning ballistas and crossbows on the walls, with a good supply of explosives and missiles, molten metal stored under an awning and bottles of acid on the battlements, in preparation for a dogged defence of the city.
When the southern army did not sally forth next day, Song Jiang took Colonel Hua, Spearsman, Tamer and Colonel Sun together with thirty horsemen to observe the city. He found that all round Suzhou on the outskirts was a mass of waterways and the walls of the city itself were solid. "This city won't fall to us in a hurry," he thought. He went back to the camp and discussed with the Professor a plan of attack. Some one came and reported: "The boat leader White-Water Dragon is here from Jiangyin to see you, sir."
Song Jiang had him brought in and asked what the news was from the coast. White-Water Dragon replied: "Since I was put in charge of the water-borne forces with Madcap, we have attacked the islands of Jiangyin and Taicang and other places down the coast. When their commander sailed out to oppose us, he was knocked into the sea by a spear thrust from Ruan the Seventh and his lieutenant died in a salvo of arrows. So we were able to take those two places. On the same day Madcap, the Pilot and White Eel took Jiading and the Ruan brothers took Changshu. This is what I came to tell you."
Song Jiang was excited by this news. He rewarded the White-Water Dragon and sent him off to report to Marshal Zhang and his second-in-command. White-Water Dragon went off to Chang-zhou and gave a detailed report on the taking of the two islands, and the killing of two enemy commanders. The Marshal rewarded him handsomely and sent him back to Song Jiang for further orders.
Since Suzhou was surrounded by wide expanses of water, Song Jiang realized he needed to launch a water-borne attack and retained White-Water Dragon for this purpose. He wanted boats to be prepared, ready for sailing. White-Water Dragon said: "Let me go and check the width of the channel and see how we can use our forces. When I come back we can make our plan." Song Jiang assented.
White-Water Dragon was gone two days. When he came back he said: "Just to the south of the city is Lake Tai. What we want is a small boat that can enter the Yixing channel and secretly pass into Lake Tai and thence to Wujiang to get intelligence of the southerners before we advance."
"Very well, only you need another leader to go with you," said Song Jiang. He ordered Skyhawk, together with Red Star, Comet, the Young Master and Uglymug to the coast to help the water-borne forces and replace the Tong brothers, Cave Dragon and River Rider, who were needed to assist White-Water Dragon. Skyhawk with these orders departed for the island of Jiangyin. Within two days the Tong brothers arrived and Song Jiang explained tactfully that they were needed to help White-Water Dragon carry out an important spying mission by boat.
So White-Water Dragon and the two Tongs set off in a light boat with two sailors to row. They rowed into the narrow channel at Yixing and after many twists and turns came out into Lake Tai. What met their eyes was a vast expanse of water, like a great sheet of jade:
Sky and water merge in the distance, the water seeming to rise into the sky; all around is water, not a speck of land to be seen, everywhere sky and water are of uniform brightness. The water's clear mirror is broken only by the reflections of egrets flying by in pairs; the perfection of the empyrean is shattered only by the gulls that soar heavenwards two by two. When the lake is a-glitter with spring, its wavelets shimmer like fish scales; swollen by summer's downpours, its billows challenge heaven; immaculate with autumn moonshine, it unfurls a golden path; dusted with winter snow, it fills the world with reflected light. When primeval chaos was first resolved, the water god appropriated this crystal mansion to himself.
As the poet says:

Over the vastness the seagulls float;
Green spring's the time to dye your clothes;
Going to and fro men wear themselves out;
At sundown it's time to head for home.

As they were rowing across the lake and drawing near to Wujiang they saw a flotilla of fishing boats, forty or fifty of them. "Let's pretend we want to buy fish," said the White-Water Dragon. "We can get some information out of them." They rowed closer, and he shouted out: "Have you got any big carp there?"
The fishermen answered: "If it's big carp you want, you'd better come home with us and we'll sell you some."
They followed the fishing boats and before long they came to a place all surrounded by twisted willow trees. Enclosed within a bamboo fence were some twenty or so houses. The fishermen first moored their boat, then helped the three leaders ashore and took them into a compound. The moment they stepped inside, seven or eight big fellows gave a loud shout and pinning them down with hooks dragged them into the house. Without a word of explanation they tied them to a wooden pillar.
They found themselves in a thatched hall where four bold buccaneers were seated. The chief of them had a reddish beard and whiskers and wore a robe with blue sleeves. The second was tall and thin, with a short beard and dressed in a dark green robe with a round collar; the third was dark with long whiskers and the fourth had a bony face with high cheekbones and a round beard. These last two were dressed alike in padded robes with blue sleeves. They all wore black felt hats and carried weapons. The leader shouted at White-Water Dragon: "Where are you lot from? What're you doing here on our lake?"
"We're from Yangzhou," he answered. "We came here to trade. We want to buy fish."
The one with the bony face said: "No point in asking 'em questions, brother. They're obviously spies. Just whip their hearts and livers out; we'll have'em with our wine."
"After all those years as smuggler on the Xunyang River," White-Water Dragon was thinking to himself, "and a good while too as outlaw on Mount Liang, who would have thought I'd end my days here! Well, well, well!" He sighed and exchanged a look with the other two. "I'm to blame for getting you into this mess. I've turned you into ghosts!" he said. "There's only one way to go now."
"Don't talk like that, brother," they said. "We don't mind dying. It's only that dying like this is an insult to the Leader's name." Looking about them, they held their heads high and waited for death.
After hearing their talk, the four fishermen looked at each other and said: "This leader of theirs must be someone out of the ordinary!"
"What sort of people are you then?" the chief asked. "Can't you reveal your names to us? We'd really like to know."
"Go ahead and kill us, if you're going to," White-Water Dragon said. "We'll die sooner than tell our names. We don't want to be a laughing-stock!"
At this the chief of the fishermen jumped up and cut their bonds with a knife, releasing them all. He and the other three raised them up and invited them to sit in an inner room. Then he prostrated himself and said: "We're robbers and we've been around, but I've never seen men with such spirit as you! Please tell us where you are from. We really want to know your names!"
"You are obviously brave fellows," said White-Water Dragon. "So I'll tell you, and afterwards you can do what you like with us. We all serve under Song Jiang of Mount Liang. I am the White-Water Dragon and these two friends of mine are Cave Dragon and River Rider. We have been pardoned by the Emperor; recently we defeated the Liao Tartars, and after we returned to the capital we were given the task of capturing Fang La. If you serve Fang La, you'd better hand us over and get the reward. We won't put up any resistance."
When the fishermen heard this, they kowtowed again, and still kneeling said in chorus: "We couldn't see what was in front of our noses. We treated you disgracefully! Forgive us, please forgive us! We certainly don't serve Fang La. We chose to seek our living in the greenwood long ago. Now we've ended up in this place, which is known as Willow Farm. There are hidden channels all around, but no boat can get in. We just use fishing as a cover, so we can make a living on the lake. This last winter we've learnt a bit about fighting on the water, that's why no one wants to meddle with us. We have long heard how Song Jiang of the Marshes of Mount Liang seeks out good men. We have also heard of you, and of a certain White Eel. We had no idea we were going to meet you here!"
"White Eel is my friend, and my comrade in the water-borne forces. At present he is in Jiangyin, arresting rebels. Another time I'll bring him here so you can make his acquaintance. May I ask your names?"
"Because we're of the greenwood, we all have nicknames. Please don't laugh! I am Red, this is Curly, that's Shark, and the last is Bony."
"There's nothing more to worry about then, gentlemen," said White-Water Dragon approvingly. "It's good to know we're all members of the same family! Our leader, Song Jiang has been made commander of the expeditionary force against Fang La. His present aim is to capture Suzhou and before deciding how to go about it he sent us three out on reconnaissance. Now we have met you, you can come with us to see the Leader. He's sure to take you on and after we capture Fang La the court will give you advancement."
"With all due respect," said Red, "if we were ambitious for office, we could have been generals under Fang La years ago. Fact is we don't want to serve. All we want is a merry life. If you need our help, we'll go through fire and water for you. But if you're offering us official posts, all I can say is we don't want 'em."
"In that case let us just declare ourselves blood brothers, how about that?"
The four fishermen were well pleased with this suggestion, and had a pig and a goat slaughtered and wine brought for a celebration, as they and White-Water Dragon swore an oath of loyalty as brothers. Cave Dragon and River Rider followed suit.

The seven at Willow Farm discussed the problem of capturing Suzhou. They agreed that the Third Prince would not come out to fight. The city was surrounded on all sides by water and there was no way to attack it. The channel was so narrow it could hardly be attacked by boats. How would they ever take the city? Red said: "Stay here for a couple of days and rest. From time to time one of Fang La's people from Hangzhou comes to Suzhou on official business. That could be our chance to capture the city. I'll get up a group of fishermen and send them out to do some spying. When we hear that someone is coming we can make a plan."
"That's a great idea," said White-Water Dragon.
Red sent some of the fishermen off on their mission, while he entertained his guests with wine at the farm. After several days of this, the fishermen returned and said: "A dozen or so cargo boats have appeared at Pingwang all with yellow flags at the stern bearing the words 'Royal uniforms'. They've obviously been sent from Hangzhou. There's only half a dozen men on each."
"This is our chance," said White-Water Dragon. "I hope you're all going to help."
"We'll start right away," said Red.
"If just one of the boats gets away, the whole plan will be ruined," said White-Water Dragon.
"Don't you worry. I'll take care of it," said Red. He assembled sixty or seventy fishing boats. Each of the leaders was to go in one. Fishermen would be in the others, all with hidden weapons. They crept out of the small channels into the main river, spread themselves out and advanced.
That night the moon and stars were bright as the ten official transports anchored in the east river in front of the Temple of the Dragon Lord. Red's boat reached them first. A sharp whistle was the signal and sixty or seventy fishing boats approached and grappled the bigger vessels. On the transports men rushed up on deck and were pinned down with hooks and then tied together in bunches of five or six. Some jumped into the water and were hooked and dragged aboard again. The small boats now had control of the transports and sailed away with them to distant parts of the lake. In the fourth watch they all reached Willow Farm.
Most of the enemy personnel, bound together with ropes, had big stones attached to them and were thrown into the lake to drown. The two commanders were retained for questioning. They turned out to be officers of Fang La's treasury in Hangzhou, bearing an official order and charged with delivering three thousand suits of new iron armour for the Third Prince in Suzhou. White-Water Dragon got their names and a set of official papers out of them and then they were killed. "I must go and discuss this with the Leader," he said. "And then we can finish the job."
Red said: "I will tell some of my people to take you. I think you had better go by the small channels." Two of the fishermen were ordered to row White-Water Dragon back in a light boat. White-Water Dragon told Cave Dragon, River Rider and the others the government transports must be hidden carefully in the small channels at the back of the farm and no one allowed to see them. "No problem," said Red. He went off himself to deal with the boats.
So White-Water Dragon with the two sailors travelling by small channels in their light boat arrived at the Temple on Cold Mountain and went ashore. He went to the camp and gave Song Jiang a detailed account of the preceding events. "Then Suzhou is ours!" said the Professor triumphantly. "You must give orders for Iron Ox, Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost with two hundred shield-bearers to return with White-Water Dragon to the farm on Lake Tai, where they are to make joint plans with this fellow Red and his comrades and launch an attack a day later."
Equipped with these orders White-Water Dragon and his companions went back to Lake Tai. On the way they picked up Iron Ox and his group and escorted them to Willow Farm, where White-Water Dragon introduced them all to the fishermen. Red had quite a shock when he saw what Iron Ox looked like. Two hundred or more were treated to wine at the farm. On the third day, as they had planned, Red disguised himself as the treasury official in charge of the armour, with Curly as his lieutenant. They put on southern uniforms and took the official documents with them. The fishermen were disguised as sailors manning the transports and Iron Ox and his companions were hidden in the holds of the vessels. Shark and Bony were in charge of the last boats, which carried combustible materials. Just when they were about to start a fisherman came and reported: "There's a boat out on the lake that keeps going to and fro."
"That sounds very odd," said White-Water Dragon. He hurriedly went to see for himself. At the prow of the boat stood two men. They were Magic Messenger and Thunderer. White-Water Dragon let out a loud whistle and the boat shot towards them. "What are you doing here?" asked White-Water Dragon when they had come ashore and been introduced.
"The Leader sent Iron Ox off in a hurry," said Magic Messenger. "He forgot something important. We've been sent here with a hundred signal rockets. We missed him out on the lake and we were scared to come in close to shore. The rockets are to be set off tomorrow morning when you get inside the city."
"Good!" said White-Water Dragon, and had the rockets transferred to the boats with the armour and stowed away.
When Red heard this was Magic Messenger he called for more wine to entertain them.
Thunderer was hidden away inside the third boat with ten rockets. That night in the fourth watch they set sail from Willow Farm and steered for Suzhou. By the end of the fifth watch they were close to the city walls. When they saw the southern flag the guards on the walls hurriedly reported to the guard commander, Guo Shiguang, who came up onto the walls himself. He asked for a full report and had the documents sent up so he could examine them. He sent someone to report it all to the Third Prince's office. The documents were scrutinized and then someone was sent down to the boats to inspect them. Finally they were allowed into the city. Guo himself was sitting on a chair beside the water-gate and he ordered a further inspection. The boats were found to be stuffed with armour so one by one they were allowed to enter. When all ten had been allowed through, the water-gate was closed again. The Third Prince's inspector with five hundred men had now arrived on the bank. He ordered the boats to tie up. Iron Ox and his companions now made their appearance. The inspector was struck by the ugly look of these four and hurriedly asked who they were. But by this time Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost were already waving their barbed shields and firing off javelins. The inspector was knocked from his horse and when the five hundred troops tried to board the vessels Iron Ox leapt ashore with his two axes and cut down a dozen of them. The rest fled.
The others on the boats, including the two hundred shield-bearers, now came ashore and began starting fires. Thunderer set up his gun and started sending off signal rockets. He sent off ten in a row. The explosions shook the city towers. Fighting broke out everywhere. The Third Prince was holding a meeting in the government office when he heard the explosions and was so frightened his spirit nearly left his body. The guard commanders on all the gates, when they heard these incessant explosions, rushed back into the city centre. The rumour began to fly about that the army commander had been killed by a stray arrow and Song troops were already inside the city. Suzhou by now was in a ferment. No one could say how many Song troops had entered. Iron Ox and Pluto were charging all over the place with the two shield-bearers killing the southern troops. White-Water Dragon and Magic Messenger together with Red and company were guarding Thunderer as he busied himself with his rockets. Song Jiang had already detailed three army columns to take the city. As these rushed in the southern troops scattered before them and fled for their lives.
The Third Prince hurriedly put on armour and with a few hundred armoured troops was trying to force a way out through the south gate when he ran into Iron Ox and his gang, who set about the armoured troops and had them running in all directions. Monk also emerged from an alley, heaving his steel staff. The Third Prince could put up no resistance. He galloped back alone to the government office. From under the Magpie Bridge Pilgrim emerged and hacked at the horse's legs. One blow of his sword brought Third Prince crashing to the ground, and a second removed his head.
Pilgrim took the head back to the army to show Song Jiang and ask for his reward. Song Jiang was already in the city, sitting in the Prince's office. He ordered all the leaders to go round the town, search out, and kill the southern troops. Almost all were taken. Only one of their commanders got away, together with a beaten remnant of the army, and went to Xiuzhou.

Song Jiang went to sit in the Prince's office and issued orders that honest citizens and the ordinary people were not to be harmed and the fires everywhere were to be put out. He also issued a proclamation for military and civilians. He then summoned his commanders to the palace to receive their rewards. It became known that Pilgrim had killed the Prince, Whiskers had taken one commander alive and the Tattooed Dragon had captured another, Colonel Sun had killed a third with his rods, White-Water Dragon had killed a fourth with a spear thrust, Demon King had killed a fifth. The Ugly Son-in-Law had fought a ferocious duel with the garrison commander, Guo Shiguang, in which the two men mortally wounded each other and died under Horse-Watering Bridge. The rest had all captured junior officers and came to make their claims.
Song Jiang was sorely grieved by the loss of the Ugly Son-in-Law and sent someone to arrange the encoffining and burial at Tiger Mound Hill. The Third Prince's head and the two captives were sent to Marshal Zhang's headquarters in Changzhou to show justice having been done. Marshal Zhang had the prisoners hacked to pieces in the marketplace and sent the Third Prince's head to the capital. He sent a considerable supply of wealth to Suzhou to reward the army and issued an order requesting his deputy, Liu Guangshi, to fortify Suzhou and commanding Song Jiang to continue the campaign and capture all the rebels.
A mounted scout reported the arrival of General Liu and another officer to take over the government of Suzhou. All the leaders went with Song Jiang to welcome the General and his retinue to the city and take them to stay in the Prince's palace. After these ceremonies, Song Jiang and his leaders held a meeting. Scouts were sent to obtain news of the water-borne forces on the coast. It was reported that in all the places along the coast, when they heard Suzhou had fallen, the rebels had fled and that all the coastal districts were now peaceful. Song Jiang was delighted, and sent a report to headquarters, requesting Marshal Zhang to reappoint all the former officials and detail more troops to every district to protect the people so that all his water-borne forces could be withdrawn and brought back to Suzhou for further duties.
Within a few days all former officials had gone to their posts and the water-borne leaders were all back with the main force in Suzhou. They heard how the three Ruan brothers had lost the Young Master in the attack on Changshu and Red Star in the later attack on Kunshan. Madcap, Skyhawk and their group had all returned safely. The Young Master and Red Star did not know how to swim so when they fell in the water they drowned.
Song Jiang's heart was heavy when he learned that he had lost three more comrades. His sighs were endless. Pilgrim also wept when he thought of former times and the close ties between them all.
Red and his friends now wanted to return home and came to say goodbye. Song Jiang tried his hardest to make them stay, but to no avail. When they had been rewarded, White-Water Dragon was instructed to escort them back to Willow Farm. Cave Dragon and River Rider went with him, and on arrival the fishermen regaled them with wine. While they were drinking Red rose to his feet to toast White-Water Dragon and made a short speech, which was to have no small effect: White-Water Dragon was to leave the Central Plain and set up a base overseas. Truly it is the case that

Fei Bao said to Li Jun: "I'm a crude stupid fellow, but I've heard clever persons say: 'One must have failures as well as successes, one must have sorrow as well as joy.' You've built a career in Liangshan Marsh in a score or more years, winning every battle, and when you defeated the Liao Tartars you lost none of your brothers. But now you're going against Fang La, and clearly your vitality is crumbling. You won't be able to last much longer.
"Why am I not willing to become an official or general? Because once peace is restored, there would be one person after another trying to take my life. As the old saying goes: 'In order to keep the peace, the general himself can have no peace.' That's very well put. We four and you three have pledged ourselves blood brothers. Why not, while the tide is still with us, find a quiet refuge? Let's put some money together, buy a large boat, hire a few sailors, and search the rivers and seas for a good place to settle down and live out the rest of our lives. What could be sweeter?"
Li Jun bowed and replied: "Your words are most enlightening, brother. What you suggest would indeed be fine. It's just that we still haven't beaten Fang La. I can't cast aside my obligation to Song Jiang. It isn't time yet for me to leave. If I were to go with you today, I'd be violating my chivalrous duties. If you're willing to wait until we've conquered Fang La, I and my two brothers will gladly join you. You can start preparing now. Heaven crush me if I go back on my word! I'll be no real man!"
"We'll make arrangements about the boat," the rustic gallants said. "We'll be looking forward to your arrival, brother. Don't disappoint us!" Li Jun and Fei Bao sealed their pact with wine. All vowed to carry it out scrupulously.
The next day, Li Jun said good-bye to the four, and with the Tong brothers went back to Song Jiang. He told him they had no desire to become officials—they felt they would be happier remaining fisherman. Song Jiang sighed, then went on readying his land and naval forces for the offensive. Wujiang County was already free of rebels, and the Song forces had taken Pingwang Town. They set out now for a drive on Xiuzhou Prefecture.
Duan Kai, the general responsible for its defense, had learned that Fang Mao the Third Great Prince had been killed in Suzhou, and his only thought was to wind things up and leave. When he heard that the main Song army was already not far from the city, and saw in the distance the advancing banners blocking out the sun on land and water in a combined operation of boats and cavalry, he was scared stiff. The vanguard under Guan Sheng and Qin Ming had reached the city walls, and their naval vessels were closing in on the West Gate.
"You needn't attack," he called from the ramparts. "We will surrender." And he ordered that the gates be opened.
He directed that Song Jiang be welcomed with sheep and wine, and conducted him, amid burning incense and flowery lanterns, to the prefectural center. Duan Kai was the first to present himself. Song Jiang promised him that he would be considered a good official, and issued proclamations reassuring the local populace.
"I originally was a law-abiding citizen of Muzhou Prefecture," said Duan Kai. "But I was repeatedly oppressed by Fang La, and was compelled to serve under him. Today the Celestial Army has arrived. I wouldn't dream of not submitting." People like Duan Kai realized the Heavenly destiny of the Song Dynasty.
"Who is defending the city of Hangzhou in the Ninghai Military District?" Song Jiang asked him. "How many effectives has he?"
"Hangzhou covers a wide area, and is densely populated. North and east is dry land, the river is on the south, to the west is the lake. It's held by Fang La's son Fang Tianding the Prince of Southern Peace. He commands an army of more than seventy thousand, and has twenty-four generals and four marshals—a total of twenty-eight.
"Two of them are especially formidable. One is a monk from Shezhou, known as the Buddha of Precious Light. His original name was Deng Yuanjue. He wields an iron Buddhist staff weighing over fifty catties. Everyone calls him 'National Advisor.'
"The other, Shi Bao, comes from Fuzhou. His weapon is a comet hammer, and when he throws it, he never misses. He also has a fine sword called the Wind Splitter. It can cut bronze and iron. Even three layers of armor the Wind Splitter slices right through.
"The remaining twenty-six are all selected generals, all extremely tough and courageous. You mustn't underestimate this foe, Excellency."
Song Jiang rewarded Duan Kai, and ordered him to report these matters to Governor Zhang. Later on, Duan Kai marched with the governor's army and took part in the defense of Suzhou. Deputy District Commander Liu Guangshi was made military governor of Xiuzhou. Now, Song Jiang shifted his troops to the village of Zuili Pavilion and established a base.
After banqueting and rewarding the chieftains, he discussed with them the attack on Hangzhou. Chai Jin the Small Whirlwind rose to speak.
"Ever since you rescued me in Gaotang Prefecture, you have lavished your affection on me and given me undeserved honors," he said to Song Jiang. "So far, due to my own weak fate and personal inadequacies, I have not been able to requite this benevolence. I would like, today, to penetrate into Fang La's lair as a spy. If I can perform with merit I will be of service to the throne and will reflect honor on you, brother, at the same time. I wonder whether you will permit me to try?"
Song Jiang was very pleased. "If you can learn the enemy's internal situation we shall be able to attack and capture the chief bandit Fang La, deliver him to the capital and, for this small achievement, share in the honors. But I'm afraid the task may be too much of a hardship, brother."
"What of it? The possibility of death doesn't daunt me. My only request is that Yan Qing go with me. He knows the local dialects and is quick to seize opportunities."
"Of course, brother. Yan Qing is with Lu Junyi's forces at the moment. I'll dispatch an order for him to come at once."
Just then someone announced: "General Lu's special emissary Yan Qing has arrived to report a victory."
"You're sure to succeed, brother," Song Jiang said happily to Chai Jin. "He's come precisely when we need him. It's a good omen."
Chai Jin, too, was delighted.
Yati Qing entered the tent and respectfully greeted Song Jiang. They welcomed him with food and wine.
"Have you come by land or water, brother?" he was asked.
"By boat," he replied.
"Dai Zong told us you were attacking Huzhou. How is it going?" Song Jiang queried.
"After leaving Xuanzhou, General Lu divided his forces into two," said Yan Qing. "Half went with the vanguard against Huzhou. They killed the puppet garrison head Gong Wen and five of his sub-commanders and took the city. They destroyed and dispersed the enemy troops, reassured the populace, and dispatched a written report to Governor Zhang requesting that he send a prefect to take control for the crown. I was ordered to report the news to you. The other half, under Lin Chong, was ordered to capture Lone Pine Pass, then join us for the Hangzhou offensive. I've heard that they're fighting every day along the road to the pass, but they haven't been able to take it. General Lu and Zhu Wu have gone personally to assume command, leaving General Huyan to hold Huzhou until the governor sends a prefect. Then he is to attack and take Deqing County, before joining the offensive against Hangzhou."
"How many chieftains are involved in these campaigns? Can you tell me the names?"
"Twenty-three have gone for the assault on Long Pine Pass," Yan Qing replied. "They are Lu Junyi, Zhu Wu, Lin Chong, Dong Ping, Zhang Qin, Xie Zhen, Xie Bao, Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, Ou Peng, Deng Fei, Li Zhong, Zhou Tong, Zou Yuan, Zou Run, Sun Xin, Gu Dasao, LiLi, Bai Sheng, Tang Long, Zhu Gui, Zhu Fu and Shi Qian.
"Nineteen, including Huyan Zhuo, are to hold Huzhou the moment and later attack Deqing County. They are Huyan Zhuo, Suo Chao, Mu Hong, Lei Heng, Yang Xiong, Liu Tang, Shan Tinggui, Wei Dingguo, Chen Da, Yang Chun, Xue Yong, Du Qian, Mu Chun, Li Yun, Shi Yong, Gong Wang, Ding Desun, Zhang Qing and Sun Erniang.
"When I left the actions were already being carried out."
"Dividing the force into two, under the circumstances, is obviously the best method. Lord Chai Jin has asked that you go with him into Fang La's territory and gather intelligence. Are you willing?"
"Certainly, if that is your wish, Commander-in-Chief." Pleased, Chai Jin said: "I will dress as a white-robed minor scholar. You disguise yourself as my servant. We'll stroll along carrying a lute, a sword, and a bag of books. Master and man—no one will suspect us. At the coast we'll find a boat and sail past Yuezhou, then follow a small road to Zhuji County. Then we'll cross the hills. It's not far from there to Muzhou."
"Yuezhou is part of our Central Plain," said Song Jiang. "Fang La has no control in that sector. I'll notify the local officials to give you safe conduct."
On the day designated Chai Jin and Yan Qing bid Song Jiang farewell and departed with lute, sword and books. They headed for the coast to find a boat and commence their intelligence operations. Of that we'll say no more.
Meanwhile, Military Advisor Wu Yong, addressing Song Jiang, said: "Along half the southern side of Hangzhou is the Qiantang River. It empties into the sea. A few men in a small boat could sail in around the coast, pass through the Zheshan Gate, and get up near the South Gate of the city. If they fired cannons and raised signal flags, they could cause great alarm in Hangzhou. Which of your naval chieftains could handle this mission?"
"Let us go," cried Zhang Heng and the three Ruan brothers, almost before the words were out of his mouth.
"Hangzhou's west side fronts on the lake. We'll need naval forces to get across there, too," said Song Jiang. "I can't let you all go."
"Zhang Heng and Ruan the Seventh, then," Wu Yong said to the two chieftains. "And you can take Hou Jian and Duan Jingzhu."
The chosen four set off with thirty or so sailors, and took with them a dozen cannons and signal flags. They skirted the coast until they found a craft, then sailed up along the Qiantang River.
Hear me, reader. This is a very diverse tale, handed down to us from the story-tellers of old. We couldn't possibly tell it all at one sitting. But we will sketch the broad outline, as you shall see. Remember it, for only thus will you be able to follow the complications and subtleties of the plot.
Song Jiang returned to Xiuzhou to plan the attack on Hangzhou. Suddenly, he was informed that an emissary was arriving from the Eastern Capital with imperial wine and rewards. Song Jiang and his commanders, high and low, welcomed him into the city, expressed their thanks, and feasted him at a banquet at which the imperial wine was served. During the course of the drinking the emissary said the emperor had a slight illness, and that the Royal Hospital wanted to summon Dr. An Daoquan to treat him. An imperial order had been issued, and the emissary had come to fetch the doctor. Song Jiang dared not refuse. The next day, he and his chieftains saw Dr. An off ten //out of the city on his journey back to the capital with the emissary.

After dispensing rewards among the chieftains, he selected a day for dedicating his flags at a sacrificial ceremony and starting his march. Then he bid farewell to Deputy District Commander Liu Guangshi and staff officer Geng, mounted, and set forth, advancing on land and water, navy and cavalry coordinating. When they neared Chongte, the rebel general who was holding the county fled to Hangzhou.

Meanwhile, Fang La's eldest son Prince Fang Tianding was consulting with his generals in his external palace. It was located on the site of where the Soaring Dragon Palace stands today. The twenty-eight senior officers were discussing how to meet the threat of the Song army. Of these, four were marshals: Buddha of Precious Light Deng Yuanjue the National Advisor, Marshal Shi Bao the Great Southerner, General Li Tianrun the National Suppressor, and General Si Xingfang the Defender of the Country. Their military titles had been conferred on them by Fang La.

"Since Song Jiang has crossed the Yangzi as the vanguard of a combined land and naval operation, we've lost to him three large shires," said Prince Fang Tianding. "Only Hangzhou remains as the bulwark of our Southern Country. If we lose that, how will Muzhou stand? Not long ago our Astrologer the eunuch Pu Wenying reported to the throne that stars of earthly fiends would be invading our Wu area, and indeed we have suffered heavy losses there, precisely to those Song forces. You officers all hold high ranks, you owe our nation the utmost loyalty. Let no one be remiss in his duties to the crown."

"Rest assured, Your Highness," the generals replied. "With our crack troops and fierce commanders, we're more than a match for Song Jiang. Although we've lost several prefectures, the officers in charge were all incompetents. That's why they were defeated. We hear that Song Jiang and Lu Junyi are advancing on Hangzhou in three columns. If Your Highness and the National Advisor will hold the district of Ninghai as our eternal base, we generals will go forth and meet the foe."

Very pleased, the prince ordered his army to divide into three columns also to counter the enemy offensive. He retained only National Advisor Teng as defender of the city. The other three marshals each commanded a column. Si Xingfang, with four generals, was ordered to go to the relief of Deqing Prefecture. Li Tianrun, with four generals, was directed to reinforce Lone Pine Pass. Shi Bao as commanding marshal, plus eight generals, were to meet the foe's main contingent.

Each marshal was presented with gold and silks as an encouragement to an early departure. Marshal Si, on the way to Deqing with his column, headed first for Fengkou Town. Marshal Li and his column's first objective on their march to Lone Pine Pass was the prefecture of Yuhang.

Song Jiang and his army, winding forward, arrived at Linping Mountain. They saw on the summit a swath of red flags and considerable activity. Song Jiang sent Hua Rong and Qin Ming ahead as advance pickets, and urged his naval officers to get their boats—which were being transported on wheels—across the Changan Dyke.

Hua Rong and Qin Ming, with a thousand men, rounded the entrance to the mountains and ran directly into Shi Bao and his southern troops.

Two of his generals promptly charged the two chieftains. One was named Wang Ren, the other Feng Yi, and each wielded a long lance. The Song contingent spread out in battle formation. Qin Ming, brandishing his wolf-toothed cudgel, took on Feng Yi. Hua Rong, lance at the level, met Wang Ren. The four steeds dashed together, and their riders fought more than ten rounds, with neither side emerging as victor. The two chieftains observed that the southern army was being reinforced from the rear.

"A brief rest," they called, and all rode back to their respective positions.

"Don't be so impatient for battle," Hua Rong said. "Report the news to Big Brother, quickly. He'll have to discuss this."

A dispatch was rushed to the Central Army. Song Jiang, accompanied by Zhu Tong, Xu Ning, Huang Xin and Sun Li, hurried to the front. Southern generals Wang Ren and Feng Yi rode forward once more.

"We dare you defeated officers to come out and Fight again," they yelled.

Qin Ming, angered, waved his wolf-toothed cudgel and galloped towards Feng Yi. Wang Ren challenged Hua Rong. Before Hua could respond, Xu Ning kicked his mount and raced out with levelled lance. Xu Ning and Hua Rong were first and second in command in their unit—one gold lancer, one silver. Hua Rong now hastened after, fitting an arrow to his bow. When he was close enough, before the two could clash, he shot. The feathered missile hit Wang Ren and knocked him from his saddle.

The southern troops were much disheartened. Feng Yi, startled to see his colleague fall, grew clumsy. A blow on the head from Qin Ming's cudgel felled him to the ground.

The southern soldiers scattered and fled, with the slaughtering Song army hot on their heels. Shi Bao was unable to stem the tide. He retreated to the Gaoting Mountains and made camp near New East Bridge. But the Southerners didn't feel secure. They withdrew into the city that evening.

By the next day, the imperial forces had already crossed the Gaoting Mountains and themselves made camp at New East Bridge. Song Jiang directed that the army divide into three columns and proceed against Hangzhou in a pincers offensive. The first column—an infantry unit—would march from the town of Tangzhen against the city's East Gate. The second column—a naval unit—would go from New North Bridge to take Gutang, cut the western approaches, and assail the city gates facing the lake.

The center column was to consist of infantry, cavalry and naval forces and be divided into three detachments. Their objectives were Hangzhou's Beiguan Gate and Genshan Gate. Behind the advance detachment would come Song Jiang, Military Advisor Wu Yong and the overall command, followed by the third detachment—which would provide reinforcements and supplies on both land and water.

These dispositions having been agreed upon, the three columns set forth.

We'll speak first of the central column's advance detachment under Guan Sheng. Probing to New East Bridge, they encountered not a single southern soldier. Guan Sheng grew suspicious, pulled back and reported by messenger to Song Jiang, who then replied via Dai Zong.

"We cannot advance carelessly. Let two chieftains go out with pickets every day," was Song Jiang's order.

Hua Rong and Qin Ming went the first day, Xu Ning and Hao Siwen the second. But several days passed without any of the enemy coming forward to do battle.

Then Xu Ning and Hao Siwen, with a few dozen cavalry, roved as far as Hangzhou's Beiguan Gate. It was wide open. They rode up to the drawbridge. Battle drums thundered on the city wall, and out charged a troop of horsemen. The two chieftains hastily wheeled their mounts. Wild shouts rose on the road skirting the west of Hangzhou, and more than a hundred enemy cavalry galloped before them. Xu Ning, fighting desperately, managed to break through, but when he glanced back, there was no sign of Hao Siwen. Then he looked again, and saw scores of enemy officers leading the captured Hao into the city.

As Xu Ning hurriedly turned, and arrow struck him in the neck. He raced off with the missile still imbedded in his flesh, pursued by six southern generals. Luckily, he ran into Guan Sheng and was rescued, but he fainted from loss of blood. The six generals, chased off, returned to the city.

Guan Sheng hastily reported to Song Jiang, who rushed to see Xu Ning. The chieftain was bleeding from every orifice. Weeping, Song Jiang summoned an army doctor. The arrow as extracted and a salve for wounds from metal weapons applied. Song Jiang ordered that Xu Ning be placed on one of the naval vessels to rest, and he personally supervised the transfer. Four times Xu lapsed into unconsciousness. Only then did they realize he had been struck by a poisoned arrow. Song Jiang gazed up at the heavens and sighed.

"Our marvellous Dr. An Daoquan has been called to the capital. We have no talented physician here who can save him. We're going to lose another of our limbs!" Song Jiang was very distraught.

Wu Yong urged him to return to camp, and not let his feelings for a brother distract him from important military problems, to the detriment of the country. Song Jiang had Xu Ning sent to Xiuzhou to recuperate. Half a month of treatment was in vain. The poisoned arrow wound could not be cured, and Xu Ning died. But that was later.

Now, Song Jiang sent an agent into the midst of the foe to inquire about Hao Siwen. The next day he received a report: "On the city wall above the Beiguan Gate, Hao's head is hanging on display from a bamboo pole. We've just heard that Fang Tianding has cut his body to pieces!"

Song Jiang felt very badly. Half a month later, he received news of the death of Xu Ning. The loss of these two chieftains created difficulties for him in deploying his troops. He remained holding the highway.

Li Jun, whose column arrived at New North Bridge, sent a unit ahead to scout out the road to Gutang, deep in the hills. A report was quickly brought back: Hao Siwen had been decapitated and Xu Ning killed by a poisoned arrow.

"It seems to me," Li Jun said to Zhang Shun, "our main objective is the juncture of the roads to Lone Pine Pass and the Huzhou-Deqing sector. Enemy soldiers are in and out of there all the time. But while we're throttling their transport lines, they can be attacking us from two sides. We don't have enough men to meet a double assault. We'd be better off pushing into the western hills and setting up there. Our battlefield will be West Lake. Behind the hills is the road to Zhongxi. It's a good escape route."

He dispatched a junior officer to get Song Jiang's approval, then led his troops over Taoyuan Ridge into the western hills. They made camp at what is known as Lingyin Monastery. He also established a small encampment on the north side of the hills at Xixi Gap, today called Gutang Hollow. His forward pickets were at Tangjiawa.

"The southern soldiers have withdrawn into Hangzhou," Zhang Shun said to Li Jun. "They haven't come out to fight in half a month. If we just hang around in these hills we'll never earn any distinctions. What I'd like to do is swim across the lake, slip in under the water gate and set some fires. That will be your signal to assail the water gate. Once you've taken it, report the seizure to Big Brother, and all three columns can attack Hangzhou together."

"After all the kindness Big Brother has shown me over the years, it will be a small recompense."

"Wait at least till I've requested him to send us reinforcements."

"We can be doing both at the same time. He'll know by the time you've entered the city."

That evening, Zhang Shun concealed a sharp dagger on his person, ate a good meal replete with wine, and walked to the edge of West Lake. He gazed at the green hills on three sides, at the azure water, and peered across at the distant city, with its four closed gates fronting on the opposite shore. The gates were called Qiantang, Yongjin, Qingbo and Qianhu.

Reader, please note, West Lake was not then what it became subsequent to the southern migration. Only after the Golden Tartars and the Song Empire made peace and ended their warfare, and the emperor moved the capital to Hangzhou, did the area achieve its great prosperity. Dozens of scenic spots were set up along the lake. The green hills on three sides provided a remarkable background. The colorful boats and taverns, the cool pavilions overlooking the water, were indeed a pleasure to behold. As the famous Su Dongpo put it in one of his poems:

Strangely lovely the hills when shrouded in rain.
West Lake may with Xi Zi compare,
Adorned or natural, equally fair.

Another of his verses remarks:

Hill after green tower beyond tower,
Song and dance at West Lake endlessly flow.
Visitors drunk on the heady warm breeze,
Consider Hangzhou another Bianzhou.[2]

Subsequently others also wrote poems and rhymes about the beauties of West Lake—far too many to record.

On Xiling Bridge, Zhang Shun halted and stared for a long time. It was a warm spring day, the lake was a deep blue, the surrounding hills were jade green.

"I grew up on the Xunyang River and encountered many a wind and wave," Zhang Shun mused, "but never have I seen such an enthralling body of water! Whoever died here would be a happy ghost!"

He removed his cloth shirt and put it beneath the bridge. He bound his hair in a topknot with red yarn. He tied a silk skirt round his waist with a sash, and from this hung a dagger. Barefoot, he plunged into the lake and swam across under water. It was around the first watch, and the moon was pale.

When he neared Yongjin Gate, Zhang Shun raised his head above the surface and listened. A drum on the city wall struck the fourth interval of the first watch. The area between the wall and the lakefront was still and deserted. Four or five soldiers were watching from the ramparts. Zhang Shun quickly submerged. After a time, he again poked his head out. There was no one to be seen upon the wall.

He groped in the channel beneath the water gate. It was blocked by an iron lattice, and above that, a heavy drape. The ropes by which the drape was attached were hung with copper bells. Zhang Shun, finding the lattice-work impenetrable, tugged at the drape, setting the bells to jangling. Men shouted on the wall. Zhang Shun, moving swiftly beneath the surface, swam back to the lake.

Soldiers came down and examined the drape, but they couldn't find anyone, and returned to the ramparts. "Some large fish must have bumped into it," they concluded, "and set those bells off." They maintained a lookout for a while, then went back to sleep.

Zhang Shun listened. Soon, the drum on the wall struck the third watch. He waited a long time, till he was sure the soldiers were sleeping soundly. Then he crept ashore. Since he couldn't get in through the water gate, and since he couldn't see anyone on the wall, he decided he would attempt to climb over.

"If there are soldiers up there, I'll be throwing my life away," he said to himself. "Let's see."

He felt around for a clod of earth and tossed it up. Soldiers who weren't asleep raised a clamor. Again they descended and inspected the water gate, and again they found nothing. From the tower on the wall, they peered out at the lake. There wasn't a single boat anywhere. Prince Fang Tianding had ordered all craft to moor outside Qingbo Gate or in Jingci Cove, and no other place.

"Queer," the soldiers exclaimed. "It's surely a ghost. We'll just go to sleep and ignore it."

Although that was what they said, actually they didn't retire, but crouched vigilantly behind the ramparts. Zhang Shun listened for an entire watch. Nothing was stirring. He crept to the foot of the wall. There was no sound from the watchman's drum. Zhang Shun cautiously threw up another clod. Still no response.

"It's the fourth watch already. The sky will soon be light," he thought. "It's now or never!"

He was halfway up the wall when a loud tattoo roused the soldiers. He leaped down into the channel and started to swim. A deluge of arrows, javelins and stones poured into him from the ramparts. Poor heroic Zhang Shun gave his life in the channel at Yongjin Gate!

That same day, Song Jiang received a report from Li Jun: "Zhang Shun is swimming into Hangzhou. He'll set fires as a signal for us to attack." The information was transmitted to the troops outside of East Gate.

Song Jiang conferred in his tent with Wu Yong that night until the fourth watch. Wearily, he dismissed his aides and reclined his head on the table.

A sudden gust of icy wind brought him bolt upright. The lamplight dimmed. It was frightfully cold. When his eyes adjusted to the gloom, he saw a figure that was neither ghost nor human, standing in the chill mist. It was spattered with blood.

"Big Brother has lavished his kindness upon me for many years," said the figure in a low voice. "I offer my dead body as recompense. I was killed today by javelins and arrows at Yongjin Gate. I come to bid you farewell."

"Aren't you brother Zhang Shun?" Song Jiang cried. He turned and saw on the other side of the tent another three or four bloodstained figures. He couldn't make out who they were. He burst into tears and awoke. It had all been a dream.

Aides, hearing the sound of his weeping, rushed into the tent. "How strange," said Song Jiang. He asked the military advisor to interpret the dream for him.

"You were just over-tired," said Wu Yong, "and you had a nightmare."

Song Jiang told exactly what had occurred in his dream. Wu Yong replied soothingly: "Didn't Li Jun say that Zhang Shun was going to cross the lake and set signal fires in the city? It was on your mind and you had a bad dream."

"Zhang Shun was a very clever fellow. If he perished, it surely was a blameless death," Song Jiang avowed.

"That's a very dangerous stretch, from the shore to the city wall. It's quite probable he lost life, and his ghost came in a dream to inform you."

"But who were the other three or four?"

Neither Song Jiang nor Wu Yong could guess. They sat talking until daybreak. Nothing seemed to be happening in the city, and this made them all the more suspicious.

In the afternoon, Li Jun rushed a dispatch to them: "Zhang Shun tried to scale the wall at Yongjin Gate, and was killed in the water by arrows! His head is hanging from a bamboo pole on the wall west of the lake!"

Song Jiang wept and collapsed in a faint. Wu Yong and the other chieftains all felt terrible. Zhang Shun was exceptionally good to people, and was very well liked.

"I feel worse than if I lost my father or mother," cried Song Jiang. "The agony goes to my very heart and marrow!"

"You should concentrate on important national affairs, brother," Wu Yong and the chieftains urged. "Don't let your grief injure your health."

"I must go to the lakeside and mourn him."

"It's too risky. If the enemy finds out, they'll surely attack."

"I know how to deal with that." Song Jiang sent Li Kui, Bao Xu, Xiang Chong, and Li Gun on ahead with five hundred infantry to reconnoitre. He himself followed with Shi Xiu, Dai Zong, Fan Rui and Ma Lin and another five hundred. They proceeded quietly along the paths in the western hills towards Li Jun's camp. On learning that they were coming, Li Jun met them halfway. He led the chieftains into the meditation hall of the Lingyin Monastery for a rest. Song Jiang again wept. He asked the monks to pray that Zhang Shun's ghost be allowed to become a spirit and enter Heaven. The next evening, he directed a junior officer to erect a white banner on Xiling Bridge by the lake shore, reading: Soul of Departed Brother and General Zhang Shun, and lay out many objects for a sacrificial ceremony. He also gave secret instructions to Li Kui. At the start of the road leading to the northern hills, he put Fan Rui, Ma Lin and Shi Xiu into ambush on both sides of the bridge. Dai Zong he kept with him. Shortly before the first watch, Song Jiang donned a white robe and golden helmet bound in mourning silk, and walked with Dai Zong and six or seven monks from Small Stroll Hill to Xiling Bridge. The young officer had already tethered a black pig and a white sheep, laid out sacrificial objects of gold and silver, and lit candles and lanterns and incense. Song Jiang testified to his friendship with Zhang Shun and, facing the Yongjin Gate, wept. Dai Zong stood by his side. The monks rang their bells and chanted scriptures. They called to the soul of Zhang Shun, beseeching it to descend on the spirit flag. Then Dai Zong read the sacrificial address, and Song Jiang poured the libation wine upon the ground. Weeping, he raised his head to the eastern heavens. Suddenly, shouts arose on either side of the bridge. Drums thundered in the northern and southern hills, and from each direction a troop of equestrians came tearing down to seize Song Jiang. Truly, a place of sacrifice to a chivalrous departed comrade became a small battlefield in the service of the sovereign; the slaughter of a few southern officers stirred the waves of West Lake sky high.

Now what Red told the White-Water Dragon was this: "I am not very clever, I'm just a country bumpkin in fact, but wise men say, so I hear: 'In this world there are both successes and defeats, men must rise and men must fall.' You, brother, have done honourable service on Mount Liang for a good many years. You have seen many battles and many victories. When you lot defeated the Liao Tartars, you didn't lose a single one of your comrades. But now you're up against Fang La, and evidently your confi-dence has received a blow. Maybe your luck has run out. You may ask why I don't want an official post. Because of the state world's in, that's why. When peace comes, there will be many who have it in for you. There's an old saying, 'It's the soldier who secures peace, but he never enjoys it himself.' How true that is! Since we are now blood brothers, why don't all of us, meaning you three too, while we've still got time, find us a quiet place to make a living — raise a little capital, get ourselves a big boat and some sailors to man it, and sail the rivers and seas till we reach the place to lay down our bones. Wouldn't that be a blessed state?"

White-Water Dragon heard him out. Then he threw himself down and said respectfully: "My dear friend, your words are truly enlightening and inspiring. The trouble is Fang La has not yet been defeated and I cannot abandon Song Jiang. It would be unforgivable. If I were to go with you now, I would be throwing away a lifetime of hard-earned honour. But if you can wait for me, until such time as Fang La has submitted, I and my two brothers will return. I really hope you will assist us and prepare the way. You have my word and if I don't keep this promise, you can say I'm no true man!"

The four said: "We'll get the boat ready, then, and we'll be looking forward to your coming. Please don't let us down!"

Both sides drank wine to conclude the pact and swore to keep their word.

Next day they bade farewell and returned to see Song Jiang. They explained to him how Red and his pals did not want to be given posts and only wanted to catch fish and live an easy life. Song Jiang sighed for a while, and then gave orders for the land and water-borne troops to prepare for sailing.

The province of Wujiang was now free of rebels. When they took Pingwang with a determined attack, Xiuzhou lay before them. This province's governor Duan Kai had heard about Third Prince Fang Mao's death in Suzhou and was busy packing up to leave when his scouts reported that a big army was not far off. Looking out over water and land he saw banners blotting out the sun from a combined force of boats and cavalry, and had the kind of shock that makes the spirit quail, the organs fail. The first detachment under Scimitar and Thunderclap was at the city walls; the boats moved up to surround the west gate. Duan Kai shouted down from the wall: "Don't attack! We surrender!" The city gates were opened and with incense and candles, with sheep and wine, Duan Kai welcomed Song Jiang into the city and had him taken to the governor's residence to rest. Since the Governor himself had been the first to welcome him, Song Jiang set him at ease, calling him a loyal official, issuing at the same time a proclamation to reassure the people. Duan Kai said: "We were indeed loyal to the Emperor, but we were under duress from Fang La and could not follow our own inclination. Now the imperial army is here, what else should we do but surrender?"

Song Jiang asked for some detailed information: "Who is in command of the defence of Hangzhou? How many troops and generals do they have?"

"Hangzhou covers a large area, thickly populated. It can be approached by land from the north. To the south is the river, to the west the lake. It is defended by Fang La's eldest son, Southern Prince Fang Tianding. He has more than seventy thousand troops, twenty-four generals and four marshals, twenty-eight commanders in all. The two senior ones are very brave. One is a monk from Shezhou often called Tathagata, Precious Light, whose religious name is Original Enlightenment. His weapon is a big staff made of solid steel that must weigh over fifty catties. He is held to be a religious master. The other is Shi Bao whose chief weapon is a flying hammer that doesn't miss, though he also manages a sword known as the Wind-Slicer, which can cut copper or iron and slice through three layers of armour plate like thin air. There's also another twenty-six officers, all excellent soldiers and very brave. You must not underestimate them."

Song Jiang rewarded Duan Kai for this information and then sent him off to Marshal Zhang at headquarters to put him in the picture. Later this Duan Kai served under Marshal Zhang in the garrison at Suzhou, while Zhang's deputy, Liu Shiguang, took over the garrison at Xiuzhou, and Song Jiang moved his troops forward to Zuiliting and set up camp there.

When Song Jiang feasted his army and held a meeting to discuss the strategy for taking Hangzhou, Mr. Chai stood up and said: "Ever since you saved my life at Gaotang I have remained conscious of the debt I owe you and which I have not yet repaid. I now propose that I should infiltrate Fang La's lair to spy on him. If I am successful, it will be something to recompense the Emperor and also add to your renown. Have I your permission to do this?"

Song Jiang replied delightedly: "If you are prepared to go and beard the villain in his den and find out the lay of the land for us, it will enable us to launch an attack, capture Fang La and hand him over to the authorities. That will be no small service indeed and will bring honour and riches to us all. But I fear this mission may simply be too dangerous."

"I am not afraid of dying. Only it would be good to have the Prodigy as companion. He is someone who knows all the roads and can speak the local patois. In addition he knows how to adapt to circumstances."

Song Jiang said: "How could I refuse? The only problem is that the Prodigy has been posted to the Unicorn's command. We will have to send for him."

In the middle of this discussion, a sentry reported: "The Prodigy is here with a report from the Unicorn."

Song Jiang said excitedly: "This expedition of yours, brother, is bound to be a success! The fact that the Prodigy has just turned up here like this is an excellent omen!"

When the Prodigy had reported and been given food and drink, Song Jiang asked him: "Did you come by land or by water?"

"I came by boat," he answered.

"When the Magic Messenger came back he told us that the attack on Huzhou had started," Song Jiang went on. "How is it going?"

"When he marched from Xuanzhou, the Unicorn divided his army into two columns," the Prodigy replied. "He himself led a thousand cavalry against Huzhou, and killed the usurper's governor and five of his lieutenants. Huzhou capitulated and all the enemy troops were destroyed. A proclamation was issued to reassure the people, a request was sent to Marshal Zhang to secure the city, and I was sent here to report to you. The general's other column of troops was led by Leopard's Head with orders to capture Lone Pine Pass and meet up at Hangzhou. At the time when I left I heard that there had been heavy fighting every day on the road to Lone Pine Pass and they had not managed to take it. The Unicorn was planning to go there himself with the Strategist, leaving Twin Rods in command of the army, to guard Huzhou until someone was sent to take over there and with orders to strengthen the defences and pacify the people, and then proceed to take Deqing and rendezvous at Hangzhou."

"Can you tell me which commanders were detailed to guard Huzhou and take Deqing, and which were sent to attack Lone Pine Pass?" Song Jiang asked. "How many were sent off and how many remained with Twin Rods?"

"There are twenty-three for Lone Pine Pass and nineteen for Huzhou and Deqing. Here is the list," the Prodigy said. "At the time I left they had settled the arrangements and were planning to start the attack soon after."

"It's good that the attack will be on two fronts," Song Jiang said. "But Mr. Chai wants you to go with him on a spying mission to Fang La's den. Are you willing to go?"

"If those are your orders, of course I will go. I shall be delighted to accompany Mr. Chai."

Mr. Chai was well pleased: "I shall go as an unemployed scholar and you can dress as a servant. We'll travel as master and servant, and we'll take a lute, a sword and some books. No one will suspect us. We'll go to the coast and take a boat, travelling via Yuezhou. Then we'll take the small roads to Zhuji, cross the mountains and from there it's no distance to Muzhou."

A day later Mr. Chai and the Prodigy said farewell to Song Jiang, picked up their lute, sword and books and headed for the coast to find a boat. Of this no more.

Now the Professor said to Song Jiang: "On the south of Hangzhou is the Qiantang River, which connects it to the sea. If a number of people sail up from the coast via Redcliff Gorge, tie up on the river bank outside the southern gate and let off rockets and raise signal flags, it will cause panic. Which of you boat commanders would like to give it a try?"

Almost before he finished speaking, the Pilot and the Ruan brothers said: "We'll go!"

Song Jiang said: "On the west side Hangzhou adjoins the West Lake. We'll also want boat commanders for crossing that. You can't all go."

The Professor said: "Why not let the Pilot and Ruan the Seventh go to manage the boats, and the Ape and Yellow Dog go with them." So it was agreed that it should be these four with thirty sailors, taking with them a dozen or so flares and signal flags. They were to head for the coast and find a boat to take them up the Qiantang River.

You know, friends, telling this story is like flinging a handful of sand. When my predecessors recorded the events, they wanted to tell it all, every detail, but you simply can't tell everything at once. But gradually the plot will unfold and you shall know all. For the moment just try to remember the general direction. Later all that is most hidden will be revealed.

After designating his troops Song Jiang returned to Xiuzhou and planned the attack on Hangzhou. Suddenly he heard that an envoy from the capital had arrived with imperial wine to reward the troops. He went with all his officers to receive this gentleman and welcome him to the city. Thanks were expressed and there was a banquet in the envoy's honour to accompany the wine. During these celebrations the envoy mentioned that the Emperor was indisposed and the Medical Council had requested the services of Doctor An Daoquan. He was carrying an order to this effect and had instructions to take Doctor An back with him. Song Jiang dared not refuse. Next day when the celebrations ended arrangements were made to send Doctor An to the capital. Song Jiang and the rest went as far as the three-mile pavilion to see them off and drink a parting cup with them.

Meanwhile the bounty brought by the Emperor's envoy was divided among the leaders and after that they said their farewells, mounted and set off. As it was to be a joint attack by land and water, the boats sailed at the same time and they headed for Hangzhou. When the governor heard he fled to Hangzhou.

Now Fang La's son, Southern Prince Fang Tianding, was holding a meeting in the travelling palace — the site of this is the place we now call Flying Dragon Inn. Under his command he had four generals, all appointed by Fang La. He also had twenty-four senior commanders. That made twenty-eight in all in his garrison. They were all present to discuss the situation.

The Southern Prince said: "Since Song Jiang invaded across the river we have lost three cities to him. Now only Hangzhou remains as a shield for the south. If it meets with disaster, how will we defend Muzhou? Previously the royal astronomer declared that evil stars had invaded the territory of Wu, portending great disasters. It must have meant this bunch. Since they have violated our frontiers, you have a responsibility, all of you, to defend your country to the last drop of your blood. There must be no shirking!"

There was a chorus of reassurance: "Never fear, Sire. We have many excellent soldiers and commanders who have not yet had a proper go at them. Although we have lost a certain amount of territory, that is only because we did not have the right personnel in place. We have heard that Song Jiang and the Unicorn are advancing in three columns to attack Hangzhou. Your Highness and the Marshal should fortify the city, you can make it impregn-able. We generals will each lead our troops into the field."

The Southern Prince was greatly encouraged by this and gave orders for the army to advance in three detachments and engage the enemy, leaving only the monk Precious Light to stay with him and guard the city.

Three generals divided the army, each taking one division. This done they were all rewarded and urged to start. Marshal Si Hengfang took one division of troops to relieve Deqing and set off towards Yuhang. We can forget the other two divisions, for we shall now join Song Jiang's army marching towards Linping Mountain, on whose summit they see a red banner flying. Song Jiang sent Colonel Hua and Thunderclap to investigate and at the same time urged the boats and carts to proceed with all haste to Chang'an Landing.

When Colonel Hua and Thunderclap with a thousand cavalry reached the mouth of the pass, they encountered the southern troops under Shi Bao. Two southern commanders riding in front, Wang Ren and Feng Yi, charged the enemy on sight. They thundered forward, lances at the ready. Colonel Hua and Thunderclap formed up their troops and then Thunderclap brandishing his great wolf-tooth's mace took on Feng Yi while Colonel Hua levelled his spear at Wang Ren. Four horses clashed and they fought ten bouts, but no one had the advantage. Colonel Hua and Thunderclap seeing the enemy commanders had reinforcements behind them, shouted out: "We'll take a rest!", turned their horses and returned to their own lines.

Colonel Hua said: "Do not renew this fight, brother. Let us go back to consult the Leader and consider what to do." The rearguard hurriedly turned back to report to the main army. Song Jiang now rode forward with four more leaders: Whiskers, Spearsman, Tamer and Colonel Sun. Feng Yi and Wang Ren again rode forward and shouted abuse: "Do the leaders we defeated not dare come back for more?"

Thunderclap, enraged by this, brandished his mace, gave free rein to his horse and charged Feng Yi. Wang Ren challenged Colonel Hua, but at this moment Spearsman rode forward with levelled spear. He and Colonel Hua made a perfect pair. one with a gold lance the other with a silver lance. Colonel Hua also urged his horse forward in the wake of Spearsman. He grasped his bow and fitted an arrow to it. Before Spearsman and Wang Ren could meet, he took careful aim and released an arrow. It toppled Wang Ren from his horse. At this the southerners lost heart. Feng Yi had a shock when he saw his comrade fall; before he had time to strike a blow he was hit on the head by Thunderclap and fell from his horse. The Song contingent charged and Marshal Shi Bao's forces were overwhelmed and retreated hastily to Look-out Hill, taking up a position near New East Bridge. By now it was getting late and no one had a clear plan, so the southern troops retreated into the city.

Next day Song Jiang passed Look-out Hill and took up a position where he could threaten New East Bridge. He ordered his army to be divided into three units for the attack on Hangzhou. The first of these consisted of infantry under Whiskers and five others, the boat crews under White-Water Dragon, and a contingent of cavalry and foot under Scimitar. The main force was led by Song Jiang and the Professor with seventeen others. The support group was under Skyhawk.

It's either too much or too little, that's the problem. I must now tell how Scimitar, leading the vanguard of the main army reconnoitred as far as New East Bridge, and saw no sign of the southern army. But he was suspicious and after withdrawing from the bridge sent a message back to Song Jiang. Song Jiang sent Magic Messenger with this warning: "We must not go in recklessly. Establish a roster for two of the commanders in turn to lead a patrol."

Colonel Hua and Thunderclap went the first day, Spearsman and Hound the second. This went on for several days — and still no sign of the enemy. One day, when it was again the turn of Spearsman and Hound, they took a dozen cavalrymen and rode as far as the North Gate of the city. They found it open. But when they went through to take a look at the drawbridge, there was a thunder of drums from within and a squadron of cavalry charged out. Spearsman and Hound turned their horses, but a cry went up on a road west of the city and over a hundred horsemen galloped forward. Spearsman fought for his life to break through the attacking cavalry. When he turned to look back he could not see Hound. Later he looked again just in time to see a group of southern officers taking Hound off a prisoner into the city. As he turned again to flee, an arrow struck him in the back of the neck. He galloped on with the arrow still stuck in him, six enemy commanders in pursuit. They came upon Scimitar who delivered him from his pursuers. When Spearsman got back he fainted from loss of blood.

After forcing back the southern commanders, Scimitar hurriedly reported to Song Jiang and told him what had happened. Song Jiang rushed off to look at Spearsman. He was bleeding at mouth, nose and ears and Song Jiang wept and then ordered the army doctor to try to save him. The arrow was pulled out and a special salve applied. Song Jiang ordered the wounded man to be carried down into one of the boats to rest and went to see him there himself. Spearsman lost consciousness four or five times that night, and they knew then that the arrow which had hit him was poisoned. Gazing heavenwards Song Jiang sighed and said: "Doctor An has been taken away from us by the authorities in the capital and now we have no doctor expert enough to save him. Therefore I must lose another of my limbs!" His grief knew no bounds.

The Professor came and implored Song Jiang to return to the camp and take charge of the military situation again and not to let personal grief ruin affairs of state. Song Jiang had Spearsman sent back to Xiuzhou for treatment but it seemed there was no antidote for the poison. He also sent someone off to get news of Hound. Next day a soldier came and reported: "Hound's head has been stuck on a pole on the battlements at the North Gate of Hangzhou." Later it was learnt that he had been cut to pieces by the Southern Prince. Song Jiang was exceedingly pained by this news. In less than two weeks the news came that Spearsman had died. Overcome by the loss of two more leaders, Song Jiang gave no orders for his army to advance and they remained where they were, blocking the road.

Meanwhile White-Water Dragon and his party had advanced to New North Bridge and taken up a position there. After sending some scouts on to Gutang, deep in the mountains, to reconnoitre the route, he received the report of the two leaders' deaths. He discussed the situation with White Eel: "This road we're on, I reckon the important thing is that it controls the route between Lone Pine Pass, Huzhou and Deqing. If the enemy want to come and go along it and we stand in their way, they can fall on us from both sides. There's only a few of us, we won't be able to make a stand against them. Would it not be better to push on into the Western Mountains and take up a strong position there? The waters of the West Lake are the ideal battlefield for us. And behind the Western Mountains you come down to the West River, so there's a good escape route." He sent a soldier to inform Song Jiang and ask for his instructions. Later on they marched to Peach Garden Ridge, deep within the mountain range and made camp in what is now called Temple of the Holy Mystery. North of the mountains in the gorge of the West River they also set up a smaller camp, in what is now Gutang. A reconnaissance party was sent on to Tangjiawa. That day White Eel said to White-Water Dragon: "The southern army have all withdrawn into Hangzhou. For two weeks we have seen no enemy. How are we ever going to win fame stuck here in these mountains? I'd like to swim the lake and enter the city secretly through the water gate and start a fire as a signal. Then you can bring the army and seize their water gate and send word to the Leader and all three columns of the main army can attack the city together."

"It's a good idea, but I don't see how you will be able to carry it out on your own."

"If I had to give my life in order to repay the Leader for so many years of good treatment, it would not be a lot," said White Eel.

"Don't be in too much of a hurry then. Wait till I have informed the Leader, so he can arrange the back-up troops."

"I shall get going whilst you send the messenger. By the time I reach the city the Leader will know about it."

So that night White Eel took a dagger with a spade-shaped blade and concealed it on his person, and ate and drank his fill. When he reached the shore of the West Lake he looked about and saw blue hills on three sides, the green water of the lake and in the distance the city with its four main gate towers rising above the lake. Those four gates were Embankment Gate, Goldenflood Gate, Brightwave Gate and Lakeside Gate. You see, friends, this Hangzhou was once, before even the days of Song, called Clearwater City and it was under King Qian that it became Hangzhou, capital of the Ninghai commandery. Ten gates were built then: on the east Market Gate and Fodder Bridge Gate; on the south Tidal Gate and the Gate of Encounters; on the west Lakeside Gate, Brightwave Gate, Goldenflood Gate and Embankment Gate; on the north North Gate and Mount Gen Gate. After the Song court moved to the south, the city was further embellished: it became known as City of Flowers, or Peace Capital, and three more gates were added. But in those days, when it was occupied by Fang La, it was still the old city of King Qian. It had a circumference of thirty miles and though not as splendid as it was to become after the Emperor's move south it was exceedingly rich and orderly, the scenery of river and mountains was as beautiful as always and the people flourishing, whence the saying: "Above is Heaven but below we have Suzhou and Hangzhou."

The incomparable beauty of the West Lake in the days of Song is simply impossible to describe. White Eel stood on the shore and gazed for hours. It was a warm spring evening. the waters of the lake were suffused with purple and all around the mountains clustered in folds of kingfisher blue. "I was born on the banks of the Yangtze," White Eel said to himself. "Great winds, huge waves, I have seen all that a million times, but never did I see anything like the beauty of this lake. If I were to die right here, I would become a happy ghost!" So saying he took off his shirt and laid it out on the bridge. He wound a piece of red cloth about his head and wrapped his silk bathing costume around his waist. He donned a garment that left his torso bare and attached a knife. Barefooted he slipped into the water and began to swim along the bottom of the lake.

It was early evening and the moonlight was only faint as White Eel groped his way toward Goldenflood Gate. When he poked his head out of the water to listen, he heard the drum beat announce the hour: it was the last quarter of the first watch, half-past eight. All was quiet outside the walls, not a person to be seen. On the battlements close to the parapet there were four or five sentries. White Eel dived again and waited a while before poking his head out to have another look.

All was quiet on the battlements this time, no one stirring. White Eel made his way along towards the doors of the lock. They were protected by an iron grating. He felt along this and found it covered by a net to which a rope was attached. On the other end of the rope was a bell. The grating was strong and it was impossible to enter the city that way. When he touched the net it pulled the rope and the bell rang on the other end. Immediately there was a hubbub on the city walls. White Eel dived to the bottom and waited. He heard the soldiers come down to examine the net. When they found no one, he heard them say: "Must be a big fish disturbed the net. Must have bumped into it." They poked around for a while but they found nothing so they all went back to sleep.

A little while passed and White Eel heard the drum beat for the third watch, eleven o'clock. He waited till after half-past and then decided the soldiers must all be fast asleep. He swam close to the wall again. It was evidently impossible to enter the city from the water, so he climbed out onto the bank. There was no one to be seen up on the battlements and he decided to climb the wall. But if there was someone watching up there, he thought, he would lose his life. He had better make a test first. He found a clod of earth and threw it at the top of the wall. One of the sentries who was not sleeping gave the alarm and came to look at the water gate again. But he could see nothing moving so he went back up onto the wall and from the look-out scrutinized the surface of the lake. No sign of any boat. Of course all the boats on the West Lake by order of the Southern Prince had been assembled in the Harbour of Compassion at Brightwave Gate, so there should not be any boats anywhere else.

"What are you making such a fuss about?" the other guards asked the man. "Must be a ghost," he muttered. "We'd better go back to sleep and not upset him!" This is what he said, but in fact he did not go to sleep but remained on watch concealing himself behind the battlements. White Eel waited till the next watch was sounded. All seemed quiet. He stole over to the wall to listen. The drum was silent now. He was still nervous about climbing, so he picked up another clod of earth and threw it. There was no response. He thought to himself: "It's already the fourth watch. If I don't climb this wall before dawn, I won't get another chance."

He was half-way up when he heard a challenge from above. All the guards were alerted. From half-way up the wall he plunged down into the water, hoping to conceal himself by diving. But bows and crossbows on the wall were pouring down a deadly hail of arrows and missiles. Thus did our unhappy hero die, right there in the water at the foot of Goldenflood Gate!

One expects a great fighter will die by the sword;
A watery death is the swimmer's reward.
It's close to the well that the pot gets broken,
Cut out the heroics, or you'll wish you'd not spoken!

Our story now divides. We will speak of Song Jiang who had received White-Water Dragon's report informing him that White Eel was going to enter the city from the water and send a fire signal and had informed the contingent at the east gate of this plan.

That evening Song Jiang was discussing things in his tent with the Professor. In the fourth watch a great tiredness came over him. He dismissed his aides and lay down on a bench to sleep. Suddenly he felt a cold wind. When he sat up to look, the lamp grew dim and he was assailed by an icy draught. As he strained his eyes to see, something appeared, not exactly a person and not exactly a ghost, in a miasma of cold air. This figure was covered in blood. It spoke softly: "I followed you for many years, brother. You treated me always with great generosity. Now my death repays you. I died at Goldenflood Gate, shot by an arrow. I have come to say farewell!"

Song Jiang said: "Can it be White Eel?" Turning to another side he saw three or four others, all covered in blood, though he could not make them out clearly. He cried out in pain, and suddenly awoke. It had all been a dream. Hearing him cry out the guards outside his tent rushed in. Song Jiang said: "Most strange!" He summoned the Professor to interpret his dream.

"You were just very tired, my friend," the Professor said. "What sort of strange dream did you have?"

"There was a current of cold air and I perceived the figure of White Eel covered in blood standing just here. He said 'I followed you for many years and you always treated me kindly. Now I have laid down my life for you. I died at Goldenflood Gate, shot by an arrow, and I have come to say farewell.' When I turned I saw three or four others also covered in blood, but I couldn't make out who they were. Then I woke up crying."

The Professor said: "Earlier the White-Water Dragon told you White Eel was going to cross the lake to enter the city and start a fire. That must have been on your mind, that's why you had this nightmare."

"I can't help thinking that White Eel is such a clever person, but yet there might be something quite beyond his control that has caused his death."

"To reach the city from the West Lake must be a most dangerous undertaking. I fear he could indeed have lost his life. It could be why his ghost came to visit your dream."
"Who are those others then?" said Song Jiang.
He and the Professor discussed it but came to no conclusions. They sat and waited for dawn. There was no sign of activity in the city and they began to get over their fears. At noon a messenger arrived from White-Water Dragon and told them: "White Eel tried to get into the city by Goldenflood Gate and was hit by an arrow. He died in the water and now his head is stuck on a pole over the West Lake as an example to the people."
Song Jiang was so overcome by grief at this news that he fainted. The Professor and the others were also extremely upset. White Eel was such a good person and everyone loved him dearly.
Song Jiang said: "Had it been my father and mother the loss could not have been more painful. This news has pierced my heart."
The others tried to comfort him. "You must keep in mind our mission. You must not let your feelings get the better of you."
"I must go myself to the lakeside to mourn him."
The Professor warned, "You mustn't put yourself in danger. If the enemy hears of it, they'll attack."
Song Jiang said: "I know what to do."
He sent Iron Ox, Pluto, 8-Armed Ogre, and Winged Ghost with 500 infantry to reconnoitre, while he himself followed with Madcap, Magic Messenger, Demon King, the Flautist, and 500 troops, travelling secretly to White-Water Dragon's camp by small paths through the Western Mountains. They welcomed him and took him to rest in the abbot's quarters of the Temple of the Holy Mystery. He cried a while longer, and then asked the monks to recite sutras and make offerings for the spirit of White Eel. The following evening he told the troops to set up a white funeral banner beside the lake bearing the words: "To commemorate the spirit of our brother, White Eel, bold and righteous commander." This was planted at the waterside while offerings were placed on the Bridge of the Western Mound and Iron Ox was given certain instructions. A watch was set up on the road north where it entered a defile into the mountains, with Demon King, the Flautist and Madcap concealed on either side; Magic Messenger remained with Song Jiang. As soon as night began to fall, nearly the first watch, Song Jiang donned a white robe and a bronze helmet swathed in white silk for mourning, and made his way down from the mountain with Magic Messenger and half a dozen monks to the Bridge of the Western Mound. The orderlies had lined up offerings of black pig and white lamb and paper money. Lamps and candles were lit and incense was burning. Song Jiang wrote the name of the deceased on the tablet and cast his gaze downward from the bridge as he mourned. Magic Messenger stood a little to one side. The monks began to ring bells and chant, calling out the dead man's name and singing his praises and lowering the funeral banners. Then Magic Messenger read the eulogy and Song Jiang poured the libation with his own hands. He wept as he directed his eyes towards the eastern sky. While Song Jiang was thus mourning, loud shouts were heard from either side and drums sounded simultaneously on the hills north and south. Two fierce forces were racing towards them intent on capturing Song Jiang.

The ghost of White Eel Zhang Shun captures Fang Tianding the Southern Prince; Song Jiang takes Ninghai District Commandery with a trick

When he went with Dai Zong to sacrifice to the spirit of Zhang Shun at Xiling Bridge, Song Jiang hadn't realized that Prince Fang Tianding knew about it and ordered two columns under ten generals to capture him. Now these burst out of the city and came charging forward, five via the southern hills, five via the northern, leading a total of three thousand soldiers. They had emerged through the Front and Rear Gates around midnight.
The imperial units lying in ambush to the left and right of the bridge, five thousand men in each, saw the torches on the road ahead. They promptly lit their own torches and advanced in two bodies to meet Prince Fang's contingents marching from the northern and southern hills. Finding their foe prepared and waiting, the Southerners beat a hasty retreat, pursued by imperial forces on either flank.
One column, hurrying to go back across the river, was surprised by the Ruan brothers' unit of five thousand. It swarmed out from behind Baoshu Pagoda Hill, cut off the escape route, captured one general and killed another. The other column was intercepted at Dingxiang Bridge by five hundred infantry under Li Kui. Shield twirlers Xiang Chong and Li Gun plunged in among the foe, and their throwing knives quickly dispatched a southern general. Bao Xu hacked another down with his sword, while Li Kui's axes cleaved a third in twain. Most of the southern soldiers were driven into the lake and drowned.
By the time reinforcements rushed from the city Song Jiang's troops had withdrawn into the hills. They reassembled at the Lingyin Monastery, and each hero came forward to claim his reward. Together, the two units had captured more than five hundred good horses.
Song Jiang left Shi Xiu, Fan Rui and Ma Lin to aid Li Jun in guarding the hillside emplacement overlooking West Lake, and ordered them to prepare to assault the city. He returned with Dai Zong and Li Kui to the camp on Mount Gaoting. He met with Wu Yong and other chieftains in his tent.
"By following our plan," he said to the military advisor, "We've already killed four of their generals and captured a fifth. We're sending him to Governor Zhang for execution."
Only the situation in Lone Pine Pass and Deqing was unknown to Song Jiang. He sent Dai Zong to find out. A few days later the Marvellous Traveller returned and reported.
"Lu Junyi has taken Lone Pine Pass and sooner or later will be arriving in this sector."
Pleased but worried, Song Jiang asked: "How are our officers and men?'
"I have the whole story. But you'd better read it in this dispatch. Please don't be upset."
"We must have lost more of our brothers. Don't try and conceal anything. Tell me everything frankly."
"Lone Pine Pass has high mountains on either side, with only a single road running through it. On the heights, controlling the pass is a fort, and beside it is a tree, dozens of meters high, from which a lookout can see far in every direction. Below are groves of pine. Three generals command the fort. The first is called Wu Sheng, the second Jiang Yin, the third Wei Heng. In the beginning they came down every day and battled with Panther Head Lin Chong until he wounded Jiang Yin with his lance. After that, Wu Sheng dared not come out, but remained holding the pass."
"Then Li Tianyou and four other southern generals arrived as reinforcements. They emerged the next day and gave battle. Lu Fang killed Li Tianyou with his lance after nearly sixty rounds. The enemy soldiers retreated into the pass and remained there. Our troops waited in vain for several days. General Lu sent Ou Peng, Deng Fei, Li Zhong and Zhou Tong to find an approach up the sharp and dangerous mountain heights. They were taken by surprise by Li Tianrun, who charged out of the fort to avenge his brother. With one sweep of his sword he killed Zhou Tong, and Li Zhong was wounded. If our rescue force hadn't arrived in time, all four scouts would have been lost. As it was, three were able to return to camp.
"The next day General Two Spears Dong Ping, burning for vengeance, reined his steed at the foot of the pass and loudly reviled the enemy commanders. A cannon ball skimmed him so closely that the concussion injured his left arm. He couldn't use his lance and had to return to camp and have the arm put in splints.
"He wanted to go out again the next day, but Lu Junyi wouldn't let him. Another night passed. The arm was slightly better. Without telling General Lu, Dong Ping conferred secretly with Zhang Qin, and the two set out on foot. Li Tianrun and Zhang Tao came down from the fort to give battle. Dong wanted to take Li alive, and they fought ten rounds. But Dong's skill didn't match his zeal. His left arm had been wounded and he had to fall back. Li drove him out of the pass.
"Zhang Qin then thrust at Li with his lance. Li dodged behind a pine. The point of the weapon sank deep into the tree. While Zhang was frantically trying to pull it out, Li stabbed him through the stomach, and he collapsed to the ground. Dong saw him go down, and he started to rush forward with his two spears. But Zhang Tao, behind him, swung his sword and cleaved him in twain at the waist.
"By the time General Lu learned about the fight, it was too late to go to the rescue, and the enemy soldiers had already withdrawn to their fort. There was nothing he could do about it.
"He sent Sun Xin and Gu Dasao, husband and wife disguised as refugees, deep into the mountains, where they found a path to the fort. They led LiLi, Tang Long, Shi Qian and Bai Sheng up this path in the middle of the night and set the fort on fire. The southern generals realized our forces were already in the pass, so they abandoned the fort and fled. When General Lu took over and made a count of our troops, he discovered that Sun Xin and Gu Dasao had captured southern general Wu Sheng, LiLi and Tang Long had nabbed Jiang Yin, and Shi Qian and Bai Sheng had caught Wei Heng—the original commanders of the fort. All three were delivered to Governor Zhang. The bodies of Dong Ping, Zhang Qin and Zhou Tong were recovered and buried above the pass.
"General Lu chased the enemy soldiers forty-five //beyond the pass, caught up and engaged Li Tianrun in battle. They fought more than thirty rounds, and Lu killed Li with his lance. The southern reinforcement troops were in no condition to fight, and they retreated with the three remaining generals. Lu Junyi will be here soon. If you don't believe me, Commander-in-Chief, you can read this dispatch."
Song Jiang read the document, deeply depressed. Tears gushed from his eyes.
"General Lu has won a victory," said Wu Yong. "We can move troops to form the other side of a pincers. We'll surely defeat the Southerners. What we should do now is link up with Huyan Zhuo's column in Huzhou."
"You're absolutely right," said Song Jiang.
He ordered Li Kui, Bao Xu, Xiang Chong and Li Gun to go with three thousand infantry over the hills and make the connection. Black Whirlwind, thanking Heaven and Earth, set forth with the contingent.

For his attack on Hangzhou's East Gate, Song Jiang dispatched Zhu Tong with five thousand infantry and cavalry. They advanced rapidly along the Tangzhen road from the village where they had been camped to a point outside Vegetable Market Gate, as the East Gate was also known. The eastern suburbs along the river were then heavily populated, with more homes and shops than in the city, and many vegetable gardens and orchards. Here, the Song forces spread out, and Lu Zhishen, iron staff in hand, strode to the foot of the walls.
"Come out, you friggin barbarians," he shouted. "I dare you to fight!" The soldiers on the ramparts hurriedly reported to the prince's palace. Monk of Precious Light Deng Yuanjue the National Advisor, learning that it was a monk who was issuing the challenge, addressed himself to the prince.
"I've heard that in Liangshan Marsh there is a monk called Lu Zhishen who wields an iron staff," he said. "If Your Highness will mount the wall at East Gate, you can watch me go a few rounds with him."
Prince Fang Tianding was very pleased. He issued his instructions. Accompanied by Marshal Shi Bao, he went with his eight top generals to Vegetable Market Gate. The gate was opened, the drawbridge lowered, and Deng and five hundred infantry swordsmen sped forth.
"So the southern army has a shaven-pate of its own," Lu Zhishen said to himself. "I'll give the churl a hundred licks of my staff!" Without a word, he charged.
In the shadows of the weeping willows, on the lush green turf, two silvery serpents flew, a pair of jade dragons leaped. The furious Lu had not a bit of cleanliness in his heart. The angry Deng was completely devoid of compassion. When did the first ever respect the Buddhist laws? He murdered people in the dark of the moon! When did the second ever read the scriptures? He set fires when the wind was high!
They fought more than fifty rounds, but neither could vanquish the other. Prince Fang, watching from the wall top, was filled with admiration.
"I've heard of Zhishen the Tattooed Monk of Liangshan Marsh, but I didn't realize he was so formidable! He certainly deserves his reputation," he said to Shi Bao. "Fighting all this time, he hasn't yielded an inch to our Precious Light Monk."
"I'm dazzled myself," said the marshal. "I've never seen such a match!"
Just then, a mounted messenger galloped up and reported: "More enemy troops at Beiguan Gate!" Shi Bao hastily left the prince.
Wu Song the Pilgrim saw that Zhishen could not defeat the Precious Light, and he feared there might be an accident. Brandishing his pair of swords, he charged. The National Advisor knew he couldn't cope with the two of them. He retreated into the city. Wu Song started to pursue, but out through the gate galloped a ferocious commander. He was Bei Yingkui, one of Prince Fang's generals, and he assailed Wu Song with levelled lance.
They clashed on the drawbridge. Wu Song closed in, cast aside one sword, grasped his opponent's lance and, with a yank, pulled man and weapon from the saddle. Slash went his blade, and Bei's head rolled on the ground, Lu Zhishen moved up with reinforcements.
Prince Fang hurriedly ordered his men to raise the drawbridge, and pulled his troops back into the city. Zhu Tong withdrew the Song forces ten //and made camp. He dispatched a messenger to Song Jiang reporting the victory.
That day Song Jiang had led his troops to Beiguan Gate and challenged the foe to battle. Southern general Shi Bao took his Comet Hammer and mounted. Carrying his Wind Splitter sword, he had the city gate opened and rode forth. From the Song army, Big Halberd Guan Sheng cantered out to meet him. More than twenty rounds they fought, then Shi Bao turned his steed and withdrew. Guan Sheng quickly checked his horse and returned to his position.
"Why didn't you pursue?" Song Jiang queried.
"His swordsmanship is in no way inferior to mine," said the Big Halberd. "When he retreats like that, he must be up to some trick."
"Duan Kaizeng says the man flings a comet hammer," Wu Yong interjected. "He rides off, feigning defeat, and lures his adversary deep into enemy territory."
"If we go after him, he'll play us dirty," said Song Jiang. "We'll recall our troops and go back to camp." He dispatched a man with a reward for Wu Song.
Meanwhile, Li Kui marched with his infantry to join Lu Junyi. On a mountain road they ran into Zhang Jian and his defeated soldiers, and fiercely attacked, killing southern general Yao Yi in the course of the wild skirmish. Zhang Jian and Zhang Tao fled towards the pass, but were intercepted by General Lu Junyi. After another big clash, the two southern generals fled along a path into the mountains. Their pursuers were hot on their heels. They had no choice but to abandon their mounts and plunge ahead on foot.
But then, from a bamboo thicket, two men suddenly emerged. Each held a steel pitchfork. Before the southerners could defend themselves, they were knocked flat by the two and hauled down the slope. Their captors were none other than Xie Zhen and Xie Bao.
When General Lu saw the two prisoners he was very pleased. Joining forces with Black Whirlwind Li Kui, he proceeded to the main camp on Mount Gaoting. He told Song Jiang of the deaths of Dong Ping, Zhang Qin and Zhou Tong. Both men were deeply grieved. The other chieftains in Lu's army paid their respects to Song Jiang, and the reunited units made camp.
The next day Song Jiang sent Zhang Jian to the Governor in Suzhou to be executed and his head hung up on display. Zhang Tao was disemboweled in front of the camp and his heart raised towards Heaven in a sacrifice to Dong Ping, Zhang Qin and Zhou Tong.
"I'm going to ask General Lu to go with has contingent to the Deqing County road," Song Jiang said to Wu Yong, "connect with Huyan Zhuo's column and come back here together, to join in our attack on Hangzhou City."
Lu accepted the mission, mustered his troops, and marched in the direction of Fengkou Town. Just as they arrived, they ran into the returning defeated forces of Si Xiangfang. A murderous battle ensued. Si fell into the water and drowned. What was left of his soldiers fled. Lu and Huyan combined units and returned to Song Jiang in the camp at Mount Gaoting.
The reassembled chieftains conferred. Now that the two main columns had reached Hangzhou, Song Jiang left control of Xuanzhou, Huzhou and Lone Pine Pass to Governor Zhang and staff officer Cong, who would keep the peace in all captured territory.
He noticed that Lei Heng and Gong Wang were missing from Huyan Zhuo's contingent. Huyan told him what had happened.
"Lei Heng fought Si Xingfang for twenty rounds outside the South Gate of Deqing County Town, and Si hacked him from his steed. Gong battled Huang Ai. Huang drove him into the stream. Horse and rider fell, and the southern soldiers stabbed him to death with their spears. Suo Chao split southern commander Mi Quan open with his ax. We captured Generals Huang Ai and Xu Bai. We drove Si Xingfang into the water and he drowned. Xue Dounan managed to escape in the confusion of battle. We don't know where he's gone."
Song Jiang's tears fell like rain at the news of the death of Lei Heng and Gong Wang. "Zhang Shun appeared to me in a dream the other day," he said to his chieftains, "and I saw to the right of him several bloodstained figures. I know now that they were the ghosts of Dong Ping, Zhang Qin, Zhou Tong, Lei Heng and Gong Wang. If I can take Hangzhou and Ninghai District, I shall ask the monks to conduct a fine service to ensure the passage of our brothers' souls into Heaven."
He had Huang Ai and Xu Bai delivered to Governor Zhang for execution. Of them we'll say no more.
That day he ordered that cattle and horses be slaughtered and gave a banquet for his army. The next day he and Wu Yong planned the division of their forces for the Hangzhou offensive.
Lu Junyi, with twelve senior and lieutenant commanders, would at tack the Houchao Gate. The twelve commanders were Lin Chong, Huyan Zhuo, Liu Tang, Xie Zhen, Xie Bao, Shang Tinggui, Wei Dingguo, Chen Da, Yang Chun, Du Qian, Li Yun and Shi Yong.
Hua Rong would strike Genshan Gate with fourteen senior and lieutenant commanders, who were, apart from Hua Rong himself, Qin Ming, Zhu Wu, Huang Xin, Sun Li, Li Zhong, Zou Yuan, Zou Run, LiLi, Bai Sheng, Tang Long, Mu Chun, Zhu Gui and Zhu Fu.
Supported by ten chieftains, Mu Hong would proceed to the camp in the western hills to help Li Jun assault the gates fronting on the West Lake. The eleven commanders were Li Jun, Ruan the Second, Ruan the Fifth, Meng Kang, Shi Xiu, Fan Rui, Ma Lin, Mu Hong, Yang Xiong, Xue Yong and Ding Desun.
Sun Xin and other seven commanders would go to the camp outside East Gate and assist Zhu Tong in attacking Vegetable Market and Jianqiao gates. The seven chieftains were Zhu Tong, Shi Jin, Lu Zhishen, Wu Song, Gu Dasao, Sun Erniang and Zhang Qing.
From the East Gate camp eight chieftains were chosen who would handle intelligence and logistics. They were Li Ying, Kong Ming, Yang Lin, Du Xing, Tong Meng, Tong Wei, Wang Ying and Hu the Ten Feet of Steel.
Song Jiang himself was to lead twenty-one senior and lieutenant commanders to attack along the road to Beiguan Gate. These commanders were Wu Yong, Guan Sheng, Suo Qiao, Dai Zong, Li Kui, Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, Ou Peng, Deng Fei, Yan Shun, Ling Zhen, Bao Xu, Xiang Chong, Li Gun, Song Qing, Pei Xuan, Jiang Jing, Cai Fu, Cai Qing, Shi Qian and Yu Baosi.
Thus, the gates on all four sides of the city would be assailed.
Song Jiang and his contingent pushed right up to the Beiguan Gate and issued their challenge. Drums and gongs sounded on the walls, the gate was opened, the drawbridge lowered, and Shi Bao rode forth to give battle. Suo Chao the Urgent Vanguard, impetuous as always, galloped out, waving his big ax, and engaged him.
After less than ten rounds, Shi Bao executed a feint and withdrew. Suo Chao, ignoring Guan Sheng's shout of warning, pursued. A flying hammer suddenly struck Suo Chao full in the face, knocking him from his saddle. Deng Fei rushed to the rescue, but Shi Bao's horse got there first. Before Deng could defend himself, Shi Bao, with one sweep of the sword, cut him in two.
At this, the monk Precious Light the National Advisor came charging out of the city with a number of fierce commanders. Song Jiang's unit, badly defeated, retreated north. Hua Rong and Qin Ming slashed into the pursuing southerners from the side and drove them off, then escorted Song Jiang back to camp. The victorious Shi Bao returned to Hangzhou in jubilation.
Song Jiang, in his tent in the Mount Gaoting camp, brooded over the loss of Suo Chao and Deng Fei.
"There are some very tough generals in that city," Wu Yong said. "We can only take it by guile, not by direct confrontation."
"We keep losing men. How do you propose to do it?"
"You've already arranged for our army to assault all of the gates. Hit the Beiguan Gate again tomorrow. The foe is sure to come out and fight. We'll pretend to be defeated and lead them far from the city. At the sound of a signal cannon, our other forces will then hit all the gates at once. Whichever one manages to break in will immediately set fires as a signal calling for reinforcements. The enemy soldiers won't know which way to turn, and we'll win a big victory."
Song Jiang directed Dai Zong to transmit the appropriate orders. On his instructions, Guan Sheng went with a small cavalry troop the next day to Beiguan Gate and challenged the foe. Drums pounded on the walls and Shi Bao again rode forth with a contingent. The southern general engaged Guan Sheng. They had fought less than ten rounds when Guan Sheng hastily retreated. Shi Bao and his soldiers gave chase. Ling Zhen Fired a cannon. At this signal, the Song troops shouted and attacked the city gates in simultaneous drives.
We'll tell first of the assault on Houchao Gate by General Lu Junyi with Lin Chong and the others. As they neared the city they saw that the gate was open and the drawbridge down. Liu Tang, eager to win first honors, galloped straight in, sword in hand. The soldiers on the wall cut the rope and dropped the slab gate. Poor Liu Tang. Both he and his horse were quickly killed in the gateway.
When Hangzhou became the capital in the days of King Qian, he built the city gates in three layers. The outermost was a slab gate, next was a two-leafed set of iron doors, and innermost was a large grill gate. As soon as the slab gate dropped behind him, Liu Tang was attacked by soldiers who had been hiding on both sides. How could he not die?

Lin Chong and Huyan Zhuo went back with their men to headquarters and reported to Lu Junyi. None of the Song troops had succeeded in forcing any of the gates, and all withdrew. A messenger raced with the news to Song Jiang in the main camp. He wept bitterly over the death of Liu Tang.
"Another brother gone! From the day we pledged brotherhood in Yuncheng County and went with Chao Gai into Liangshan Marsh, Liu suffered years of tribulation. He never knew any happiness. But he survived hundreds of battles and engagements and never lost his fighting spirit. Who would have thought he'd die in this place today!"
"That plan was no good," Wu Yong admitted. "Not only did it fail, but we lost a brother to the bargain. Call our troops back from the gates. We'll think of something else."
Song Jiang was very upset. He longed for quick vengeance and sighed without end. Black Whirlwind tried to reassure him.
"Don't worry, brother. I'll go out tomorrow with Bao Xu, Xiang Chong and Li Gun. One way or another we'll take that oaf Shi Bao."
"He's a remarkable hero. You won't even get near him."
"I don't believe it. If I don't nab him tomorrow, you'll never see me again!"
"Be very careful. He's no pushover."
Li Kui went to his own tent, poured out a big bowl of wine, piled a platter with sliced beef, and asked Bao Xu, Xiang Chong and Li Gun to join him.
"We four have always fought as a team," he said. "I just bragged to Big Brother that we were going to capture Shi Bao tomorrow. I don't want any of you holding back."
"Big Brother is always letting the cavalry take the lead," said Bao Xu. "We four must vow here and now that we'll show what our infantry can do. When we grab that churl tomorrow we'll be able to hold our heads high."
The following morning the four ate and drank their fill, took up their weapons and prepared to march. "Watch us slaughter them," they said.
Song Jiang saw that they were half drunk. "Don't you go throwing your lives away," he admonished.
"You underestimate us, brother!" Li Kui replied.
"I just hope you keep your word."
Mounting, Song Jiang rode with cavalry commanders Guan Sheng, Ou Peng, Lu Fang and Guo Sheng to Beiguan Gate. They beat drums, waved banners and challenged combat. The fiery Li Kui planted himself before them, brandishing his axes. Bao Xu, holding a big broad cutlass, glared wildly, waiting only for the carnage to start. Xiang Chong and Li Gun grasped their shields, each fitted with twenty-four throwing knives, and stood on either side with levelled spears.
On the wall, drums thundered and gongs crashed, and Shi Bao rode forth on a melon-yellow steed, carrying his Wind Splitter Sword. He was accompanied by two generals named Wu Zhi and Lian Ming. They advanced to meet their adversaries.
Li Kui was a man who feared neither Heaven nor Earth. With a roar, he and his three companions rushed Shi Bao. They were upon him by the time the Wind Splitter was raised. Li Kui swung his ax and broke the leg of Shi's horse. Shi leaped from the saddle and took refuge among his cavalry.
Bao Xu had already hacked Lian Ming from his steed, and the throwing knives of the two shield-wielders were darting everywhere like jade fish and silver needles. Song Jiang sent his cavalry in a charge up to the walls. They were greeted by a deluge of logs and ballista stones from the ramparts. He hurriedly called them back. He saw Bao Xu plunging through the city gate. Song Jiang could only groan.
Shi Bao was hiding within the gate. When Bao Xu came running in, he dealt him a slanting blow from the side that cut him in two. Xiang Chong and Li Gun quickly covered Li Kui and the three retreated. Song Jiang and his contingent returned to camp. His gloom deepened over the death of Bao Xu. Li Kui also wept.
"This plan was no good either," said Wu Yong. "Although we killed one of their generals, we've lost Li Kui's right-hand man."
Everyone was very depressed. Just then the Xie brothers returned with a report. Song Jiang directed that they speak in detail.
"I scouted with Xie Bao twenty or so //from Hangzhou's South Gate to a place called Fan Village," said Xie Zhen. "We saw moored along the river bank a line of several dozen boats, and went down for a look. It turned out that they were a convoy of grain vessels commanded by an administrator named Yuan from Fuyang County. We were going to kill him, but he cried and said: 'We're all good citizens of the Great Song Empire, but Fang La is crushing us with levies. If any man refuses to pay, he and his whole family are slaughtered. We've heard that the imperial soldiers have come to remove the blight. We want nothing more than to see peace again. We're sick of all this suffering!' "
"He obviously was honest, so we didn't kill him. We asked: 'What are you doing here?' He said: 'The counties received an order from Prince Fang Tianding to clean out the reserves of all the villages and hand over fifty thousand bushels of white rice. I was put in charge, and was on my way to turn over what's been collected so far—five thousand bushels. Because your great army has surrounded the city and there's fighting, we haven't dared go any closer, and are laying over here temporarily.' That's the whole story, General. We've returned specially to let you know."
Wu Yong was delighted. He said: "This is a Heaven-sent chance. Those grain vessels will serve us well." And he requested Song Jiang to issue the following order: "Let the Xie brothers lead a group of fifteen chieftains, disguised as boatmen and their wives. They are not to say a word, but mix with the crews and sail with them into the city. Once there, let Ling Zhen fire a volley of cannon shots. That will be our signal to move up troops as reinforcements."
The Xie brothers called Administrator Yuan ashore and informed him of Song Jiang's instructions. "As good Song Dynasty citizens you must carry them out," they said. "After it's over, you'll be handsomely rewarded."
Yuan had no choice but to comply. Many army officers boarded the craft and took over as boatmen. The original boatmen were put to other tasks. Wang Ying, Sun Xin and Zhang Qing changed clothes with three of them, and their wives Ten Feet of Steel, Gu Dasao and Sun the Witch disguised themselves as boatwomen. Junior officers manned the sweep oars. Weapons were hidden in the holds. The boats then sailed to the banks outside the city.
The Song forces were not far from Hangzhou's gates. Administrator Yuan went ashore, followed by Xie Zhen, Xie Bao and many of the boatmen. They walked up to the gate and demanded entry. Soldiers on the wall queried them, then informed the palace. Prince Fang Tianding sent Wu Zhi, who went out, counted the vessels, returned and reported. Fang ordered six generals to go forth with ten thousand soldiers and guard the northeast approaches while Yuan sailed in with his convoy. The chieftains and their wives, mingled with the crews, went in together. The five thousand bushels of grain were soon unloaded, and the six southern generals marched back into the city with their troops.
Song Jiang's forces again ringed Hangzhou at a distance of only two or three //and spread out in battle deployment. At the second watch, Ling Zhen went with nine cases of Mother and Sons small cannons to the top of Wushan Hill and set them off. The chieftains lit torches and started blazes in many parts of the city. All Hangzhou was thrown into confusion. They had no idea how many Song troops had entered the city.
Prince Fang in his palace was shocked. He hastily donned his armor and mounted. But by then the soldiers on the walls above the gates had fled from their posts. The Song units launched a massive offensive, all eager to gain glory in capturing the city.
Meanwhile in the hills to the west Li Jun, on receiving his orders, led his unit rapidly to Pure Benevolence Cove, obtained boats, and crossed West Lake. They landed near Yongjin Gate and began seizing each of the water gates. Li Jun and Shi Xiu started by climbing over the wall. In the darkness of night they engaged in mixed fracases.
Only South Gate was unbesieged. Through this the defeated southern army fled. Prince Fang, on his horse, couldn't find a single officer. Scurrying like a cur whose master has died, frantic as a fish dodging the net, he left Hangzhou accompanied by only a few infantrymen.
At the foot of Five Clouds Hill, they saw a man, buff naked, emerge from the river, a knife in his teeth, and leap upon the bank. Frightened by this fierce apparition, Prince Fang struck his mount and tried to flee. But no matter how he flailed, the animal refused to budge. It was as if someone was grasping its bridle.
The man ran up, pulled Fang from the saddle and cut off his head with a single sweep of the knife. The head in one hand, the knife in the other, the man then mounted Fang's horse and galloped towards Hangzhou.
Lin Chong and Huyan Zhuo encountered him just as they reached Six Harmonies Pagoda with their troops. They recognized him in astonishment as Zhang Heng the Boat Flame. "Where are you coming from, brother?" Huyan called. Zhang Heng didn't reply, but continued racing towards the city.
Song Jiang and his main force had already entered Hangzhou. He made Prince Fang's palace his headquarters. The chieftains in occupation were startled to see Zhang Heng galloping up. He rode directly to Song Jiang, rolled from the saddle, flung the head and the knife on the ground, kowtowed twice, and burst into tears. Song Jiang embraced him.
"Brother, where have you come from? And where is Ruan the Seventh?"
"I'm not Zhang Heng."
"If you're not Zhang Heng, who are you?"
"I'm Zhang Shun. Because I was killed by spears and arrows in the channel outside Yongjin Gate, a trace of my spirit refused to leave and floated on the water. This moved the Marsh-Shaking Dragon King residing in West Lake. He made me Lord of Jinhua and kept me on in his underwater Dragon Palace as a spirit noble. When you were breaking into Hangzhou today, brother, I dogged the footsteps of Prince Fang and, in the middle of the night, followed him out of the city. I saw brother Zhang Heng on the river, borrowed his body, flew up the bank, hastened to the foot of Five Clouds Hill, killed that scoundrel and hurried back to see you!"
He fainted dead away. Song Jiang raised him up. Zhang Heng opened his eyes. He saw Song Jiang and the chieftains, the bristling swords, the crowds of soldiers.
"Is it in the Nether Regions that I'm seeing you, brother?" he asked.
Song Jiang wept. "You loaned brother Zhang Shun your body and he killed the rogue Prince Fang. You're not dead. We're all very much alive. You're fine."
"That means, then, that my brother is dead!"
"Zhang Shun tried to swim under a water gate on West Lake and get into the city and set fires. But he was discovered and killed outside the gate by spears and arrows."
Zhang Heng wept bitterly. "Brother!" he cried and collapsed to the ground, unconscious. His limbs were rigid, his eyes closed. His seven souls and 3 spirits were uncertain. Truly, if he had not gone with the King of Hell's commanding general, he surely would have been called by Hell's Summoner.

Now when Song Jiang and Magic Messenger went to perform the ceremony for White Eel on the Bridge of the Western Mound, it was reported to the Southern Prince. He ordered out ten commanders to capture Song Jiang. Their forces were in two columns and each commander had three thousand troops. It was around midnight when the gates opened and the two columns swept out.
At just this moment Song Jiang and Magic Messenger were offering up the wine and burning the paper offerings. They heard a tremendous uproar below the bridge as Demon King and the Flautist on the left and Madcap on the right saw the lights and after lighting their own torches and dividing into two sections charged the enemy forces. When the southern troops saw that they had lost the element of surprise, they tried to turn back. Song Jiang's men harried both groups. One enemy column hurriedly crossed back over the river but were surprised beyond Baoshu Pagoda Mountain by Ruan the Second, Ruan the Fifth and Flagpole, who fell on them with a force of five thousand, cutting off their return route. One enemy commander was captured and another killed in the fighting. As for the other column, they were intercepted at Treaty Bridge by Iron Ox, Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost with five hundred infantry. The two shield-bearers charged into the thick of the fighting, with dancing shields and javelins bared, and quickly accounted for one enemy leader, while Pluto and Iron Ox cut down two more. Most of the southerners died when they fell in the lake and were drowned.
By the time southern reinforcements were sent out from the city, Song Jiang and his army had withdrawn into the mountains. They gathered at the Temple of the Holy Mystery and each man claimed his reward. Between them, they had captured more than five hundred good horses. Song Jiang ordered Madcap, Demon King and the Flautist to join White-Water Dragon and his party in defending the West Lake camp and prepare to attack the city. Taking only Magic Messenger and Iron Ox with him he returned to the camp at Look-out Hill. The Professor welcomed them into the command tent and Song Jiang told him: "With this plan of mine we've killed four of them and captured another, whom we shall send back to Marshal Zhang to be executed."
Song Jiang had not received any news from Lone Pine Pass and Deqing, so he sent Magic Messenger, with instructions to report back as quickly as possible. Within a few days he returned and told Song Jiang that the Unicorn had already captured Lone Pine Pass and would soon have caught up with them. As he listened Song Jiang felt half pleased and half apprehensive. He wanted to know how the commanders had fared. Magic Messenger replied: "My job is just to report on the battle. They gave me a full account and here is the official report. Only please don't get upset."
Song Jiang said: "Are you saying that more of our comrades have been lost? Don't hide anything from me. Tell me the whole truth!"
Magic Messenger said: "When the Unicorn tried to attack Lone Pine Pass he found high mountains on either side with only a single narrow path running between. Their fortress was built right on top and had a group of very tall trees beside it, visible from all around. Below were dense thickets of pines. There were three enemy commanders in the fortress. At first they came down every day and fought with Leopard's Head, until one of them was wounded by Leopard's Head's spear. After that they wouldn't venture forth, but shut themselves up in the fortress. Later on Li Tianrun and four others arrived with reinforcements. They all came down to fight next day and after fifty or sixty bouts the Little Duke killed the leader of the enemy attack with a halberd thrust. After this the enemy retired to the fortress again and would not come out.
"Our troops down below waited for several days. Finally the Unicorn, seeing that the pass was steep and rugged, sent Golden Wings, Redeye, Tiger-Killer and Big Chief to pioneer a route. Li Tianrun, who wanted to avenge his comrade, surprised them, charging down the mountain and killing Big Chief. Tiger-Killer was wounded but got away. But if help had been any slower in coming they would all have been done for. The remaining three were rescued however and brought back to the camp.
"Next day Twin Spears, impatient for revenge, rode to the foot of the pass and hurled insults at the enemy commanders. He was careless: a shot from the mountain hit him in the left arm. When he returned to camp he was unable to hold a spear. A splint was made for the arm and he was determined to go out again next day and have his revenge, but the Unicorn would not allow it. After another day the arm was better and without telling the Unicorn Twin Spears got together with Hotshot and the two of them went off without horses to climb the mountain on foot. On top of the pass Li Tianrun and another challenged them. Twin Spears was determined to capture Li and went forward wielding his two spears. Li met him with a long lance and they fought ten bouts. Twin Spears was full of courage but his left hand could not hold the spear steady and he was forced to give ground. As Li chased after him down the mountain he was attacked by Hotshot with a spear. He dodged behind a pine tree and Hotshot's spear stuck in the tree. He tried to pull it out but it was stuck fast and wouldn't budge and Li's spear caught him and knocked him to the ground. Twin Spears saw him fall and rushed in with his two spears but another enemy commander came up from behind and cut Twin Spears in two with a sweep of his sword. The Unicorn heard what was going on and rushed to the rescue but by this time the enemy had retreated up the pass and there was nothing those below could do.
"Finally Blackface and Auntie Gu disguised themselves as refugees and travelled deep into the mountains. They discovered a small path and led the Executioner, Spots, the Flea and the Daytime Rat up to the summit by this route. By midnight they had groped their way to the top and lit a beacon there. Realizing Song troops had infiltrated the pass the enemy abandoned their fortress and fled. When the Unicorn sent troops up the mountain, Blackface and Auntie Gu captured one of the original three commanders, the Executioner and Spots another and the Flea and the Daytime Rat the third. These three were all sent off later to Marshal Zhang at headquarters. The bodies of Twin Spears, Hotshot and Big Chief were recovered and buried there on the mountain. Some five miles beyond the pass the Unicorn caught up with the enemy and engaged them. He fought more than thirty bouts with Li and eventually killed him. The three remaining commanders fought on reluctantly and broke off as soon as they had a chance.
"The Unicorn will be here very soon," Magic Messenger ended by saying. "If you have doubts about any of this, General, you can read it all in the written report."
Song Jiang looked at the report but it did nothing to allay his grief. His tears fell abundantly.
The Professor said: "Since the Unicorn has won, we can now press home our attack. We will defeat the southern army here and then move to reinforce Twin Rods in Huzhou."
Song Jiang said: "You're right!" and ordered Iron Ox, Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost to take three thousand infantry and approach by the mountain route. Iron Ox went off pleased as punch. Meanwhile Song Jiang's force attacked on the east. He ordered Whiskers and his original five thousand cavalry to advance from the village along the Tangzhen road to outside Market Gate and secure the eastern approach. In those days the road east along the river was a mass of houses and cottages and wayside inns and the area beyond the city a vast expanse of fields and plots of land. When they came within range of the city the forces deployed, with Monk out in front. Staff at the slope, he swaggered up to the walls and shouted: "You fucking bastards, come out and fight!"
When those in the city saw that it was a monk who was thus challenging them they reported it at once to the palace. Learning that it was a monk who wanted to fight Precious Light stood up and petitioned the Prince as follows: "I have heard that on Mount Liang they have this monk called Lu Zhishen who fights with a steel staff. I beg Your Majesty to come to the eastern wall and watch me trade a few blows with him!"
The Southern Prince was delighted and ordered eight bold commanders together with Marshal Shi Bao to go to the wall near Market Gate to watch the master fight. So there were the Prince and the Marshal sitting on the watchtower with the eight commanders on either side of them to see Precious Light show off his fighting skill. This was an accomplished fellow:
He is dressed in a cassock of fiery red, his waist bound with a black and gold sash, a chaplet all of precious stones hanging at his side; his shoes are deerskin slippers with nine eyelets, his breast is protected by a special corselet fashioned from animal skins and he wields a monk's staff of solid steel.
The gates opened and the drawbridge was lowered and Precious Light rushed out with five hundred swordsmen on foot.
"So the southerners have got a bald fellow too!" said Monk. "I'll make the bastard taste a few hundred blows of my staff!" Wasting no time on words, he charged forward whirling his staff. Precious Light likewise advanced to meet him. As the two wielded their staves, what a contest!
Profound Wisdom is on the rampage, no room in that heart for benevolence; Precious Light is in a passion, no thought of mercy enters in there! Does the one respect the Buddha's law? Not likely! His thoughts are all of killing people at the dark of the moon. Does the other study the Scriptures? Not he! His entertainment is burning things down in a raging storm. The one, were he present at the meeting on the Holy Mount, would scorn the Buddha for twiddling his thumbs on the waterlily terrace; the other, were he standing before the Hall of the Law would snatch his magic weapon from the Guardian of Truth! One throughout his life has paid no heed to the doctrine of forgiveness; the other in all his days has found no time to acquaint himself with Holy Writ!
They fought fifty bouts and neither had the advantage. Up in the watchtower the Southern Prince said to Marshal Shi Bao, commander of his army: "I've heard what they say about Mount Liang's Flowery Monk Lu Zhishen, but it didn't occur to me he could be as fantastic as this. His reputation does not lie. They've been fighting a long time, and he has given away nothing to our master, Precious Light!"
The Marshal said: "I'm absolutely amazed too. I've never seen fighting like this before!"
At this moment a messenger announced: "There's another enemy force at North Gate."
The Marshal hurried off to see. Meanwhile in the Song ranks Pilgrim had seen Monk could not get the better of his adversary and feared a mishap. Unable to restrain himself he rushed forward whirling his two swords and attacked Precious Light, who, seeing it was two against one, put up his staff and retreated to the city.
As Pilgrim impetuously rushed after Precious Light, another enemy leader appeared on a prancing charger and bore down on him with levelled lance. They met at the drawbridge, where Pilgrim dodged and, throwing away one of his swords, grasped the shaft of his opponent's lance, dragged both weapon and man to the ground and with a single sword blow split his skull. Monk rushed in to lend a hand and the Prince hurriedly ordered the drawbridge raised, after calling his troops back into the city. Whiskers likewise withdrew his army to the camp three miles out and sent a report to Song Jiang.
That same day Song Jiang marched to North Gate to issue a challenge. Marshal Shi Bao took up his mace and mounted. With his sword in hand he had the gates opened and rode out to meet his foe. On the Song side Scimitar responded. When they had fought more than twenty bouts, Shi Bao turned his horse and galloped off. Scimitar reined in his horse and returned to his own ranks.
"Why did you not pursue him?" Song Jiang asked.
Scimitar replied: "Shi Bao's skill is every bit as great as mine. If he broke off the fight, it must be some trick."
The Professor said: "It's like Duan Kai said. 'This fellow is expert with the flying hammer. He deliberately turns his horse and pretends to be defeated to lure you on into a remote spot."
Song Jiang said: "If you'd followed him you'd surely have met disaster. Let us call in our forces and return to camp." He also sent someone to reward Pilgrim.
Meanwhile Iron Ox and his comrades with their infantry had gone to reinforce the Unicorn and on a narrow mountain path ran into Zhang Jian and his defeated army. They made a vigorous attack. Yao Yi was killed in the fighting. The two Zhangs got away and fled up the mountain by the same narrow path. Here they met the Unicorn and fierce fighting ensued till they fled by a narrow path into the depths of the mountain range. They were hotly pursued and had to abandon their horses and flee downhill. Suddenly from a thicket of low bamboo two warriors emerged carrying steel tridents. Before the Zhangs could offer any resistance they were stabbed with the tridents and carried off captive down the mountain. Their captors were of course Snake and Scorpion.

This capture delighted the Unicorn. He now joined forces with Iron Ox and his party. A meeting of all the leaders was held and they went to the main camp on Look-out Hill to see Song Jiang. When the loss of Twin Spears, Hotshot and Big Chief was recounted, all were deeply affected.
When all the leaders had paid their respects to Song Jiang, the armies were combined and marched back to camp. Next day Zhang Jian was sent off to Marshal Zhang at headquarters where he was executed and his head displayed as an example. Zhang Tao was executed right there in the camp, his heart and liver cut out and offered to the spirits of Twin Spears, Hotshot and Big Chief, as was proper.
Song Jiang and the Professor decided as follows: to start with, the Unicorn would be asked to march his army to Deqing in support of Twin Rods and his group. When they had joined up they would make plans to capture the town.
With these orders, the Unicorn gave his army orders to march, heading for Fengkou. There they ran into Si Hengfang, sent by the Southern Prince to relieve Deqing and now in retreat. The Unicorn launched a murderous attack and Si Hengfang fell in the water and was drowned. The rest of his force scattered and ran.
After the Unicorn had met up with Twin Rods, they joined forces and repaired to the main camp at Pavilion Mountain, where they saw Song Jiang and a general meeting was held at which everyone gave their opinion. Now that both armies had reached Hangzhou, Song Jiang left it to Marshal Zhang and his appointees to take over the administration of Xuanzhou, Huzhou, Lone Pine Pass and so on and to post notices everywhere reassuring the people. Of this no more.
Song Jiang had noticed that Sergeant Lei and Stripes were absent from Twin Rods' force. Twin Rods told how Sergeant Lei had fought thirty bouts with Si Hengfang at the south gate of Deqing and been chopped from his horse, and how when Stripes was pursuing Huang Ai across the river, horse and man had fallen in and been stabbed to death by the southern troops. One enemy commander had been killed by a blow of Hasty's axe, and two more had been taken alive. Si Hengfang as we know had been driven into the river and drowned. Only one southern commander had managed to flee with his troops and his whereabouts were not known.
Song Jiang's tears flowed freely when he heard they had lost two more comrades. He said to the others: "When White Eel appeared to me in a dream the other day, I saw three or four on his right covered with blood and in torn clothing. Those who appeared to me must have been Twin Spears, Hotshot, Big Chief, Sergeant Lei and Stripes, who are now of the company of ghosts. If I take Hangzhou and conquer the Ninghai Commandery, I shall ask many monks to perform a ceremony."
The two latest prisoners were sent to Marshal Zhang for execution. Of this no more.
That day Song Jiang had oxen and horses killed to feast the armies.
Next day Song Jiang made his plans with the Professor and the forces were divided up as follows for the offensive on Hangzhou.
The Unicorn and twelve others to attack Tidal Gate.
Colonel Hua and fourteen others to attack Mount Gen Gate.
The Unstoppable and eleven others to proceed to the West Lake camp, and join White-Water Dragon and his men in the attack on Lakeside Gate.
Blackface and eight others to proceed to the camp on the east and assist Whiskers in attacking Market Gate and Fodder Bridge. Eight leaders from the eastern camp, including Skyhawk, to liaise with the other forces.
The commander-in-chief to take twenty-one leaders and attack down the road to North Gate.
This was Song Jiang's plan of action for putting all the gates under pressure at the same time.
Song Jiang led his large force down the highway to North Gate, halted under the walls and delivered his challenge. Drums and gongs sounded on the battlements, the gate opened, the drawbridge was lowered, and Marshal Shi Bao rode out to take up the challenge. On Song Jiang's side, Hasty, impetuous as ever, brandished his axe and without more ado flew at Shi Bao. The horses clashed, the warriors battled furiously, but before ten bouts were up Shi Bao dodged aside and galloped off. Hasty gave chase. Scimitar hurriedly shouted to him not to follow, but too late! Hasty received a blow to the head that knocked him from his horse. Redeye raced to the rescue but Shi Bao was there too and before Redeye could strike a blow Shi Bao's sword had cut him in two. The monk, Precious Light, charged out of the city with several bold commanders, and the Song force was routed and fled northwards.
At this point, however, Colonel Hua and Thunderclap charged from the flank and drove the southern troops back, enabling Song Jiang to retreat to his camp. Elated by his victory, Shi Bao returned in triumph to the city.
Song Jiang's army withdrew to the camp on Look-out Hill to recover. The loss of two more leaders, Hasty and Redeye, weighed heavily on Song Jiang's heart as he sat in his tent. "If they have such redoubtable commanders," the Professor said, "we can win only by guile, not in a direct confrontation."
"When we keep losing men and commanders like this," Song Jiang said, "what chance do we have of defeating them?"
The Professor said: "When we have regrouped, attack North Gate again. They are sure to come out to fight. We must feign defeat and lure them as far away as possible. Then we'll fire a signal and all the units outside the gates will attack together. As soon as our troops break through one of the gates they will start fires. This will cause confusion and panic and victory will be ours."
Song Jiang sent out Magic Messenger to inform everyone of this plan.
Next day Song Jiang sent Scimitar with some troops to North Gate to issue a challenge. Drums sounded on the battlements and Shi Bao rode out and engaged him. Before they completed ten bouts Scimitar hurriedly withdrew. Shi Bao's troops gave chase. Thunderer fired the signal. As it went off, every unit of the Song army gave a great shout and all charged forward together.
When the Unicorn with Leopard's Head and the others attacked Tidal Gate they found it open, with the drawbridge lowered. Eager to gain the first honours, the Red-Haired Devil urged on his horse and sword in hand charged into the city. Those on the battlements immediately cut the rope with an axe and the portcullis fell. That was the end of the unfortunate Red-Haired Devil! Both horse and man died there in the gateway. You see, when King Qian built Hangzhou as his capital he installed three kinds of gate: a portcullis on the outside, a heavy gate with two leaves of steel in the middle, and a wooden grill inside. When the Red-Haired Devil rushed into the gateway the portcullis above him was quickly dropped. As the enemy had troops concealed on either side, he didn't stand a chance!
When they saw what had happened, Leopard's Head and Twin Rods withdrew to the camp and reported to the Unicorn. The attacks on all the gates had failed — all had been repulsed. A messenger was sent to inform Song Jiang in the main camp. On hearing that the Red-Haired Devil had died, Song Jiang wept bitterly: "He should not have died, this comrade of ours. He was present at the very first gathering at Yuncheng, he followed Chao Gai to Mount Liang; he lived through all those years of hardship and never had time to enjoy the fruits. He came safe through hundreds of battles, he never let his spirit be cowed. Whoever would have thought that he was going to die here today!"
The Professor said: "This plan was a failure, it was not the right way to go. It brought about the death of a comrade. Recall all units and let us make another plan."
Song Jiang was on fire, desperate to be revenged and appease his anger. His sighs were endless. Then Iron Ox, his lieutenant, said: "Rest easy, brother. Tomorrow I will go with Pluto, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost and by hook or by crook we will grab that bastard Shi Bao!"
Song Jiang said: "He's a highly skilled fighter. How do you think you'll even get near him?"
Iron Ox said: "Don't you believe it. I'll capture him tomorrow, or I will never see you again."
"Just be careful then. Don't treat it lightly!"
Iron Ox went back to his tent. He poured himself a big bowl of wine, got a big plate of meat, and invited the other three in to drink with him. "The four of us always fight together. Today I boasted in front of the Leader that we will capture that bastard Shi Bao tomorrow. I hope you're game for it."
Pluto said: "The Leader is forever sending the cavalry in first, this time let us make sure that we go first and let us go forward with determination to capture Shi Bao. We four will win a share of glory for ourselves!"
Early next morning, after drinking themselves tipsy, they took up their arms and were ready to set out after asking the commander-in-chief to come and see them fight. Song Jiang saw they were half drunk and said: "This isn't a game. Don't play with your lives!"
"Do not patronize us, brother," said Iron Ox.
Song Jiang said: "I only hope your deeds live up to your words!"
Song Jiang mounted and rode with Scimitar, Golden Wings, Little Duke and the Halberdier to the city's North Gate. Drums rolled, flags waved as he issued the challenge. Iron Ox, desperately impatient, stood in front of his horse gripping his axes. Pluto was there with his sword, staring ahead with bulging eyes, eager for the fray. Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost, their round shields harbouring twenty-four javelins, stood on either side, spears at the ready.
Now drums and gongs sounded on the battlements and Marshal Shi Bao on a horse yellow as a melon, grasping Wind-Slicer, rode forth with two of his leaders to face them. The moment they appeared, Iron Ox, who feared nothing on heaven or earth, gave a terrible roar and with his companions rushed at Shi Bao's horse. Shi Bao raised Wind-Slicer to meet them and immediately they came to grips. Iron Ox swung his axes and cut the horse's legs from under him. Shi Bao leapt down and took refuge among a group of his own cavalry. Pluto had swept one of the lieutenants from his horse with a sword cut. The two shield-bearers let fly their darts, which filled the air like a shoal of leaping fishes, or a swarm of driven leaves.
When Song Jiang led his cavalry up to the walls, they were met with a shower of wooden blocks and ballista missiles from the walls. Fearing casualties he hurriedly ordered them to withdraw. Unfortunately Pluto had already rushed the gate. Song Jiang could only lament. Shi Bao, already safe inside the walls of his city, saw Pluto rush in and with a sideways swipe cut him in two. Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost gave Iron Ox cover as they hastily retreated. The loss of Pluto left Song Jiang even more heavy-hearted when they returned to camp. Iron Ox was also weeping when he got back.
The Professor said: "This plan was no good. Although we've killed one of theirs, we've also lost Iron Ox's second-in-command."
Whilst they were thus reflecting on their woes, Snake and Scorpion came in to report: "Scorpion and I reconnoitred to within six or seven miles of the South Gate," Snake said. "At a place called Grassy Village, we found a string of several dozen boats tied up on the river bank. We went and asked what they were. They turned out to be transports provided by Judge Yuan of Fuyang. I was about to kill the crew, but they began to plead with me. 'We are all loyal citizens of Song,' they said to me. 'We were drafted by Fang La. Anyone who resisted had all their family killed. Now the imperial army has come to deal with him, we have been hoping that we could live in peace again. We did not expect to run into more trouble!' After that I felt sorry for them and didn't want to kill him. 'What are you doing here?' I asked Judge Yuan. He said he had been told by the Southern Prince to go round every district and commandeer fifty thousand catties of rice. So far he'd managed to get hold of five thousand and was on his way to hand it in but when he got that far he heard the city was invested by a Song army and dared not proceed. So he'd tied up there. When I'd found all this out, I came to tell you."
The Professor was excited: "It's a heaven-sent opportunity. Those transports will be the making of us. The commander-in chief must write out the orders for you two brothers to lead the party and take along with you the artillery chief Thunderer, and fifteen others. Disguise yourselves as sailors and don't speak. Mix in with the boat crews and when you get inside the city you can let off signal rockets. We will arrange for the troops to back you up."
Snake and Scorpion called Judge Yuan ashore and told him what the Professor wanted. "If you are loyal citizens you will support this plan," they told him. "If the business succeeds you're sure to be well rewarded." The boat commander had to agree, of course, and the party of leaders went aboard. The crews were retained for general duties but their uniforms were taken from them and given to Short-Arse, Blackface and the Gardener so they could be disguised as sailors. Steelbright, Sister Sun and Auntie Gu dressed as boatwomen and the ordinary soldiers took on the role of rowers. They hid their weapons in the holds.
All the boats were now brought in close to the bank, while units of the besieging Song army remained in the offing. The boat commander went ashore and Snake, Scorpion and the other so-called sailors went up to the city gate and called out. The guards questioned them closely and then reported to the palace. On the orders of the Southern Prince, one of the commanders opened the city gate and went down to the river to inspect the boats. When he reported back, the Prince sent six commanders and ten thousand troops to keep guard on the northeast while the boats were unloaded and the grain transported into the city.
During this operation the Song leaders mixed with the sailors carrying grain and the women warriors followed them. In no time at all the five thousand catties of foodstuff had been moved inside. The six southern commanders marched their men back into the city. The Song army had renewed its siege and was positioned about a mile from the walls. That evening in the second watch Thunderer took out nine "mother" shells, went to the top of Mount Wu and let them off. All the leaders lit torches and began starting fires everywhere.
In a little while the city was seething with rumours: no one knew for sure how many of the enemy were inside the walls. When the news reached the Southern Prince in his palace he was in a panic. He put on armour hastily and mounted his horse. The guards on all the gates had fled. The Song forces were full of energy, every man eager to do his best to capture the city.
Meanwhile in the mountains west of the city White-Water Dragon and his group had got their orders and were advancing. They seized boats and attacked from the lake, coming ashore at Goldenflood Gate. The leaders each separately attacked the water gates.
Green-Eyes and Madcap were the first to climb the walls. All evening there was confused fighting in the city, only the southern gates were not surrounded and it was from here that the desperate rebel army fled. The Southern Prince had ridden out to find his troops but could find none, so with only a few infantry he too exited through the South Gate, scurrying off like a dog kicked out of the house, darting away like a fish escaped from the net.
The Southern Prince continued till he reached Five-Cloud Mountain, where a man emerged stark naked from the river with a sword between his teeth and bounded onto the bank. The Prince beat his horse wildly, desperate to get away from this terrifying sight. The horse, strange to relate, refused to move, beat it as he might. It was as if there were someone holding its bridle.
The strange apparition bore down on them and dragged the Prince from the horse's back. With one blow he cut off the Prince's head. Then he sprang onto the horse and head in one hand and sword in the other galloped off to Hangzhou.
Leopard's Head and Twin Rods, as they were marching their troops toward Six Harmonies Pagoda, happened to run into this man and thought they recognized him as the Pilot. It was a big surprise. "How did you get here, brother?" Twin Rods asked. The man gave no answer but galloped straight on into the city. Song Jiang with his army had already entered the city and he had taken over the Southern Prince's palace as his seat of government, so it was guarded by his men. They all had a shock when the Pilot galloped in. The horseman rode right up to Song Jiang, then slid from the saddle and threw the head and the sword on the floor. He kowtowed twice and began to weep. Song Jiang hastily embraced him and said: "How did you get here, brother? And where is Ruan the Seventh?"
"I am not the Pilot," the other answered.
"If you're not the Pilot who are you?"
"I am White Eel. Because I was killed by arrows outside Goldenflood Gate, my spirit is obliged to linger there in the water. By the grace of the West Lake's Dragon Lord of Rain and Thunder I have received the title of 'Lord of Splendour' and are permitted to reside in the Dragon Palace. Now that you have captured the city, I, as a spirit, have dealt with the Southern Prince. When I was following him out of the city last night, I saw my elder brother, the Pilot, in the river and borrowed from him his corporeal shell. I came out onto the bank and killed this villain at the foot of Five-Cloud Mountain. Then I came straight back to see you." The moment he finished speaking he collapsed on the ground. Song Jiang himself raised him up. When he slowly opened his eyes and saw Song Jiang and the others, the forest of weapons all around him, the thickets of soldiers, he said: "Am I really in the underworld with my brother White Eel?"
Song Jiang said, weeping: "Just now you lent your body to your brother and he killed the villain Prince Fang Tianding. You are not dead. We are all living men, you can touch us and feel us."
"Are you telling me that my brother is dead?"
"Your brother wanted to swim through the West Lake and enter the city by the water gate to start a fire. Unfortunately he was spotted trying to climb the walls at Goldenflood Gate and he died there riddled with arrows."
With a wail of "My brother!" the Pilot fell to the ground unconscious. When they examined him, his limbs were lifeless, his eyes clouded, and his seven spirits and three souls had drifted far, far away. Indeed as they say:

You won't escape the hand of Fate;
The Reaper's always on your trail!

The Unicorn Lu Junyi Assails the Shezhou Road & the route falls to him; Song Jiang Battles on Black Dragon Ridge

At last Zhang Heng was revived, "Help him into a tent," said Song Jiang, "and give him medical treatment. Ask him what happened along the coast."
He instructed Pei Xuan and Jiang Jing to record the valorous deeds of the chieftains in the recent fighting. By then it was morning, and all had gathered in the camp. Li Jun and Shi Xiu had captured southern general Wu Zhi; the three women chieftains had caught Zhang Daoyuan; Lin Chong, with his long serpent lance, had run Leng Gong through; and the Xie brothers had killed Cui Yu. Only five of the southern commanders had escaped.
Song Jiang issued a proclamation reassuring the populace and rewarded his troops. Zhang Daoyuan was sent to Governor Zhang for execution. In a written dispatch, Song Jiang recommended that Administrator Yuan, who had contributed his grain, be appointed magistrate of Fuyang County. The governor issued a certificate of office with the name left blank. Of that we'll say no more.
The chieftains rested in the city. An aide reported: "Ruan the Seventh is here. He's come by way of the river." Song Jiang summoned him to his tent and questioned him. Seventh told his story.
"I set out with Zhang Heng, Hou Jian and Duan Jingzhu and our men, and along the coast we found boats. We sailed off Haiyan, intending to go inland up the Qiantang River. But the winds and tides were against us and we were driven out to sea. When we tried to get back, the gale capsized us, throwing everyone in the water. Hou Jian and Duan Jingzhu couldn't swim and were drowned. Most of the sailors managed to survive, but scattered in all directions. I swam to Haikou and got as far as Ochre Hill Gate, when the tide swept me to Banfan Hill, and I swam ashore there. I saw brother Zhang Heng in the river off Five Clouds Hill. I waited for him to come up the bank, but then he disappeared again. Last night I saw the light of the fires here in Hangzhou, and I heard the cannon. I figured you must be fighting in the city, so I swam here up the river. Has brother Zhang Heng come ashore yet?"
Song Jiang told him about Zhang Heng, then had him rejoin his brothers. He instructed the three Ruans to resume their duties as naval commanders. He also ordered all naval chieftains to gather their boats on the river and get ready to sail against Muzhou.
Because the spirit of Zhang Shun had appeared in human form, he built a temple to him on the banks of West Lake outside Yongjin Gate, calling it Lord of Jinhua and sacrificing there. Later, after defeating Fang La and earning honors, Song Jiang returned to the capital and reported Zhang Shun's feat. The emperor bestowed the posthumous title of General of Jinhua. The temple to Zhang Shun's memory has remained in Hangzhou.
Song Jiang was deeply saddened by the loss of so many chieftains since crossing the Yangzi. In the Pure Benevolence Monastery he had prayer services conducted for seven days and seven nights, dispensed charity, sacrificed to the spirits of the departed, prayed for their smooth passage into Heaven, and set up memorial tablets. After these good deeds were done, he destroyed all of Prince Fang's paraphernalia of rank and office and distributed his valuables among the Song army officers.
Peace was restored to Hangzhou, and the people feasted in celebration. Song Jiang conferred with Military Advisor Wu Yong on a long-range plan for the offensive against Muzhou.
It was by then the end of the fourth lunar month. Suddenly, the report came in: "Deputy District Commander Liu Guangshi has arrived with an emissary from the capital." Song Jiang and his chieftains met them outside Beiguan Gate and welcomed them into the city. At headquarters the imperial decree was read.

Vanguard General Song Jiang: You have attained great merit in the war to wipe out Fang La. We bestow 35 bottles of imperial wine and 35 sets of silk clothing as rewards to your senior commanders. To the lieutenant commanders we bestow bolts of satin.

The monarch only knew that Gongsun Sheng had not crossed the river with them, but not that they had suffered heavy casualties.
At the sight of the thirty-five sets of clothes and thirty five bottles of imperial wine Song Jiang's heart was stricken, and tears flowed from his eyes. The emissary asked him what was wrong. Song told him of the loss of the chieftains.
"The emperor hasn't heard," cried the emissary. "I shall certainly tell him when I get back."
Song Jiang gave a banquet for the emissary and Liu, attended by all the remaining chieftains, big and small. They drank the imperial wine and expressed thanks to the monarch for his kindness. The wine and clothing intended for the chieftains who had died were kept.
The following day Song Jiang took one bottle and one set of clothes to Zhang Shun's temple. He called his name and sacrificed the wine to him. The clothing he draped on a clay idol. The rest of the clothes he burned in sacrifice to the other departed chieftains.
The emissary stayed a few days, then returned to the capital. Song Jiang saw him off.
Ten or so days quickly passed. Governor Zhang sent a dispatch urging Song Jiang to begin his offensive. Song and Wu Yong invited Lu Junyi to a conference.
"To get to Muzhou, we go directly along the river," said Song Jiang. "To reach Shezhou, we must follow the small road through Yuling Pass. That means we'll have to divide our forces and hit two objectives. Which one would you prefer, brother?"
"The soldier obeys his general. Whatever you order, brother. I wouldn't presume to choose."

"Let's leave it to Heaven's will, then."
Song Jiang decided on the number of men for each column, wrote out two lots, burned incense and prayed for guidance. The two leaders then drew. Song Jiang picked Muzhou, Lu's slip read "Shezhou."
"Fang La's lair is in Bangyuan Cavern in Clear Stream County," said Song. "After you've taken Shezhou, brother, camp there and notify me immediately. We'll fix a date to drive on Bangyuan Cavern together." At Lu's request, Song allocated the chieftains. Thirty-six would accompany Song Jiang in his offensive against Muzhou and Black Dragon Ridge. They were the military advisor Wu Yong, Guan Sheng, Hua Rong, Qin Ming, Li Ying, Dai Zong, Zhu Tong, Li Kui, Lu Zhishen, Wu Song, Xie Zhen, Xie Bao, Lu Fang, Guo Sheng, Fan Rui, Ma Lin, Yan Shun, Song Qing, Xiang Chong, Li Gun, Wang Ying, Hu Sanniang, Ling Zhen, Du Xing, Cai Fu, Cai Qing, Pei Xuan, Jiang Jing and Yu Baosi. Seven senior and lieutenant naval chieftains would command the naval vessels going with the army to Muzhou. They were Li Jun, Ruan the Second, Ruan the Fifth, Ruan the Seventh, Tong Wei, Tong Meng and Meng Kang.
Twenty-eight commanders would support Lu Junyi in his assault on Shezhou and Yuling Pass. They were military advisor Zhu Wu, Lin Chong, Huyan Zhuo, Shi Jin, Yang Xiong, Shi Xiu, Shan Tinggui, Wei Dingguo, Sun Li, Huang Xin, Ou Peng, Du Qian, Chen Da, Yang Chun, Li Zhong, Xue Yong, Zou Yuan, Zou Run, LiLi, Li Yun, Tang Long, Shi Yong, Shi Qian, Ding Desun, Sun Xin, Gu Dasao, Zhang Qing and Sun the Witch. He would have an army of thirty thousand.
Lu departed on the appointed date after bidding farewell to Song Jiang and Deputy District Commander Liu. He and his troops wound through hill country, skirting Linan County.
Song Jiang prepared his boats, Organized his infantry and cavalry and assigned his commanders, on the day selected he dedicated his banners at a sacrificial ceremony, then set forth on land and water, war vessels and horsemen moving in coordination. A plague was rampaging in Hangzhou and six of the chieftains were ill and couldn't march. Two others were looking after them, making a total of eight who had to be left behind. The remaining thirty-seven headed for Muzhou with Song Jiang, following along the river first in the direction of Fuyang County.

We'll talk now of Chai Jin and Yan Qing who had departed from Song Jiang at Xiuzhou. From there they had proceeded to Haiyan County, gone by boat from the seacoast to a point past Yuezhou, then followed a winding road overland to Zhuji County, forded the Yupu and travelled to the border of Muzhou Prefecture. The officer guarding the pass stopped them.
"I am a scholar from the Central Plain," Chai Jin told him. "I know astrology and geomancy, I understand yin and yang; the wind and clouds, the Three Astral Glows, the Nine Schools and the Three Religions. There's nothing in which I'm not versed. I've come because I've seen from afar emanations of a new emperor emerging south of the Yangzi. Why do you block my virtuous path?"
Impressed by Chai Jin's high-flown language, the officer asked him his name.
"I am called Ke Yin, and I come alone, except for a single servant, to offer my services to your exalted country. I have no other purpose."
The officer kept Chai Jin at the pass and dispatched a messenger with the news to Muzhou. He reported to Deputy Prime Minister Zu Shiyuan. Advisor Shen Shou, Royal Inspector Huan Yi and Grand Marshal Tan Gao. They had Chai Jin brought before them and greeted him kindly. They were very interested in what he had to say. Since he had such a fine appearance, they were not in the least suspicious.
The prime minister directed the royal inspector to take Chai Jin to the palace in Clear Stream to meet the king. At that time Fang La had palaces both in Muzhou and Shezhou prefectures. The main palace housed the highest civil and military offices. The palace in Bangyuan Cavern in Clear Stream County was also such a headquarters.
Chai Jin and Yan Qing went with Huan Yi to Clear Stream where they were first introduced to Lou Minzhong the prime minister. Chai Jin held forth in elegant language which pleased Lou very much. He insisted on entertaining Chai Jin in his chancellery. He admired Chai Jin's intellectual attainments and propriety. Lou originally had been a teacher in Clear Stream County. Although he had some learning, it wasn't very high. Chai Jin's manner of speaking delighted him.
The following morning they waited in the palace for Fang La to hold court. In the throne room royal concubines and beautiful serving maids were arrayed in attendance. Outside in ranks were high civil and military officials, and before the palace stood the royal guards with their golden melon emblems. The prime minister then addressed the throne.
"I would like to present a worthy gentleman named Ke Yin from the Central Plain, the land of Confucius. Thoroughly conversant with the civil and military arts, he is both learned and courageous. He knows astrology and geomancy, understands the winds and clouds, can read the signs of Heaven and Earth, is expert in the Three Religions and Nine Schools. All philosophies are to him an open book. He has been drawn here by emanations of an imperial emergence. He is now outside the gate awaiting Your Majesty's summons."
"Let the worthy gentleman enter," said Fang La. "He may wear ordinary dress."
Chai Jin was called into the palace. He kowtowed, fervently wished the king long life, then was led before the throne. Fang La was favorably impressed by Chai Jin's noble mien.
"Where are these imperial emanations you've seen, sir?" he asked.
"I am from the kingdom of the Central Plain, Sire. Both of my parents are dead. I am my own sole support, and I live by the occult learning handed down from the ancient sages. Recently the Imperial Star has been very bright, casting its light directly on the eastern part of your Wu region. I therefore had no hesitation to make the long arduous journey. Here, south of the Yangzi I have again seen the five-hued imperial glow, and find that it rises from Muzhou. Today I am privileged to view Your Majesty's holy visage, your imperial carriage, your face like the sun—all manifestations of that glow. I am indeed the most fortunate of men!"
Again Chai Jin kowtowed.
"Although I possess a kingdom here in the southeast, my cities have been invaded and captured by Song Jiang's forces." said Fang La. "Now they are heading this way. What should I do?"
"The ancients had a saying: 'Easily obtained, easily lost; arduously obtained, strongly held.' After Your Majesty established your kingdom here in the southeast you conquered many prefectures. Although Song Jiang has invaded some of them, good fortune will soon return to this sacred land. Not only will Your Majesty's territory south of the Yangzi be secure, but in days to come your reign will extend to the Central Plain, restoring the Golden Age of Antiquity, exceeding the past glories of Han and Tang."
Overjoyed, Fang La directed that Chai Jin be seated on a satin cushion. He feted him at a royal banquet and gave him the title of Royal Secretary.
From that day forward, Chai Jin was very close to Fang La, and he deliberately cajoled and flattered him. In less than half a month every official inside and outside the palace was strongly attached to Chai Jin.
Chai Jin's fairness in everything he did before long won him still greater favor in the eyes of the king. Instructing the deputy prime minister to act as intermediary, Fang La gave his daughter the Princess Jinzhi to Chai Jin in marriage, and bestowed on him the title of Duke Consort. Yan Qing, who called himself Yun Bi, was made a royal attendant, and became known as Attendant Yun.
After his marriage to the princess, Chai Jin could go anywhere he pleased in the palace, and he knew all the inside stories. Fang La also consulted him on important military matters.
"Your aura is correct, Sire," Chai Jin often said to him. "It's just that you are being assaulted by certain stars. You'll have no peace for the next half-year. But when Song Jiang is depleted of generals, those stars will retreat and your reign will be restored. You'll roll up the foe far and wide, and you'll control the Central Plain."
"Song Jiang has killed many of my best-loved generals," said Fang La. "What can I do about that?"
"I have examined the night sky. The signs for Your Majesty show that although you have dozens of generals, they are not righteous and soon will perish. But Twenty-eight stars will come to replace them and restore your reign. Moreover, a dozen or more of Song Jiang's generals will surrender and join you. They too are stars in your destiny, and will be your loyal officials aiding you to expand your borders." To Fang La these were happy tidings.

*

Meanwhile, Song Jiang's army, having left Hangzhou, advanced on land and water towards Fuyang County. Deng Yuanjue, the Southerners' National Advisor, with four generals, was holding the pass with remnants of their defeated forces, and sent an urgent plea to Muzhou for support. Deputy Prime Minister Zu dispatched ten thousand troops under two of his most trusted commanders. One was called Bai Qin, the other Jiang De, and both were men of boundless valor. When they reached Fuyang County, they joined forces with National Advisor Deng and, together, occupied the mountain top.
Song Jiang's expedition had already reached Seven Li Bay, and pushed on, with the navy leading the cavalry. Learning of this, southern general Shi Bao rode down from the summit with his Comet Hammer and Wind Splitter Sword and headed for the foe. Guan Sheng was about to go forth when Lu Fang stopped him with a shout.
"Wait a bit, brother. Watch me fight a few rounds with the lout!"
While Song Jiang observed from the shadows of the arch of pennants, Lu Fang cantered towards Shi Bao, crescent-bladed halberd in hand. The southern general, grasping his Wind Splitter Sword, met him on the field of combat. They battled fifty rounds and Lu Fang began to weaken. Guo Sheng, also wielding a crescent-bladed halberd, galloped to his assistance. Fighting two against one, Shi Bao never faltered.
It was at this moment that the National Advisor sounded the retreat. He saw from the mountain top that Song Jiang's fleet, sailing the river on a favorable wind, had reached the shore and the men were already landing. Afraid of being caught in a pincers, he ordered a withdrawal.
But Lu Fang and Guo Sheng had no intention of letting Shi Bao escape. After they had fought another four or five rounds, Zhu Tong rode out from the Song Jiang position. Shi Bao couldn't handle three against one. He knocked their weapons aside and fled.
Song Jiang pointed with his whip, and his army charged the ridge. The southerners were unable to withstand them. They pulled back into Tonglu County. Pressing forward through the night, the Song army crossed White Hornet Ridge and made camp. At the same time the Xie brothers, Yan Shun, Stumpy Tiger and Ten Feet of Steel were sent to secure the east road, while Li Kui, Xiang Chong, Li Gun, Fan Rui and Ma Lin were directed to seize the west road. Each contingent commanded a thousand infantry, and their orders were to march on Tonglu County and capture the enemy installation. The armada was to continue its advance upon the river, captained by Li Jun, the three Ruan brothers, the two Tong brothers and Meng Kang.
By the time Xie Zhen and his contingent reached Tonglu County it was nearly midnight. The National Advisor was conferring with Shi Bao when suddenly they heard cannon fire. The southerners hastily mounted.
They saw the torches of three columns approaching at a rapid clip. Shi Bao fled, and the others hurriedly followed. None of them dared stand and fight.
Now the columns were upon them. Southern general Wen, who had been a little slow in getting on his horse, raced along a small path, only to be confronted by Stumpy Tiger and Ten Feet of Steel. The husband and wife team dragged him from his saddle and took him captive. Black Whirlwind Li Kui and his unit slaughtered and set fires. Song Jiang ordered the rest of his troops to break camp and move into the county town of Tonglu. There, Stumpy Tiger and Ten Feet of Steel presented their prisoner Wen Kerang and claimed their reward. Song Jiang directed that the southern general be sent to Governor Zhang for execution. Of that we'll say no more.
The next day Song Jiang moved both his land and naval units up to the foot of Black Dragon Ridge. Beyond the ridge was Muzhou. The National Advisor and his southern generals occupied the pass and stationed their troops all around. Because it was near the Yangzi, the pass was flanked by swift waters on one side and steep cliffs on the other, with fortifications above and a naval fleet below.
After making camp and building palisades, Song Jiang directed Li Kui and his contingent to go out with five hundred shield-bearers and scout the paths. But at the base of the ridge they were greeted by a shower of logs and rocks from above and had to return. Song Jiang then called half the fleet ashore and instructed Ruan the Second to take two assistants and a thousand sailors in a hundred boats and row, beating drums and singing folk songs, to a point near Black Dragon Ridge.
Fang La had a naval base there with five hundred vessels of war and five thousand sailors. They were commanded by four admirals known as the Four Dragons of Zhejiang. The top-ranking admiral was Cheng Gui the Jade-Clawed Dragon. His lieutenants were Zhai Yuan the Satin-Scaled Dragon, Qiao Zheng the Wave-Breasting Dragon, and Xie Fu the Pearl-Playing Dragon. Fang La himself had given them these names. The four originally were boatmen on the Qiantang River. After they joined him, he made them officials of the third degree.
Ruan the Second and his craft, travelling with the swift current, rowed to the shore. The four admirals in the naval base were already informed. They had prepared fifty fire rafts. Built of large pine logs they were piled high with hay under which incendiary fuses were concealed, and lashed together by strips of bamboo. The rafts lay waiting on the beach. As Ruan the Second, Meng Kang and the Tong brothers neared the shore, the four admirals watched for a while, then each waved a pale red signal flag and shoved off in four fast boats. They were dressed in ordinary garb.
The boats drew close quickly. Ruan the Second shouted an order, and his sailors loosed a volley of arrows. The fast boats withdrew. Yuan chased them towards the shore. The four admirals leaped upon the bank and ran, followed by many of their sailors. Ruan saw the naval base further up the beach and did not venture to approach. He and his men returned to their vessels.
Suddenly, a banner waved on Black Dragon Ridge and gongs and drums thundered. The fire rafts were ignited and pushed down into the river, where they advanced rapidly with the wind. Behind the raiding party large boats loomed up. The southern sailors on them yelled. All were equipped with long spears and grappling hooks, and they closed in, thrusting and killing.
The Tong brothers saw that the enemy was too strong. They beached their craft, crawled to the mountainside, then began climbing, seeking a path that would bring them back to their camp.
Ruan the Second and Meng Kang were left to confront the foe, alone. The fire rafts floated nearer. Ruan was about to jump into the water when a southern craft glided up behind and a grappling hook snaked out and nabbed him. Afraid that he would be humiliated if captured, Ruan the Second cut his own throat and died. Meng Kang also started to dive into the river. Cannons on the fire rafts all fired together. A projectile from one of them crushed his helmet and pulverized his skull.
The four admirals advanced rapidly on fire-spewing vessels. Li Jun, Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh were in the rear of the raiding party fleet. When they saw that their forward craft were defeated, and that the foe was moving towards them fiercely along the bank, they hastily turned their boats and retreated with the current. Abandoning their attempt to land, they returned to Tonglu.
On Black Dragon Ridge, National Advisor Deng and Marshal Shi Bao followed up the victory of their fleet by sweeping down the mountain. But the water was too deep and the distances from their bases too far for the contending forces to maneuver freely. The Song raiders went back to their Tonglu camp, and the southerners withdrew again to Black Dragon Ridge.
Song Jiang brooded in his tent in Tonglu over the death of Ruan the Second and Meng Kang. He ate and slept badly. Wu Yong and the chieftains could not console him. Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh, who wore mourning, finally came and spoke to him.
"Our brother gave his life for his country," they said. "That was a lot better than dying in disgrace in Liangshan Marsh. You're our Commander-in-Chief. You mustn't distress yourself. Concentrate on important national affairs. We two will get our own revenge."
On hearing this, Song Jiang cheered up a bit. The following day he mustered his troops and prepared to set forth once more. Wu Yong advised against it.
"Don't be impatient, brother. We must work out a good plan, first. Then it will be time enough to cross the ridge."
Xie Zhen and Xie Bao said: "We brothers were hunters, originally. We're well accustomed to climbing mountains and crossing ridges. Why don't we dress as hunters again, go up the mountain and set a big fire? That will throw a scare into those southern rogues. They'll abandon the pass and run."
"A good idea," said Wu Yong. "But that mountain's a dangerous place. It will be very hard to get up there. One slip and you may lose your lives."
"Since escaping from prison in Dengzhou and joining the band in Liangshan Marsh, thanks to Big Brother's fortunate aura we've enjoyed many years as gallant men. And now the government has pardoned us and we can wear silken clothes. If for the sake of the imperial court and to repay Big Brother we're smashed to bits, it won't be too much for us to give."
"Don't speak such unlucky words," Song Jiang cried. "I only hope we can win a great victory and return to the capital. The emperor will see to it that we're properly rewarded. You two must do your utmost for our country."
The Xie brothers went to prepare. They put on their tiger skin tunics, hung sharp knives at their waists, and took up their steel pitchforks. Bidding Song Jiang farewell, they set out along a path in the direction of Black Dragon Ridge.
It was only about the first watch. They met two junior officers lying in ambush along the road and killed them both. By the time they reached the foot of the ridge it was the second watch. They could hear the watchman's drum striking the hour in the southerners' fort above.
Travel on an open path would have been too dangerous. The Xie brothers ascended the steep side of the mountain, grasping vines and shrubs and hauling themselves laboriously upwards. The moonlight was as bright as day. When they had completed two-thirds of their climb they could see lamps glimmering on the ridge top. They hid themselves in a hollow and listened. The watchman's drum sounded the fourth watch.
"The night is short. It won't be dark much longer," Xie Zhen whispered to his brother. "Let's go on."
They resumed their arduous ascent. Soon they reached a sheer cliff face which required all their attention and the full use of their hands and legs. For this reason, they tied their steel pitchforks to their backs. One of these, caught by a vine, clanged loudly against a rock. Sentries on the top spotted them.
Xie Zhen, who was just crawling into a declivity, heard a voice above shout: "Got you!" A hooked pole reached down and tangled itself in his hair. Zhen hastily reached for his knife. The man above tugged. In an instant, Zhen was dangling free in the air. Panic-stricken, he swung his blade, snapping the pole in two. Poor Xie Zhen, a gallant half his life, plunged from the high cliff a hundred and ten feet to his death, smashed on the jagged rocks below!
Seeing his brother fall, Xie Bao began to climb down hurriedly. He was deluged by shower of rocks, large and small. Crossbow darts bit into him from a bamboo thicket. Poor Xie Bao, a hunter all his life, joined his brother in death near a bamboo grove on the side of Black Dragon Ridge!
At daybreak men were sent down to fetch their bodies. They were left exposed to the elements on the ridge.
A scout reported the news to Song Jiang. He wept so bitterly he fainted several times. He ordered Guan Sheng and Hua Rong to muster soldiers at once, capture Black Dragon Ridge and the pass, and avenge the four chieftains.
"Don't be impatient, brother," Wu Yong cautioned. "They died because it was Heaven's will. Rash actions won't win the pass. We need to work out clever strategy and shrewd tactics. Only then can we deploy troops."
"Already a third of my brothers are gone," Song Jiang cried angrily. "I can't permit those wretches to leave those bodies out in the open. We've got to bring them back, tonight, and give them a proper burial, in coffins!"
"The rascals are leaving them there like that with a purpose. You mustn't be rash, brother."
But Song Jiang refused to listen. He mustered 3000 crack fighters, designated Guan Sheng, Hua Rong, Lu Fang, and Guo Sheng as his lieutenants, and arrived at Black Dragon Ridge that very night. Around the second watch, a young officer said, "Can those be the bodies of Xie Zhen and Xie Bao there ahead?" Song Jiang rode up for a look. Suspended from bamboo poles on 2 trees were 2 corpses. A piece of bark had been stripped from one of the trees and on the exposed white of the trunk some words had been written. But they couldn't be distinguished in the dark of the moon. Song Jiang called for a glowing punk used to ignite cannon fuses. Blowing on it, he lit a lantern. He read the inscription: Eventually Song Jiang shall end like this. Furious, he ordered the bodies removed from the trees. Suddenly, on four sides torches glowed, drums thundered, and southern troops closed in. Arrows zinged down from above. Warships in the river were landing men on the bank. Song Jiang could only groan, completely at a loss. Hastily he retreated, but Shi Bao was blocking his path. He turned, only to find Deng Yuanjue charging his flank. Poor Song Jiang, he'd always been chivalrous, his nobility was as lofty as the eternal sky. Now disaster and death without burial stared him in the face. Truly, slaughter on a huge scale impended, the situation was fraught with danger.

When the Pilot heard that his younger brother, White Eel, was dead, he fainted from grief and remained unconscious for a long time. When he finally revived, Song Jiang said: "Take him to the tent to rest. We'll ask him later for his account of things on the coast."
Song Jiang got Sterling and the Magic Calculator to write out a list of everyone's achievements and a general assembly was called for nine o'clock. The White-Water Dragon and Madcap had taken one enemy commander prisoner, the three women warriors another, Leopard's Head's serpent lance had killed one, Snake and Scorpion had accounted for another, Marshal Shi Bao and four others got away. Song Jiang issued a proclamation to reassure the people, rewarded the army, and sent the two prisoners to Marshal Zhang at headquarters to be publicly beheaded. Judge Yuan, the bearer of tribute who had collaborated with them, was recommended for the post of magistrate at Fuyang and referred to Marshal Zhang for the appropriate letter of appointment. Of this no more.
While the leaders were resting in the city, an aide announced: "Ruan the Seventh has just arrived by river."
When Song Jiang summoned him to his tent and questioned him, he said: "I went down the coast with the Pilot, Ape, Yellow Dog and the sailors and we found a boat which took us beyond Haiyan. We were planning to make our way into the River Qiantang. Unluckily for us the wind and current were unfavourable and drove us out to sea. As we were trying to get back a storm wrecked our boat and we all had to swim for it. Since Ape and Yellow Dog didn't know how to swim, they drowned. With the sailors it was every man for himself, and they were dispersed in all directions. As for me, I swam towards the river mouth, but when I got to Redcliff Strait the current carried me towards Half-Tomb Hill. As I was trying to get back I saw the Pilot in the water near Five-Cloud Hill, but then I lost sight of him again. Yesterday evening I saw fires in the city and heard a string of explosions and I guessed you must be fighting in Hangzhou, so I came here along the river. Did the Pilot make it back?"

Song Jiang told him about the Pilot and then sent him to see his brothers. He put Ruan the Seventh in charge of the boats again and sent the water-borne forces back to the river to get their boats ready for an attack on Muzhou. Remembering how White Eel's spirit had appeared to him, he went to the bank of the West Lake outside Goldenflood Gate. There he had a temple built dedicated to the Lord of Splendour and made an offering there himself. Later, after Fang La was subdued and Song Jiang, who had earned much credit at court, reported these events on his return to the capital, the Emperor issued an edict conferring on White Eel the posthumous title of Commander of Splendour and sacrifices were made to him at the temple in Hangzhou.

But to return to Song Jiang in the palace: the thought of having lost so many leaders since crossing the river made him exceedingly gloomy. He went accordingly to the Temple of Mercy to arrange for the land and sea battle to be commemorated in a memorial service lasting seven days and nights, with a distribution of food for souls in the underworld and sacrifices offered up for their speedy release and the setting up of votive tablets. After the religious observances, the Southern Prince's palace was razed to the ground and all the valuables distributed among the leaders. Once calm had been restored in Hangzhou a celebratory banquet was held. After that Song Jiang had lengthy discussions with the Professor as to the best way to attack Muzhou.

Now, in the middle of the fourth month, they suddenly heard that General Liu Guangshi had arrived with an envoy from the capital. Song Jiang and his commanders went to meet them outside North Gate and welcome them into the city. They all went to the palace for the reading of an edict: "In view of the fact that Marshal Song Jiang, Commander-in-Chief of the expeditionary force, and his lieutenants have achieved outstanding successes against the rebel Fang La, we have awarded thirty-five bottles of imperial wine and thirty-five suits of cotton clothing to the senior commanders. The others will receive rolls of silk." The court of course only knew that Taoist Gongsun was absent from the force that crossed the river to fight Fang La, they did not know about the loss of the other leaders. When Song Jiang looked at those thirty-five robes and bottles he was deeply moved and could not hold back his tears. When the envoy questioned him about it, he explained about the losses and the envoy said: "The court of course knew nothing of all this. When I go back I shall have to submit a report."

A banquet was held for the envoy, hosted by General Liu, with the other commanders all seated according to their rank. The imperial wine was presented and all drank of it. The royal gifts intended for those leaders who had died were set aside and offered up to their spirits the next day. Song Jiang also set aside a bottle of wine and a suit of clothing for the spirit of White Eel. He went to the shrine to make the offering and dressed the clay effigy of the dead man in the gift robes. The envoy remained a few days longer and then returned to the capital.

Gradually the days slipped by and soon several weeks had passed. Marshal Zhang wrote urging the commander-in-chief to renew the campaign. Song Jiang and the Professor summoned the Unicorn for a meeting. "One lot has to go to Muzhou, advancing along the river to the viper's nest; another has to go to Shezhou by way of the trail over Sundance Pass. We now need to divide the forces between us for the attack. Which route would you like?"

The Unicorn said: "You are my superior and I am entirely at your orders. It is no business of mine to choose."

Song Jiang said: "All the same, we had better draw lots and see what is heaven's will." He had the two lists of leaders drawn up and then the place names were written on two papers. They burnt incense and prayed and then each drew one of the papers. Song Jiang drew Muzhou and the Unicorn drew Shezhou. Song Jiang said: "Fang La's headquarters is at Bangyuan Gap in Clearwater district. If you take Shezhou, you can make camp there and send word to let me know and then we will fix the day for a joint attack on the robber's den."

The Unicorn asked Song Jiang to apportion the troops. This done, the Unicorn, with a total of twenty-nine leaders and thirty thousand troops, took leave of General Liu, said goodbye to Song Jiang, and headed for the mountains beyond Hangzhou. The hard part of the journey began after Lin'an.

Meanwhile Song Jiang's army, after the boats had been made ready, the troops prepared and the leaders and men divided up, set out with waving banners on the allotted day for a joint attack by land and water, boats and cavalry giving each other mutual support.

At this time the plague struck in Hangzhou and several leaders were infected. These were the Pilot, Unstoppable, Comet, Crocodile, Panther and the Daytime Rat. Since they showed no sign of recovery, they could not join the attack, and the Irrepressible and Smiler were detailed to look after them. That meant eight leaders in all were left in Hangzhou. The rest accompanied Song Jiang on the campaign against Muzhou, thirty-seven of them, making their way along the river towards Fuyang.

We shall say no more of the advance of these two armies, but turn to Mr. Chai and the Prodigy, who after leaving them in Xiuzhou, had taken a boat in Haiyan, travelled via Yuezhou to Zhuji, crossed the river Yupu and arrived at the border of Muzhou.

When the border guards stopped them, Mr. Chai said: "I am a scholar from the central plains. I am conversant with heavenly geography and an expert in Yin and Yang. I know the six stations of wind and clouds and can analyse the heavenly bodies, I have a thorough knowledge of the nine schools and three religions, nothing is hidden from me. I saw from afar some form of heavenly emanation in the regions south of the river, that is why I come here. Why do you obstruct my path?"

Mr. Chai's speech seemed so extraordinary to them that the border guards asked him who he was. "My name is Ke Yin," he replied. "Master and servant we are and we come with none but friendly intentions."

The guard commander detained him and sent someone to inform the deputy chief minister, Zu Shiyuan. and three other important officials, namely Councillor Shen Shou, Secretary Huan Yi and Marshal Tan Gao. Someone was accordingly sent to take Mr. Chai to Muzhou. After the exchange of courtesies, Mr. Chai's eloquence, allied to his striking appearance, won them over completely. The minister was delighted with him and told Secretary Huan Yi to take him to Clearwater for an audience with the Prince. Fang La, you see, had established temporary offices in both Muzhou and Shezhou, but his central administration was at a place called Bangyuan Gap, in the district of Clearwater.

Mr. Chai and the Prodigy then accompanied Secretary Huan Yi to the Prince's citadel at Clearwater where they were first received by Chief Minister Lou, who was highly impressed by Mr. Chai's lofty language and powers of expression, and entertained him officially. The fact that the two men talked so well and were so educated and cultured, was already strongly in their favour. This Chief Minister Lou had once been a teacher, and though his knowledge was far from profound, Mr. Chai's eloquence impressed him enormously.

The following day at dawn the courtiers were drawn up waiting for Fang La to make his entrance, in the inner rank the wives, concubines and female attendants, in the outer rank four ministers and nine deputy ministers, as well as all the civil and military officials, followed by two ranks of officials, mace-bearers and courtiers. The Chief Minister now stepped forward and declared: "The Central Plain is the home of Confucius. Today we are honoured with the presence of a scholar named Ke Yin, who is conversant with both literature and warfare. He has abundant knowledge and is skilled in interpreting heaven and earth. He can identify six kinds of weather and explain heavenly portents, knows the three religions and nine schools, and of the one hundred schools of philosophy there is not one he is not familiar with. He has followed some heavenly sign here and is waiting outside. He offers himself to the service of our sovereign."

Fang La said: "Since this scholar has come to us, let him present himself at court in white robes."

The court usher relayed this order to Mr. Chai and escorted him into the court. Mr. Chai kowtowed and then stood up and saluted the Prince. He advanced to stand in front of the curtain.

Fang La recognized this man as someone outstanding, with his air of a true son and grandson of dragons, and was pretty well won over from the start. "You say you have followed a sign here," he said. "Explain yourself."

"My humble abode is in the Central Plain. I am an orphan. I studied by myself. I learnt the secret mysteries discovered by preceding scholars and the mysteries known to ancestral teachers. Recently I was making observations of the night sky and I saw a star of outstanding brilliance standing over the eastern regions of this land of Wu. I followed it here to its source, not shrinking from the trials of a long journey. When I arrived south of the river, I saw a trail of five-coloured imperial vapour emanating from Muzhou. Now it is given me to contemplate this august countenance, this truly lordly air, that shines more brightly than the sun and corresponds exactly to what the signs foretold. I can make no secret of my joy!" Having said this he kowtowed again.

Fang La said: "Although I rule over part of the southeast, at present Song Jiang has robbed me of some of my cities. He is advancing on us here. What should we do?"

Mr. Chai said: "In olden days they had a saying, 'Easily gained is easily lost, hard won means hard to lose.' This southeastern kingdom of Your Majesty's since its foundation has forged ahead like a mat unrolling, acquiring ever more districts. Although at present Song Jiang has seized some of these districts, fortune will soon turn again in your favour. One day not only the southeast but also the Central Plain will belong to Your Majesty."

This was all music to Fang La's ears. He offered Mr. Chai a brocade cushion to sit on, regaled him with a banquet and made him one of his ministers. From now on Mr. Chai was with the Prince every day and never failed to find flattering words for him. Within a couple of weeks he was everyone's friend, from the Prince down to his least officials. After this, having seen the justice of all his dealings, Fang La became truly fond of the man and asked the Chief Minister to open negotiations for Princess Golden Iris to be married to him. As royal son-in-law Ke Yin, alias Chai Jin, was given the rank of Master of the Rolls, while the Prodigy, who had changed his name to Yun Bi, became know to everyone as the Master's Man. After his marriage to the Princess, Mr. Chai came and went freely in the palace and knew all the goings-on, inside and out.

Whenever Fang La had some important military matter to decide, he invited Mr. Chai to the palace to advise him. Mr. Chai would repeat something like: "Your Majesty's emanations are correct, only there is a star with an adverse influence, it will take you six months to find peace. You must wait till Song Jiang has no more generals at his disposal. Then the malignant stars will withdraw and Your Majesty's enterprise will be back on track. You will make great advances and seize the whole Central Plain."

Fang La said: "But so many of my favourite generals have been killed by Song Jiang. What am I to do about that?"

Mr. Chai said: "I saw a sign last night. At present the indicators of Your Majesty's fortune are predominantly adverse but this will soon pass. Then the twenty-eight signs of the zodiac will favour you and your enterprise will be renewed. A dozen or so of Song Jiang's leaders will come over to you and they are the stars that will mark the start of a great expansion in your territory."

Fang La was well pleased with the answer.

We shall leave Mr. Chai to his role of royal son-in-law, and return to Song Jiang and the main army. They have left Hangzhou and proceeded to Fuyang. At the same time Precious Light and the other four southern commanders have marched the remnants of their defeated army to the pass guarding Fuyang and have sent to Muzhou for reinforcements.

Deputy Chief Minister Zu Shiyuan ordered two officers and ten thousand troops to reinforce the contingent guarding Fuyang. These two officers, Bai Qin and Jing De, who were both exceedingly brave men, joined forces with Precious Light and the others and occupied the mountains.

Song Jiang's army meanwhile arrived at Two Mile Bay. They were advancing with the water-borne forces in the lead and the cavalry behind. When Marshal Shi Bao saw this he mounted and took up his shooting-star hammer and star-splitter sword and rode down the mountain to challenge Song Jiang.

Scimitar was about to take up the challenge when Little Duke shouted out: "Wait brother and watch me have a few bouts with the villain." Song Jiang watched from the pennants' gate as Little Duke with his halberd took on the Marshal, while the latter brandished Wind-Slicer. After fifty bouts, Little Duke began to flag. Then the Halberdier urged on his horse and charged into the attack. Even with his one sword against two halberds the Marshal gave nothing away to the other two. Then, when the combat was still at its height, Precious Light sounded the gong for the southerners to break off. What had happened was that he had seen how with a favourable wind the Song war boats had arrived close to shore and were lined up along the bank. Afraid of being caught between two fires, he ordered a withdrawal. Little Duke and the Halberdier however went on fighting and would not let their opponent get away. The Marshal fought on for another three or four bouts, and then Whiskers rode out with his spear and joined the fray. Three opponents at once was too much even for Marshal Shi Bao and he knocked their weapons aside and made off. Song Jiang pointed with the stock of his whip and they charged over Fuyang Ridge. The Marshal's troops did not stop to take up positions till they reached Tonglu.

Song Jiang continued his advance till nightfall and they camped the other side of White Hornet Ridge. That night he sent a party from the east under Snake and Scorpion, and another from the west under Iron Ox to attack the camp in Tonglu, and ordered the boat captains to attack along the river. When Snake's party arrived at the Tonglu camp it was around midnight. Precious Light was planning strategy with Marshal Shi Bao when they heard a sudden report. There was no time for most of them to mount their horses. They saw fires on three sides. Together with the Marshal they all fled and no one tried to make a stand. One of their commanders did not even manage to mount his horse and fled on foot along small paths. He ran into Short-Arse and Steelbright, who fell on him and captured him alive. Iron Ox's party were busy killing and starting fires in the village.

When Song Jiang received the reports he ordered his army to strike camp and advance to Tonglu where they set up their position and stationed all the carts and horses. Short-Arse and Steelbright handed over their captive and claimed a reward. Song Jiang sent the captive southern commander off to Marshal Zhang at Hangzhou to be executed. That's the end of him.

Next day Song Jiang planned an attack by land and water. He assembled his troops below Black Dragon Ridge, which stood between him and Muzhou. Precious Light meanwhile led his troops up this mountain and occupied the pass. This pass over Black Dragon Ridge was close to the main river at a place where the cliffs were steep and the current swift. The enemy now held the top of the pass and the river below was guarded by their war fleet. Song Jiang's army camped not far off and built a stockade. Infantry commanders Iron Ox, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost were sent with five hundred shield-bearers to reconnoitre. When they got within range of Black Dragon Ridge wooden and stone missiles rained down on them and they were unable to continue. All they could do was go back and report to Song Jiang.

Song Jiang next ordered Ruan the Second, Flagpole, Cave Dragon and River Rider and to take some boats up the river. Ruan the Second took a thousand sailors and a hundred boats and with fluttering banners and beating drums and singing war songs they rowed towards Black Dragon Ridge. But here, with the mountain at its back, was Fang La's whole fleet. Five hundred vessels were stationed here, with around five thousand sailors.

The first four of Fang La's boats were commanded by the Four Dragons of Zhejiang. These four had been boatmen on the river Qiantang. On joining up with Fang La they had been given high rank. When Ruan the Second and his party steered out of the mainstream towards the shore, the four southern commanders in the waterside camp already had wind of it and had prepared fifty fire boats. These were rafts of pinewood piled high with bundles of grass within which were concealed gunpowder and incendiary materials, tied with bamboo ropes and lined up along the shore. Whilst Ruan the Second and the others were busy rowing shorewards, the four southern commanders were watching them from upstream. Each of them now waved a pink signalling flag and their four fast boats shot downstream. Ruan the Second ordered his men to fire their arrows, and the four boats turned back. He ordered an all-out effort to catch them. The boats reached shore. The four commanders and a number of sailors leapt out and ran for it.

Seeing so many boats moored there, Ruan the Second did not dare land. As he was wondering what to do, he saw flags waving on Black Dragon Ridge; gongs and drums began to sound and all the fire rafts were lit simultaneously and began to bear down on them, driven by the wind. On the bigger boats at the back a cry went up. Bristling with spears and grappling hooks, these boats followed on behind the fire rafts. Since the opposing force was large and the shore was near, Cave Dragon and River Rider steered their boats ashore and then abandoned them and began to climb the cliffs. Once on top they made their way back to camp.

Ruan the Second and Flagpole tried to face the enemy. The fire boats came on blazing furiously. Ruan the Second dived in and tried to swim round to the stern of the boat. He was caught by a grappling hook. Terrified that he might face the shame of capture, he drew his sword and killed himself. Flagpole saw it was hopeless and tried to dive in, but at that moment a fire boat blew up and the explosion smashed his helmet and made mincemeat of him. The four southern commanders came charging along after the fire boats. The White-Water Dragon, Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh, who were at the back, saw the leading boats were in trouble and managed to turn their boat about and let the stream carry them down to Tonglu.

Let us return to Precious Light and Marshal Shi Bao on Black Dragon Ridge. When they saw their boat commanders had won, they led their troops in a furious charge down the mountain. Reckoning the odds were stacked against them, the Song army retreated to Tonglu and made camp. The southern forces withdrew to Black Dragon Ridge.

Song Jiang fortified himself at Tonglu. Miserable at the loss of Ruan the Second and Flagpole, he sat gloomily in his tent. He could get no rest; his dreams were disturbed. The Professor and the others could do nothing to animate him. When their mourning was over, Ruan the Seventh and Ruan the Fifth admonished him: "Our brother has given his life for the country. Had he died in the Marshes of Mount Liang, it would have been a death without honour. It is your duty to lead us and you should not be upset. You must consider the cause. We will take responsibility for avenging our brother."

Song Jiang cheered up a little at this. Next day he gave out new orders for a renewed attack. "Do not be too hasty," the Professor warned. "We must have a plan before trying to pass Black Dragon Ridge." At this point Snake and Scorpion spoke up: "We grew up as hunters, we know all about mountain passes. We will disguise ourselves as local hunters, climb the mountain and start a fire. It will give the bastards a shock and they'll abandon their position."

The Professor said: "It's a good idea but I'm afraid this mountain is very steep and you may not be able to find a way up. If you should lose your footing you'd most likely be dead men!"

Snake and Scorpion said: "When we two escaped from prison in Dengzhou we went to Mount Liang and in the shadow of your good fortune we served a good many years with you as leaders. Later we received the imperial amnesty and were permitted to wear official robes. To sacrifice our own comfort for the state and for the sake of avenging our brother can hardly be considered too much."

Song Jiang said: "There is no need for such wild language, friends. We must aim to complete this business successfully as soon as possible and return to the capital. The court cannot be ungrateful. Just do your best, and serve the country well."

They went off to prepare their packs. They dressed in tiger skins, stuck sharp knives in their belts and carried their tridents. They bade Song Jiang farewell and set off along small tracks toward Black Dragon Ridge. It was already the first watch. Along the way they ran into two sentries whom they killed. By the second watch they were just below the pass. They could clearly hear the drum beat in the enemy camp. They dared not take the main route, so they forced their way slowly upward through creepers and undergrowth. It was a bright moonlit night, almost like day. They rested and then climbed. They could see a light glimmering on top of the ridge. At the last stage they stopped to listen: the drum beat for the fourth watch! Snake whispered to his brother: "There's not much night left, it'll soon be light. We'd best get on."

They proceeded on up. So intent were they on climbing, their hands and feet fully occupied, that they allowed the tridents fastened to their shoulders and trailing behind them to scrape against the undergrowth. This made a noise and they were spotted by the enemy on top of the ridge. Snake was negotiating an overhang when he heard a shout from above, "Got 'im!" and a hook caught him by the topknot. As he reached for the sword at his belt a jerk from above hoisted him off his feet. In desperation he swung the sword above his head, cut the hook and instantaneously plummeted into the void. Thus did the unfortunate Snake, a hero of universal renown, meet his untimely end, falling from this thousand metre cliff. His body was torn to shreds on the rocks below, jagged and sharp as wolves' teeth.

When Scorpion saw his brother fall he tried to retreat down the cliff, but rocks were raining down from above and crossbow bolts, fired from cover of the undergrowth. The wretched Scorpion also, the famous hunter, died riddled with arrows on Black Dragon Ridge. The two bodies lay there in the undergrowth.

In the morning someone was sent down from the ridge to bring the bodies up and expose them. Information about all this was retrieved by Song scouts and it was reported to Song Jiang that Snake and Scorpion lay dead on Black Dragon Ridge. The news caused him enormous grief and several times he passed out. Then he ordered Scimitar and Colonel Hua to prepare the troops for an assault on the mountain, to avenge their four comrades. The Professor warned: "You must not be too hasty, brother. Those who died, it was their fate to die. If you want to capture the pass it is no good rushing things. We really must have a good plan and use cunning to gain control of the pass. After that we can launch an all-out attack."

But Song Jiang was very angry. "Who would have thought that we would lose a third of our companions," he said. "We cannot allow those villains to expose the bodies of our brothers on the mountainside. I must make a sortie tonight to bring the bodies back and give them a proper funeral."

The Professor said: "I am afraid that exposing the bodies is a trick. Do not act rashly."

But Song Jiang would not listen to him. He assembled three thousand picked troops, to be led by Scimitar, Colonel Hua, the Little Duke and the Halberdier. They attacked that night. When they reached Black Dragon Ridge it was the second watch. One of the soldiers reported: "There's two exposed bodies up ahead. I reckon it's Snake and Scorpion." Song Jiang galloped forward to see for himself. He saw two heads stuck on poles on two trees and on the trees a notice with two lines of characters. In the moonlight he could not make out clearly what they said. He ordered a flare to be lit and blowing on the flame saw by its light what was written:

Here too ere long will Song Jiang's head be exhibited.

Outraged, Song Jiang ordered them to climb the tree at once and get the corpses down. At that very moment torches sprang up on every side of them, drums and gongs began to beat. A huge enemy force was all around. Volleys of arrows fell on them from the mountain above, and from the river below the sailors from the boats began to pour up the slope. Song Jiang could only curse his luck. He had no idea what to do. If he tried to retreat, Marshal Shi Bao had him; the way was blocked. If he tried to go round, Precious Light appeared and attacked him. It was truly after the fashion of one of those tragic tales of history.

At Muzhou, an Arrow Strikes Deng Yuanjue & Precious Light is snuffed by; On Black Dragon Ridge, a Spirit Assists Song Jiang by magic

In a stentorian voice Shi Bao shouted: "Song Jiang dismount and surrender! What are you waiting for?"

This greatly angered Guan Sheng. He clapped his horse and charged Shi Bao, brandishing his halberd. But before they could clash, shouts arose in the rear. The four admirals had mounted the bank and now came tearing forward, in conjunction with southern commanders Wang Ji and Chao Zhong who rushed down from the ridge.

To halt this assault, Hua Rong hurriedly engaged Wang Ji. They fought several rounds and Hua Rong retreated, pursued by Wang and Chao. Hua quickly shot two arrows in succession and brought both of them down. The Song forces cheered but dared not advance. Instead, they withdrew.

The quick disposal of Wang and Chao halted the admirals in their tracks. Hua Rong had stemmed the rear assault successfully. But suddenly two more southern units moved up on the Song flank. One was led by Bai Qin, the other by Jing De. Lu Fang and Guo Sheng rode out and engaged them. The four battled fiercely in a fight to the death.

Song Jiang was very worried. But just then yells rang out behind the southern forces, and they broke and ran. Li Kui and the shield bearer Chieftains Xiang Chong and Li Gun and a thousand infantry had smashed into Shi Bao's rear. When National Advisor Deng rushed reinforcements, his own rear was assaulted by Lu Zhishen and Wu Song. their blades hacking and cleaving, the pure iron staff pulverizing all in its path. With them were a thousand foot soldiers. And behind these were eight more chieftains leading a charge of mixed infantry and cavalry. From all sides the Song troops ripped into the contingents of Shi Bao and Deng Yuanjue. After rescuing Song Jiang they escorted him back to Tonglu. Shi Bao withdrew his forces up the ridge. In the camp Song Jiang thanked his chieftains.

"If you brothers hadn't come to my aid, I would have joined Xie Zhen and Xie Bao as ghosts in the Nether Regions!"

"You went despite my advice," Wu Yong reminded him. "I was afraid there would be some mishap, so I sent our chieftains to relieve you."

Song Jiang was profuse in expressions of gratitude.

On Black Dragon Ridge, Shi Bao and National Advisor Deng conferred in their camp. Shi said: "Song's forces are back in Tonglu at the moment. But if they sneak around the rear of the mountain, Muzhou will be in imminent danger. I wish you'd see the king in his palace in Clear Stream, National Advisor, and request him to send us reinforcements. Then we can hold out for a long time."

He mounted and rode to Muzhou, where he called on the prime minister Zu Shiyuan and said: "Song Jiang's army is strong. It can't be stopped. If they come rolling towards the pass, we'll be in trouble. I've come to request the king for reinforcements."

Zu rode with Deng from Muzhou to Bangyuan Cavern in the county of Clear Stream. There, they saw Lou Minzhong the prime minister and told him of their intention to petition for more troops.

Fang La the king held court the next morning. The prime minister, his deputy, and National Advisor Deng attended. They kowtowed, and Deng came forward and hailed the sovereign respectfully.

"This humble monk, on receiving your royal orders, went with the prince to hold Hangzhou. Song Jiang attacked with strong troops and brave generals. We had great difficulty in withstanding them. Then Administrator Yuan slipped them in on his grain boats and we lost the city. The prince was eager for battle, and he died in the fray. Marshal Shi Bao and I retreated to Black Dragon Ridge, where we are guarding the pass. Recently we've killed four of Song Jiang's generals, and he's rather shaken. He's camped now in Tonglu, but sooner or later he'll sneak along some path into the pass. It will be very hard for us to hold the ridge. We earnestly beg Your Majesty to give us more crack forces so that we may defend the pass, drive back the brigands and regain our cities. This humble monk has come specially to submit this petition."

"We've already allocated all the troops we can spare to our critical points," said Fang La. "We've just sent tens of thousands to the pass at Yuling, another place where the situation is tight. All we have left are the Royal Guards who protect my palace. I can't very well let them go."

"If you don't give us reinforcements, Sire, there's nothing I can do," Deng said. "There will be no way to defend Muzhou if Song Jiang crosses the ridge!"

Prime Minister Lou added his plea: "Black Dragon Ridge is vital. There are thirty thousand Royal Guards. Give the National Advisor ten thousand. I beg Your Majesty to consider."

But Fang La was adamant. He refused to send any of the Royal Guards to the aid of Black Dragon Ridge.

Royal court ended and the participants left the palace. Lou conferred with the officials. It was decided that Deputy Prime Minister Zu would dispatch a general and five thousand troops as reinforcements. Deng and. Zu returned to Muzhou together and selected a crack force of five thousand and a top-ranking general—Xiahou Cheng. Deng went back with these to the ridge, where he told Shi Bao what had transpired.

"Since the king won't give us any of his Royal Guards to repel the invaders, we can only hold the pass, but not go out and give battle," said the marshal. "The four admirals must firmly secure the river banks. If enemy vessels come, they can drive them back. They cannot take any offensive action."

Meanwhile, because his losses in chieftains were heavy, Song Jiang remained camped in Tonglu. For more than twenty days his soldiers did not venture forth. Then a mounted scout arrived with a report.

"Chancellor of Military Affairs Tong has arrived in Hangzhou with rewards from the emperor. He has sent General Wang Bing with rewards also to General Lu's army at Yuling Pass. Chancellor Tong will soon be here to make the presentation."

Song Jiang hastened with Wu Yong and the chieftains twenty li outside the town to greet him. When they were back in the county government center, the imperial decree was opened and read, and the gifts distributed among the chieftains. Song Jiang and the others paid their respects to Chancellor Tong and gave a banquet in his honor.

"During my journey here I heard your losses were severe," said Tong.

Song Jiang replied with tears in his eyes. "When I went with Commissioner Zhao on the northern expedition against the Liao Tartars, we were victorious and didn't lose a single commander. But in this campaign against Fang La, even before we departed from the capital Gongsun Sheng left us. The emperor has retained several of our chieftains. After crossing the Yangzi, at each place we attacked we lost a few more. Recently, eight or nine have fallen ill in Hangzhou, and there's no guarantee they'll survive. We fought twice at Black Dragon Ridge, and lost another few. That sector is a combination of dangerous mountains and swift waters, a difficult place in which to battle. We haven't been able to break into the pass no matter how we've tried. How fortunate that your benevolent presence should come among us just when we were most distressed!"

"The emperor knows of your great accomplishments," said Tong. "He's heard also of your losses, and therefore has dispatched me, with Generals Wang Bing and Zhao Tan, to assist you. I've sent Wang to General Lu's camp to distribute part of the rewards there."

He introduced Zhao Tan to Song Jiang. The new-comers made their quarters in Tonglu Town, and were feted by their hosts.

The next day, in preparation for an assault on the ridge and the pass, Chancellor Tong mustered the troops. Wu Yong urged restraint.

"You must be cautious, Excellency. Let us send Yan Shun and Ma Lin along secluded paths to find some villager who can tell us of a route to the other side of the pass. Then we'll be able to launch a pincers' attack. The foe won't be able to cope with two fronts at once. We'll take the pass as easily as spitting on our hands."

"An excellent idea!" Song Jiang agreed.

He dispatched the two chieftains with a few dozen stalwarts to scour the countryside for an informant. In the evening they returned with an old man.

"Who is he?" asked Song Jiang.

"A local person," said Ma Lin. "He knows the mountain paths well."

"Old fellow," said Song Jiang, "if you can lead us past Black Dragon Ridge I'll reward you handsomely.

"My family have been ordinary residents around here for generations," the old man said, "but Fang La is oppressing us cruelly and we have no place to hide. Fortunately, the emperor's soldiers have come and the people can have peace again, I'll take you beyond the ridge to Dongguan Town. Muzhou isn't far beyond. Near the city's North Gate, you swing around past the West Gate, and there's Black Dragon Ridge."

Song Jiang was delighted. He directed that the old guide be given silver and kept in the camp. He had him served food and wine.

"Hold Tonglu County." Song Jiang requested Chancellor Tong the following day. "I will go out with our troops near Muzhou and hit the ridge and the pass from both sides. We'll take them all right."

On Chancellor Tong's instructions, Song Jiang divided his forces into two columns. With twelve chieftains, he marched off along a path. Tong led the other column openly down the road.

Song Jiang had a contingent of ten thousand. Guided by the old man they moved silently, the bridles of the horses muffled, the men biting stick gags. Halfway up the slope, they were intercepted by enemy soldiers. At Song Jiang's order, Li Kui, Xiang Chong, Li Gun and their man charged. They annihilated all four or five hundred of the foe.

Around the fourth watch the column reached Dongguan Town. Wu Yingxing the garrison commander had only three thousand troops. They couldn't possibly hold out against Song Jiang's overwhelming numbers. They left in a rush and returned to Muzhou. Wu reported to Deputy Prime Minister Zu.

"Song Jiang's army has slipped past Black Dragon Ridge and is already at Dongguan."

Zu was shocked. He hurriedly called his generals into conference.

Meanwhile, on Song Jiang's instructions, cannoneer Ling Zhen fired off a volley, startling Shi Bao in the fort on the ridge. He sent Bai Qin and a detachment out to scout. They saw the banners of Song Jiang carpeting the plains and wooded slopes. They hastily returned to the fort and Bai Qin reported to Shi Bao.

"Since the king won't give us any reinforcements, we can only hold the pass," said Shi Bao. "We can't go to the rescue."

"You're making a mistake, Marshal!" Deng the National Advisor remonstrated. "Whether or not you aid Muzhou is up to you. But if the palace falls, there'll be no guarantee for any of us. Stay here if you like. I'm going to Muzhou!"

Shi Bao's urgings that he remain were useless. Deng mustered five thousand soldiers, took up his Buddhist staff, and departed with General Xiahou down the ridge.

Song Jiang's contingent at Dongguan, instead of driving on Muzhou, went first to assault the ridge and the pass, and ran directly into National Advisor Deng's force. As the two units neared each other, Deng rode forward and challenged individual combat. Hua Rong leaned close and whispered into Song Jiang's ear. Song Jiang nodded his agreement. He summoned Qin Ming and the three conferred. Then Qin Ming cantered out to meet Deng.

Fifty or sixty rounds they fought. Qin Ming turned and fled, and the Song army scattered. Thinking he had defeated Qin Ming, Deng abandoned him and galloped to capture Song Jiang.

Hua Rong was all prepared. Protecting Song Jiang, he waited until the National Advisor came near. Then he drew his bow to the full, aimed, and let fly. The arrow streaked like a comet into Deng's face and knocked him from his horse. The Song soldiers immediately closed in and killed him.

A wild and bloody battle ensued, and the southern troops were badly defeated. General Xiahou couldn't withstand the foe. He fled to Muzhou. Song Jiang's column raced to Black Dragon Ridge. But a rain of logs and ballista stones drove them back. Song Jiang turned his unit abruptly and headed for Muzhou.

Xiahou, in the southern capital, told Deputy Prime Minister Zu: "The Song army has passed Dongguan, killed National Advisor Deng, and will be here today!" Zu immediately deputed a man to go with Xiahou to Clear Stream and tell the prime minister. Lou relayed the information to the king.

"The Song army is already beyond Dongguan and is hurrying to attack Muzhou. We beg Your Majesty to dispatch troops quickly, or all will be lost."

Fang La was astonished. He hastily summoned Marshal Zheng Biao to the palace, gave him fifteen thousand of the Royal Guards, and ordered him to reinforce Muzhou that same night.

"I shall obey your decree, Sire," said Zheng. "But I request that the Royal Astrologer go with us. In that way we shall be able to defeat Song Jiang."

The king agreed and summoned Bao Daoyi the royal astrologer. With palms pressed together, Bao bowed before the throne.

"Song Jiang and his army have invaded our territory and destroyed our cities, our troops and our generals. Even now they are marching on Muzhou," said Fang La. "We hope you will work your magic, save our country and people, and preserve our land."

"Set your mind at ease, Sire." said Bao. "Though I am not talented, I do have a little learning. With the aid of Your Majesty's powerful good fortune, I shall sweep the ground with Song Jiang's army, and they shall lie everywhere dead and unburied."

Very pleased, Fang La feted the astrologer. After the banquet, Bao bid the king farewell. Then he conferred on tactics with Zheng and Xiahou.

This Bao Daoyi hailed from the Jinhua Mountains. He became a priest very young, and studied the unorthodox school of Taoism. Later, he threw his lot in with Fang La, turned schemer and rebel, posed evil for righteousness and, whenever engaged in battle, used his wicked magic to harm others. He had a precious sword called the Occult Universe which could fly a hundred paces and kill a man. As a reward for his help in unvirtuous activities, Fang La named him Able Royal Astrologer.

Zheng Biao had been a constable in Lanxi County, Wuzhou Prefecture, and was a skilled wielder of spear and staff. After joining Fang La he was appointed Marshal of the Royal Guards. Entranced by Taoist magic, he became a disciple of Bao the Royal Astrologer, and learned many spells from him. Because whenever he was fighting to the death he could produce a mystic cloud, everyone called him Zheng the Prince of Demons.

Xiahou also was from the Wuzhou hills. He started life as a hunter, and was good with a steel pitchfork. He was part of the entourage of Deputy Prime Minister Zu ruling Muzhou.

Now, the three were conferring in the headquarters of the Royal Guards. The gate-keeper announced that the eunuch Pu Wenying had come to call on the Royal Astrologer.

Pu entered and said: "I have heard that you are considering how to cope with the Song army. Last night I examined the sky. The stars of the southern generals all are lusterless, while the stars of half of Song Jiang's generals are bright. Although it's good that you march against the foe, Royal Astrologer, I'm afraid you're doomed to failure. It would be better if you petitioned the king to discuss terms of surrender, and save the country from calamity."

Furious, Bao whipped out his Occult Universe sword and, with one blow, cleaved Pu Wenying in two. He hurriedly reported the incident to the king in writing. Of that we'll say no more.

Then, the vanguard under Zheng Biao left Clear Stream. Bao followed with the central unit, Xiahou brought up the rear. They marched to save Muzhou.

Song Jiang's forces assailed Muzhou without any fixed plan. A mounted scout reported that reinforcements from Clear Stream had arrived for the beleaguered southerners. Song Jiang sent Stumpy Tiger Wang and his wife Ten Feet of Steel out with a patrol of three thousand cavalry to confront the foe. They met on the Clear Stream road, and Zheng Biao rode forth to engage Stumpy Tiger. Without exchanging a word they fought eight or nine rounds.

Zheng muttered an incantation under his breath, and shouted: "Speed!" A cloud of black vapor spewed from the top of his helmet. In the cloud stood a Heavenly spirit in golden armor, raising a Demon-Smiting precious cudgel. Panic-stricken, Stumpy Tiger floundered, and Zheng ran him through with his lance.

When Ten Feet of Steel saw her husband fall from the saddle, she charged Zheng brandishing her two steel-blue swords. They fought briefly and Zheng turned and galloped away. Burning for vengeance, the girl raced after him. Zheng put aside his lance and, from a silken pouch, drew out a gold-plated bronze brick. Suddenly he twisted around and flung it at his pursuer's forehead. It struck squarely, and Ten Feet of Steel fell dead to the ground. Poor beautiful female warrior, her life was gone like a dream of spring!

Zheng the Prince of Demons pressed his advantage to drive back the Song patrol. The northerners were badly defeated. They returned and reported to Song Jiang that Stumpy Tiger and Ten Feet of Steel had been killed by Zheng Biao, and that the patrol had lost more than half its effectives.

Enraged by the death of his two chieftains, Song Jiang mustered five thousand men and rode out to battle, accompanied by Li Kui, Xiang Chong and Li Gun. They soon were within sight of Zheng the Prince of Demons and his contingent. Song Jiang cantered forward and shouted at Zheng angrily.

"Rebellious bandit, how dare you kill two of my chieftains!"

Zheng rode towards him with levelled lance. This infuriated Li Kui. Swinging his axes, Black Whirlwind raced out, covered by Xiang Chong and Li Gun, who also ran at Zheng twirling their shields. The Prince of Demons turned and fled, with the three hotly pursuing him, directly into the southerners' position. Fearful for Li Kui's safety, Song Jiang threw in another five thousand troops. The southerners broke and scattered.

Song Jiang had the trumpeters blow the call to reassemble. The two shield chieftains, escorting Li Kui back, suddenly found themselves enveloped in a black cloud that obscured the sky. They couldn't tell north from south, day from night. Song Jiang's army lost its sense of direction completely. Zheng the Prince of Demons had imposed a spell. The Song forces, unable to see a thing, began floundering about.

Song Jiang raised his face to Heaven and cried: "Am I really doomed to die in this place!"

By then it was already afternoon, and the cloud broke up and the mist dissolved. All around Song Jiang saw huge fellows in golden armor surrounding them in ranks. The Song forces prostrated themselves and waited for death. Song Jiang dismounted and surrendered.

"Kill me quickly," he exclaimed. He crouched on the ground. He heard the sound of wind and rain, but he saw no one.

His officers and men covered their faces and waited for the thrusts that would finish them. But soon the wind and rain passed, and no blades descended.

A hand grasped Song Jiang and a voice said: "Arise, please!"

Song Jiang lifted his head and looked. Standing before him was a scholar. Astonished, Song Jiang scrambled to his feet and bowed.

"Who are you, sir?"

"My name is Shao Jun. I'm a native of these parts. I've come specially to inform you, righteous warrior—Fang La's number is nearly up. In only ten more days he'll be destroyed. I have expended myself several times on your behalf. Although you've suffered some difficulties today, relief will soon be here. Are you aware of that, righteous warrior?"

"When, exactly, can we capture Fang La, sir?"

The scholar gave him a push, and Song Jiang awakened. It had all been a dream. The huge fellows he had seen surrounding them were only pine trees, gilded by the sun.

He shouted for his chieftains to get up and find a road. The cloud and mist were gone, the sky was clear. Beyond the pines, yells were heard. Song Jiang led his men quickly in that direction. There was Lu Zhishen and Wu Song, about to engage Zheng Biao.

Royal Astrologer Bao, watching from his horse, saw Wu Song striding towards Zheng with a pair of swords. He pulled his Occult Universe sword from its scabbard and flung it. The blade bit into Wu Song's arm so deeply he fainted from loss of blood. Lu Zhishen, enraged, barged in with his iron staff. By the time be rescued his companion, Wu Song's arm was dangling inert, but they had captured Zheng's mystic sword. Wu Song regained consciousness. With one slice of his knife, he cut off the useless left limb. Song Jiang ordered that he be carried back to camp to recuperate.

Lu Zhishen, who had barged right through to the rear of the enemy unit, now engaged General Xiahou. The two fought several rounds, and Xiahou left in defeat. Zhishen ploughed into the southern soldiers with his Buddhist staff. They fled in every direction. Xiahou headed for the wooded mountains. Zhishen pursued him tenaciously into their depths. Zheng the Prince of Demons and his troops came hurrying towards the Song contingent, Li Kui, Xiang Chong and Li Gun, with twirling shields, flying knives, swift javelins and mighty axes, rushed to meet them. Unable to stem the assault, Zheng retreated over hills and waterways. The three pursuers, although they were unfamiliar with the terrain, wanted to distinguish themselves before Song Jiang, and gave headlong chase across a stream.

On the west bank, three thousand southern soldiers suddenly blocked their path. Xiang Chong hastily turned to go back, only to find his retreat cut off at the shore by two southern commanders. He called to Black Whirlwind and Li Gun, but they were already well beyond in their pursuit of Zheng Biao.

Li Gun, fording another stream ahead, stepped unexpectedly into a deep hole and fell. He was immediately riddled by arrows and killed. Xiang Chong, as he attempted to plunge down the bank, was tripped up by a rope. Before he could struggle to his feet, southern soldiers swarmed all over him and hacked him to mincemeat.

Poor Li Gun and Xiang Chong, what chance had they to display their heroism! That left only Li Kui, continuing the chase into the mountains.

Meanwhile, the Song unit at the shore pushed across. Before they had gone half a li they heard shouts behind them. Hua Rong. Qin Ming and Fan Rui had caught up with reinforcements. Together, they smashed the southerners, drove into mountains and rescued Li Kui. Only Lu Zhishen was nowhere to be seen.

They returned and told Song Jiang what had happened. He wept bitterly. A count of his troops revealed he had lost about half. Lu Zhishen was missing, and Wu Song was minus a left arm.

A mounted scout announced: "Military Advisor Wu Yong has come by water with ten thousand troops."

Wu Yong arrived and explained: "Chancellor of Military Affairs Tong and his column have joined forces with the units under Generals Wang Bing, Zhao Tan and Liu Guangshi, and all are at the foot of Black Dragon Ridge. Only thirteen chieftains have been left behind. The remainder are here with me."

Song Jiang told him of their losses, adding: "Wu Song is a cripple, and nobody knows what's become of Lu Zhishen. Is it any wonder I'm heartsore!"

"Take a broad view, brother," Wu Yong urged. "This is the time to capture Fang La. It's a matter of major national importance. You mustn't let your distress over our brothers ruin your health."

Song Jiang pointed at the surrounding pines and told Wu Yong about his dream.

"There must be a temple near here for you to have had such a remarkable dream," said the Military Advisor. "That spirit who appeared obviously was protecting you."

"You're absolutely right. Let's look around and see if we can find it."

They walked into the wooded mountains. Sure enough, less than half an arrow-flight away, they came upon a temple. On a plaque in gold letters were inscribed the words: Temple of the Black Dragon Spirit.

The two men entered and gazed at the idol of the Dragon Spirit at the upper end of the building. Song Jiang was amazed. It was none other than the apparition which appeared to him in his dream! Song Jiang kowtowed and voiced his gratitude.
"I cannot thank you enough, oh Dragon Spirit, for saving me! I beg for your continuing aid. If I conquer Fang La, I shall petition the emperor to build here a magnificent temple, and confer on you an exalted title!"
After kowtowing once more the two left the building and examined the stone tablet in the courtyard. It said that during the Tang Dynasty a scholar named Shao Jun failed in the imperial examinations and drowned himself. The Lord of the Heavens pitied him and made him a Dragon Spirit. Thereafter, when the local people prayed for wind they got wind, when they prayed for rain they got rain. And so they built this temple and sacrificed in each of the four seasons.
Song Jiang called for a black pig and a white sheep and held his own sacrificial ceremony. On leaving the temple, he looked carefully at the surrounding pines, and told Wu Yong how they had marvelously been converted into giant warriors.
To this day there is a Temple of the Black Dragon King outside Yanzhou's North Gate. And the Forest of Ten Thousand Pines still stands.
Returning to headquarters, Song Jiang and Wu Yong sat up half the night discussing how to repel the enemy and attack Muzhou. Song Jiang then wearily laid his head on the table and slept. A voice announced: "Scholar Shao has come." Song Jiang hastily got up and left the tent to greet him.
The Dragon Spirit bowed and said: "If I hadn't protected you yesterday, Bao the Royal Astrologer, who by a magic spell changed the pines into warriors, would have captured you. But I'm grateful for the sacrifices you made to me, and I've come specially to thank you. I want to tell you also that you soon will break into Muzhou, and within ten days capture Fang La."
Song Jiang wanted to invite his visitor into the tent and question him further, when he was awakened by a sudden gust of wind. It had been another dream.
He urgently summoned the Military Advisor and told him what he had dreamt.
"Since the Dragon Spirit has appeared to you again, we definitely can launch our attack on Muzhou," said Wu Yong.
"Perfectly correct," cried Song Jiang.
At daybreak he ordered that the troops be mustered for an offensive against the city. He directed Yan Shun and Ma Lin to hold the Black Dragon Ridge road, and Guan Sheng, Hua Rong, Qin Ming and Zhu Tong to drive towards the North Gate with the vanguard. Ling Zhen was instructed to fire directly into the city nine vollies of Mother and Sons shells.
Their bursts shook the earth and sky, and the hills and mountains trembled. The southern soldiers in Muzhou were scared out of their wits. They were in a panic before the fighting even started.
The rear army contingent of Royal Astrologer Bao and Zheng the Prince of Demons had already been scattered by Lu Zhishen, and Xiahou chased off to parts unknown. The remainder withdrew into the city. Bao and Zheng conferred with Deputy Prime Minister Zu and the other leaders.
"The Song army is upon us," they said. "What can save us?"
"Since ancient times whenever enemy soldiers are at the gates a battle to the death is the only solution," said Zu. "If they break in, we'll surely be captured. The situation is critical. We must go forward."
Zheng the Prince of Demons, seconded by Tan Gao and Wu Yingxing and a dozen or more subordinate officers, opened the gates and led forth ten thousand crack troops. Song-Jiang directed his forces to fall back half an arrow-flight and permit the foe to emerge completely from the city and deploy in battle positions.
Bao the Royal Astrologer seated himself in an armchair atop the city wall. Deputy Prime Minister Zu, Advisor Shen, and Royal Inspector Huan also took seats and watched from the ramparts. With levelled lance, Zheng cantered forward. Song Jiang sent Guan Sheng the Big Halberd against him. They fought only a few rounds. No match for Guan, Zheng could only parry and dodge. Seeing this, Bao on the wall worked his magic. He muttered an incantation and shouted: "Speed!" Bao puffed out a breath, and from the top of Zheng's head black vapor billowed. In the cloud a spirit in golden armor appeared, grasping a Demon-Smiting Cudgel which he raised to strike. Another black cloud spread from the southern army. Song Jiang immediately directed Fan Rui the Demon King Who Roils the World to counter the magic. He himself chanted the secret incantation from the Heavenly Books for dispelling wind and darkness. From Guan Sheng's helmet rolled a white cloud. In it was a spirit astride a black dragon, an iron hammer in his hand. He charged the golden-armored spirit which had emerged from Zheng's head. The contending armies yelled as the supernatural warriors fought. After only a few rounds, the dragon-riding spirit drove off his opponent. With one swing of his halberd Guan Sheng cut Zheng from his horse. Bao the Royal Astrologer, shocked by the wind and thunder amid the Song army, hastily started to rise. A flaming ball from Ling Zhen's heaven-shaking cannon smashed his head and body to smithereens. The southern forces were defeated, and the Song army surged towards Muzhou. Zhu Tong ran Grand Marshal Tan Gao through with his lance, tumbling him from his mount. Li Ying's flying sword killed Garrison Commander Wu. When the flaming cannon ball disintegrated Bao the Royal Astrologer, the southern soldiers on the wall scrambled down and ran. Song Jiang's troops were by now inside the city. In their massive advance they captured Deputy Prime Minister Zu, Advisor Shen and Royal Inspector Huan. The subordinate officers were slain, every one, with no one bothering to ask their names. Song Jiang burned Fang La's palace and distributed his gold and silks among the commanders. He also issued a proclamation reassuring the populace. Even before a count of his soldiers was completed, a mounted messenger raced up with a report. "On Black Dragon Ridge Ma Lin's knocked from his saddle by Bai Qin's javelin. Shi Bao sped over and cut him in two with his sword. Yan Shun dashed into the fray but Shi Bao threw his Comet Hammer and killed him. Shi Bao's pressing his advantage to drive this way." Deeply grieved, Song Jiang wept over the death of yet another 2 chieftains. He ordered Guan Sheng, Hua Rong, Qin Ming, and Zhu Tong to battle Shi Bao, Bai Qin, capture Black Dragon Ridge, and the pass. And because the chieftains fought at Black Dragon Ridge, they annihilated the enemy bandits in Clear Stream County and nabbed the hay-haired king in Bangyuan Cavern. The names of Song Jiang and his chieftains were inscribed in historical annals for a millennium; the story of their splendid deeds has been passed down through the ages. They demonstrated their courage in Black Ridge Pass; in the cavern at Clear Stream they won their fame.

In attempting to rescue the bodies of Snake and Scorpion on Black Dragon Ridge, Song Jiang has fallen into Marshal Shi Bao's trap. Enemy troops spring up on all sides, with Shi Bao in front and Precious Light blocking the way back. "Dismount and surrender, Song Jiang, what are you waiting for?" Marshal Shi Bao bellowed.
Provoked by this, Scimitar slapped his horse, whirled about and charged. But before they crossed swords, a cry went up from the rear. The Four Dragons, commanders of the enemy fleet, had come ashore and joined the two commanders on top of the pass, Wang and Chao; they were now pouring down the mountainside together. Colonel Hua rode out to bolster the rear and engaged one of the leaders. They fought innumerable bouts and then Colonel Hua turned and retreated. Wang and Chao raced in pursuit. Colonel Hua fired two arrows in quick succession and they both fell. A cry of dismay went up from their troops who halted and began to retreat. The four boat commanders also came to a halt, after seeing the fate of their comrades. Colonel Hua had stemmed the tide.
But now another attack came in from the flank, led this time by Bai Qin and Jing De, the two officers sent with reinforcements by the Deputy Chief Minister in Muzhou. From Song Jiang's ranks two commanders rode out: the Little Duke, who took on Bai, and the Halberdier who opposed Jing. They were all locked in mortal combat and Song Jiang was urging his side on, when an uproar rose to the heavens in the enemy's rear and their army broke up. It was because Iron Ox and his two lieutenants, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost with their infantry had taken Marshal Shi Bao's cavalry from the rear. When Precious Light attempted to bring his troops up in support, he encountered Monk and Pilgrim, the one hacking with his two swords, the other heaving his steel staff. Each was followed by a thousand infantrymen as they charged into action. Behind them came Thunderclap, Skyhawk, Whiskers, the Dandy, the Flautist, Demon King, Steelbright and Short-Arse, with both cavalry and infantry, in a desperate charge. The Song troops scattered the forces of Marshal Shi Bao and Precious Light, rescued Song Jiang and the others, and brought them safely back to Tonglu. Shi Bao retreated up the pass.
Song Jiang thanked all the commanders. "If you hadn't come to the rescue my friends, I would now be a ghost wandering in the underworld like Snake and Scorpion."
The Professor said: "When you insisted on going and wouldn't listen to my humble advice, I was afraid something would go wrong, so I sent the others to back you up."
Song Jiang's gratitude knew no bounds.
Let us now turn to the discussion that was going on between Marshal Shi Bao and Precious Light on Black Dragon Ridge. "For the time being Song Jiang has retreated to Tonglu and is camped there," said the former. "If he goes secretly by hidden paths and crosses the mountain, Muzhou will be seriously threatened. Would it not be best for you to go yourself to the palace at Clearwater and request His Majesty to send reinforcements to secure the pass? Then we will be able to hold out indefinitely."
"What you say is quite right," Precious Light replied. "I'll go at once." He mounted and went first to Muzhou where he spoke to the Deputy Chief Minister: "Song Jiang's troops are formidable. We can't stop them and I fear we will be swept away. We are facing defeat. I have come to ask for reinforcements to help us hold the pass."
The Minister heard him out, and then together they rode over to Bangyuan Gap in Clearwater. They saw the Chief Minister first, and put in their request for reinforcements. Next day at the early morning audience, Fang La having ascended his throne and the ministers including Precious Light having made obeisance, the latter stepped forward, wished His Majesty long life and said: "Armed with Your Majesty's commission I went to help the Southern Prince defend Hangzhou. Unfortunately Song Jiang's troops turned out to be too powerful and we were unable to withstand their onslaught. Then Judge Yuan, who was in command of some transports, turned traitor and let them into Hangzhou so we lost the city. The Prince, eager for glory, went out to fight and was killed. Now Marshal Shi Bao and I have retreated to the pass on Black Dragon Ridge. Recently we killed four of Song Jiang's commanders, and our position is relatively strong. But Song Jiang at present is camped at Tonglu and I fear that sooner or later they will find hidden paths to infiltrate the pass; it is difficult for us to defend the whole mountain. I request Your Majesty to send us more commanders and picked troops as soon as possible to secure the pass at Black Dragon Ridge, repel the enemy and bring the whole region under control again."
Fang La said: "All our troops are already deployed. Recently the situation has been critical in Shezhou at Sundance Pass and we have had to send thousands of troops. There's only the imperial guard left, and I need them to defend the palace. I can't go scattering them all over the place!"
"If you won't send reinforcements, you leave me helpless. If the Song army gets through the mountains, how can Muzhou be defended?"
Chief Minister Lou stepped forward: "This pass at Black Dragon Ridge is really vital to us. I know there are still thirty thousand imperial guards. We could let Precious Light have ten thousand to defend the pass. I beg Your Majesty to consider it."
But Fang La would not listen to Lou's advice either. He insisted that the imperial guard could not be sent. The court was dismissed and everyone left the palace. Lou discussed the situation with his officials and it was decided that the Deputy Chief Minister should send a general and five thousand troops from Muzhou.
Precious Light and the Minister went back to Muzhou and picked the troops, who were to be led by one Colonel Xiahou. When all this was explained to Marshal Shi Bao on Black Dragon Ridge, he said: "Since the court refuses to send the imperial guard, we will simply hold the pass, we will not go out and seek battle. Tell the four boat commanders to guard the river closely and fight off any boats that attack but not initiate any action."
We shall now leave them to their arrangements for the defence of Black Dragon Pass, and tell instead how Song Jiang, after the loss of his leaders, remained at Tonglu and made no move to attack. After twenty days or more of inactivity, a scout came and reported: "The Emperor is sending Marshal Tong with bounty. He has reached Hangzhou already. He heard that the army has been divided and has sent General Wang Bing to Sundance Pass with the portion for the Unicorn's army. He is bringing our gifts himself and will be here at any moment."
Song Jiang rode out some six miles with the Professor and his other commanders to meet Marshal Tong. Back in the government office, the imperial edict was read out and the bounty divided among Song Jiang's commanders. They prostrated themselves in thanks and then a banquet was arranged to welcome the Marshal.
Marshal Tong asked: "On the way here I heard that you have suffered losses."
Song Jiang said tearfully: "Previously, during the northern campaign against the Tartars, we were entirely successful and we did not lose a single commander. But this time before we even left the capital Taoist Gongsun had left us and we were deprived of several others before we set out. Since crossing the river we have lost a lot of leaders. And recently eight or nine fell sick in Hang-zhou: their lives hang in the balance. We have made two assaults on the pass up there at Black Dragon Ridge and lost several leaders. Because the mountain is steep and the river swift-flowing, it is difficult to attack. We have not been able to break through. At this critical time your visit is most welcome."
Marshal Tong said: "The Emperor is fully aware of all you have achieved, General. He heard that you had lost some com-manders, and told me to bring Wang Bing and Zhao Tan to help you out. I have sent Wang Bing to the other army to distribute their gifts." He then introduced Zhao Tan to Song Jiang and his companions and the feasting continued at the Tonglu camp.
When Marshal Tong mustered the army next day for an attack on Black Dragon Pass, the Professor warned: "Don't take it too lightly, Your Excellency. Why don't we send the Dandy and the Flautist to a quiet place along the river to ask the locals for directions and find a hidden route which will take us through the mountains? If we can get behind their lines and cut them off, we can take the pass with no effort at all."
Song Jiang said: "It's a good idea." He sent the Dandy and the Flautist off with a dozen men to search the countryside and ask the people about routes. A day later in the evening they returned with an old man. "Who is he?" Song Jiang asked.
"He's a local inhabitant who knows all the ways through the mountains and gorges hereabouts," said the Flautist.
Song Jiang said: "Old man, if you can show us a path that will take us beyond Black Dragon Ridge, I will reward you handsomely."
"I was born in these parts," said the old man. "Us ordinary folk've suffered something terrible at the hands of Fang La and we'd no way to escape. Heaven be praised that the imperial army is here now and us can have some peace again. I can show you a path as will get you beyond Black Dragon Pass. It comes out at Dongguan, that's pretty near Muzhou, to the north of it. Black Dragon Pass is round to the west."
Song Jiang, delighted, told them to give the old man silver and keep him in the camp. He had him provided with plenty to eat and drink. Next day he requested Marshal Tong to guard the camp while he took twelve commanders and advanced along the mountain track. They had around ten thousand men, cavalry and foot. With the old man as their guide they set off. The horses' hooves were muffled, the harness bells silenced and the men gagged to prevent talking as they marched. At Little Ox Mountain they found an enemy contingent blocking the way. Song Jiang sent Iron Ox, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost forward. The enemy, numbering about four or five hundred, were wiped out by Iron Ox and his companions. They reached Dongguan around the fourth watch.
The local commander of the southern forces heard that the Song army had got through to Dongguan. Since he had only two thousand troops at his disposal, he did not put up any serious resistance. At the first push he fled to Muzhou, where he told the authorities: "Song Jiang and his army have got past Black Dragon Ridge by taking hidden paths and are now at Dongguan." The Deputy Chief Minister in a panic summoned his commanders. Song Jiang had already ordered Thunderer to set off a string of explosions. Marshal Shi Bao and his force up on the pass heard them and were terrified. Marshal Shi Bao hurriedly sent out a reconnaissance party under Bai Qin. They found Song Jiang's banners everywhere, filling sky and earth, spread over the whole terrain. They hurriedly returned to the mountain and reported to the Marshal.
"Since the court has not sent us any reinforcements, we will just defend the pass, we will not try to relieve them," the Marshal said.
"That would be a mistake," said Precious Light. "If we don't send assistance to Muzhou, just think what will happen. If the palace is defeated, our own safety cannot be guaranteed. If you won't go, I will go to relieve Muzhou by myself."
The Marshal did his best to dissuade him, but Precious Light took five thousand troops and wielding his steel staff set off down the mountain with Colonel Xiahou.
Now Song Jiang on reaching Dongguan had not tried to attack Muzhou immediately. Instead he marched toward Black Dragon Pass, and so ran into Precious Light. The two armies gradually closed and battle commenced. Precious Light rode out in front and challenged. Colonel Hua whispered in Song Jiang's ear: "If we do this and this, we've got him!"
"Right!" said Song Jiang, nodding. He told Colonel Hua to work it out with Thunderclap.
Thunderclap rode out first and engaged Precious Light in combat. After half a dozen bouts he turned his horse and galloped off. The troops scattered in all directions. Thinking Thunderclap was beaten, Precious Light let him go and galloped towards Song Jiang to make him prisoner. But Colonel Hua of course was guarding Song Jiang and ready for this. He waited till the priest was quite close, then bent his bow to the full and taking careful aim fired an arrow point blank. The bow was bent like a full moon, the arrow sped like a shooting star; it caught Precious Light full in the face. He crashed to the ground and the soldiers finished him off. Now they all advanced together and the southerners were routed. Colonel Xiahou could not fight on alone and fled to Muzhou. But when the Song troops reached the foot of the pass, blocks of wood and ballista missiles rained down on them and the advance was halted. Consequently they turned about and marched on Muzhou instead.
Colonel Xiahou rushed in to report to the Deputy Chief Minister: "The Song army has broken through to Dongguan. They killed Precious Light. Any day now they'll attack Muzhou."
The Deputy Chief Minister sent someone with Colonel Xiahou to the palace in Clearwater to ask Chief Minister Lou to tell His Majesty that the Song army had broken through by mountain tracks to Dongguan and would soon be attacking Muzhou, and to ask His Majesty to send reinforcements. Any delay would be disastrous.
Fang La got a shock. He hurriedly ordered Marshal Zheng, commander of the palace guard, to take fifteen thousand men and rush to relieve Muzhou.
Zheng said: "I will carry out your command, but I beg you to let me have the assistance of the imperial astronomer, to help me against Song Jiang."
Fang La granted this request and summoned his astronomer Bao Daoyi, known as the Sorcerer. When the latter was informed of the royal wish, he presented himself at the palace for an audience. He bowed very deeply. Fang La explained: "My lands have been invaded by Song Jiang's army. We have repeatedly lost cities and troops. Now his army has reached Muzhou. I hope you will be able to deploy your magic powers to save our land and people and preserve our patrimony."
The Sorcerer said: "Your most enlightened Majesty, I am just a poor Taoist, but in my humble opinion, Song Jiang's army will be swept away, by virtue of Your Majesty's divine favour."
Highly gratified by this answer, Fang La invited him to sit down and a banquet was arranged in his honour. When he had eaten and drunk he left the palace and joined Marshal Zheng and Colonel Xiahou to discuss the campaign.
The Sorcerer was in fact from the Mountains of Splendour. He had joined the monkhood in youth and had studied the black arts. Later he joined Fang La when the latter was plotting his insurrection. In battle he would use his black magic as a weapon. He also had a magnificent sword which was known as the Heaven Raker. It could fly through the air and kill a man at a hundred paces. On Fang La's behalf he had committed some horrifying acts which earned him his name of Sorcerer. Marshal Zheng had started off as a captain of infantry. From a lad he had practised with spear and staff. He had met up with Fang La by chance, and had risen to be commander of the palace guard. He loved Taoism and considered himself a disciple of the Sorcerer, from whom he had acquired knowledge of a number of magic tricks. In battle he could summon up clouds or mist and people called him the Devil's Marshal. As for Colonel Xiahou, he had originally been a hunter from a mountain district and could wield a trident. He had come to serve the Deputy Chief Minister in the Muzhou administration.
These three then were making their plans in the Marshal's palace when a doorman came and announced: "There's one of them sky watchers asking to see you, name of Pu Wenying."
When the Sorcerer asked what he wanted, Pu Wenying said: "I have heard that you, Your Excellency, with the Marshal and the General are planning a campaign against Song Jiang's forces. When I was observing the night sky, I noticed that the southern stars were all obscured, whereas the stars of Song Jiang and his commanders were mostly still bright. I am sure your plan is a good one, but I fear it may not have a good result. Would it not be better to go back to His Majesty and ask him to consider surrendering, in order to spare our country from misfortune?"
The Sorcerer flew into such a rage at this that he picked up the Heaven Raker and cut Pu Wenying in two. Then he announced what he had done in a memorial to Fang La, asking him to consider the matter closed. And that was that. The historian has a poem:

In the southeast, the king's power fades,
Though wizards and sorcerers are his aids.
When one comes who knows heaven's will
Him the Sorcerer's sword must kill.

The Devil's Marshal was appointed commander of the vanguard, marching first out of the city to lead the attack. With the Sorcerer commanding the main army and Colonel Xiahou bringing up the rear they set off to relieve Muzhou.
Now as Song Jiang and his army were wondering how to go about storming Muzhou, a scout suddenly reported that southern reinforcements were on the way from Clearwater. Song Jiang sent Short-Arse and Steelbright out to reconnoitre. With three thousand cavalry they took the road to Clearwater. When the two forces met, the Devil's Marshal rode out to engage Short-Arse. Without a word the two leaders deployed their forces and set to. They fought eight or nine bouts and then the Devil's Marshal began to mutter a spell. A sudden shout of "Chrrr!" and from his helmet a cloud of black smoke poured out. In the middle of this black smoke stood a spirit warrior in golden armour with a mighty club, a proper demon-queller. He raised this weapon heavenward, and it came hurtling down. Short-Arse was paralysed with fear: his arm faltered and his legs grew clumsy, his skill with the spear deserted him and a single blow from the Devil's Marshal knocked him from his horse. Steelbright saw her husband fall and raced to the rescue, whirling her two swords. The Devil's Marshal turned on her, but after just one bout he galloped off. Steelbright, determined to avenge her husband, gave chase. Her adversary rested his spear and deftly reaching for a bag that hung by his side took out a square lump of brass, turned in the saddle, took aim and flung it in her face. She died before she hit the ground. Poor girl, beautiful and skilled at arms, it all ended here for her! The Devil's Marshal mustered his troops and the Song force was routed.
When the Song stragglers got back and told Song Jiang that the two leaders were dead and the greater part of the men, he was furious. He immediately stood his army to and ordered Iron Ox, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost with five thousand cavalry to lead the attack.

The Devil's Marshal and his men were soon in sight. Song Jiang almost choking with anger rode out in front and shouted at them: "You rebel scum, how dare you kill two of our commanders!"
The Devil's Marshal responded by riding out, spear at the ready, to attack Song Jiang. But Iron Ox was not having it. He picked up his two axes and rushed forward, while Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost, weaving their shields, gave him cover. They charged ahead, trying to get to close quarters with the Devil's Marshal. But the latter turned his horse and galloped off, while his three antagonists charged on into the southerners' ranks. Song Jiang feared he might lose Iron Ox and quickly mustered five thousand cavalry and charged. The southerners fled in all directions. Song Jiang had the gong sounded to recall the troops. The two shield-bearers returned with Iron Ox.
At this moment a black cloud appeared all around them, masking the sun, a black mist which filled the sky, so thick you could not tell north from south or east from west and day was turned into night. There was no way forward for Song Jiang's army. The poem describes it:
Dark clouds every way you look, a black fog that fills the sky; wind and rain rage and spout. The heavens are angry, thunder roars. Mountain torrents shake the earth, all is confusion, as if the sky itself were falling. River gorges boil and churn as though the earth were opening up. Ghosts howl in sorrow, gods roar in sympathy. You can strain your eyes but you scarcely see a thing; your ears are filled with the sound of a thousand trees.
When the Devil's Marshal had darkened the world with his magic spell, Song Jiang's army lost their way and stumbled into a place where the gloom was so deep that they could see nothing. All order was lost in the army. Song Jiang raised his eyes to heaven and sighed. "Can it be that I am destined to die here?" he thought. The darkness lasted from early morning to mid-afternoon. Finally it began to lift and a glimmer of light appeared: they saw the place was full of tall warriors in golden armour, who completely surrounded them. When Song Jiang saw this he fell to the ground in terror. He kept muttering: "Heaven grant me a quick death!" He dared not raise his eyes, and in his ears was the perpetual sound of wind and rain. All his men remained bowed to the ground, expecting death, waiting for the sword to fall. A little longer and the storm had passed. When Song Jiang looked up and saw the sword was not going to fall after all, someone came and raised him up, saying: "Stand up, please!" When Song Jiang raised his eyes and looked, he saw it was a scholar offering him this help.
Song Jiang's fear melted away. He stood up and exchanged courtesies. He asked the man's name.
"My name is Shao Jun," the other replied. "My home is here. I came today to let Your Honour know that Fang La's days are numbered. In ten days' time he will be finished. I have already helped you a lot. You have had a hard time of it, but relief is at hand, do you understand?"
Song Jiang asked again: "Master, when is it ordained that Fang La will fall?" But as he spoke the other gave him a push and he awoke. It was all a dream! He looked around and saw that the tall warriors surrounding him were in fact pine trees. He gave a shout and all his men jumped up and began looking for a way out. The clouds had receded, the mists withdrawn, the sky was bright, the air clean; beyond the ring of pine trees shouts could be heard.
Song Jiang led his men in a charge to break out, and they came upon Monk and Pilgrim fighting their way along the road and grappling with the Devil's Marshal. The Sorcerer on horseback saw Pilgrim on foot wielding his two swords and attacking his commander, so he drew his Heaven Raker. It flew through the air and embedded itself in Pilgrim's left shoulder. The blood spurted out. Monk rushed forward furiously with his steel staff and rescued Pilgrim. Pilgrim's left arm had been almost completely severed. Monk wrenched out the Heaven Raker. When Pilgrim came to, he saw that his arm had been cut through and was hanging by a thread, so he got his own sword and with a quick blow cut it right off. Song Jiang ordered some men to carry him back to the camp to rest.
Monk went charging off to do battle with Colonel Xiahou. After several bouts Colonel Xiahou gave up and fled. Monk went in with his staff and scattered the southerners while Colonel Xiahou escaped into the forest. Monk was not going to allow that and followed him deep into the woods.
Meanwhile the Devil's Marshal had brought up his troops, so Iron Ox, Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost charged him, brandishing shields, javelins, darts and axes. They were too much for the Devil's Marshal, who fled across the river gorge and made off. His three opponents did not know the way, but they were so avid for glory that they crossed too and raced after him. Three thousand troops appeared on the other bank of the river and cut them off. Eight-Armed Ogre hurriedly tried to turn back and was confronted on the river bank by two enemy commanders. He called out to Iron Ox and Winged Ghost, but already their pursuit of the Devil's Marshal had taken them far away. Further on the gorge unexpectedly became very deep and when Winged Ghost stumbled and lost his footing, he was finished off by the southerners' arrows. Eight-Armed Ogre slithered down the bank but was tripped by a rope and as he struggled to get up was cut to pieces in a flurry of blows. Poor Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost — what did it avail them now to be heroes?
Iron Ox was all alone as he plunged ever deeper into the mountains. The enemy troops on the river bank were gaining on him, and were only a few hundred yards away, when a thunderous roar arose behind. It was Colonel Hua, Thunderclap and Demon King coming to the rescue. They thrust the southern troops aside and continued on till they were able to reach Iron Ox and bring him back to safety. Monk however was still missing. When these leaders met Song Jiang they told him how the Devil's Marshal had been pursued across the river and how Eight-Armed Ogre and Winged Ghost had been lost and only Iron Ox saved. Song Jiang's grief was boundless. Of the troops engaged in the operation a third had been killed, Monk was missing and Pilgrim had lost his left arm.
Whilst Song Jiang was still mourning, a scout reported: "The Professor, Scimitar, Skyhawk, Whiskers, the Dandy and the Flautist have just arrived by water with ten thousand troops."
Song Jiang met them and asked the Professor about the situa-tion. The Professor replied: "Marshal Tong has his own troops and Generals Wang Bing and Zhao Tan and General Liu all have forces of their own. They have reached Black Dragon Ridge. We left thirteen behind, but the others are all here with me to help you.
Song Jiang told him: "We have lost some comrades, Pilgrim is crippled, Monk is missing. I can't help being sad."
The Professor urged him: "You must cast off your depression. Now is the time to capture Fang La. You must put the good of your country first and not allow grief to impair your own health."
Song Jiang pointed out the pine trees and told the Professor about his dream. The Professor said: "Since you have had this premonitory dream here, do you not think there must be a temple hereabouts, with a tutelary spirit whose aim is to protect you?"
Song Jiang said: "Your observation is a very good one. Let us search the mountain together." The two of them strolled off into the forest. They had not gone half a bowshot when they came upon a temple, with an inscription in gold characters which said: "Temple of the Black Dragon Lord". When they went in, Song Jiang had a surprise: on the altar was an image of the Black Dragon Lord, and it was exactly like the person he had seen in his dream. Song Jiang prostrated himself again and said: "Thank you for your great kindness in saving me, Dragon Lord. Although I have no way to repay you, I hope I may count on your help. If we can overcome Fang La, I will do everything in my power to persuade the court to build a temple to honour your name."
They prostrated themselves again, and went back down the steps. They read the inscription, and learnt that the god was a graduate of the second class in the Tang dynasty called Shao Jun, who on failing to pass the examination for the first class had thrown himself in the river and died. The Lord of Heaven in honour of his devotion to duty made him a Dragon Lord. This was a spot where whenever the people prayed for wind they got wind, whenever they prayed for rain they got rain, so the temple was built and they made offerings there in each of the four seasons. In view of all this Song Jiang ordered a black pig and a white sheep for sacrifice. After making their offering, they went out and had another good look around. All about them were the pine trees that had undergone the strange metamorphosis. To this day there is outside the northern gate of Yanzhou a temple dedicated to the Black Dragon Lord and the name of that place is Thousand Pine Woods. Ancient traces remain, as the poem tells:

The loyal heart's known to the spirit,
Who to the loyal gives secret help.
If you want to know who the Dragon Lord is,
At 1000 Pinewoods, the tablet tells you.

After thanking the Dragon Lord for granting him his protection, Song Jiang left the temple and rode back to the main camp. There with the Professor he made plans for the attack on Muzhou. They went on till midnight, when Song Jiang suddenly felt exceedingly weary. He had just lain down on a bench when he heard someone say: "Graduate Shao would like to talk to you." Song Jiang hurriedly rose and went out to meet him. The Dragon Lord made him a deep bow and said: "But for my help you would have been captured yesterday by the Sorcerer, through those magic spells of his that can turn pine trees into men. But I am grateful for the respect you have just paid me and I want to tell you that in a few days from now Muzhou can be stormed and that in ten days' time Fang La can be captured."
Song Jiang was about to invite him into the tent to question him further, when a sudden gust of wind woke him and he found he had been dreaming.
He immediately summoned the Professor to discuss the dream. The Professor said: "If the Dragon Lord appears to you like this, I am sure it means we can soon attack and take Muzhou."
Song Jiang said: "It's just what we wanted!"
Next day at dawn he gave the orders. The main force was reserved for the attack on Muzhou, while the Dandy and the Flautist were sent to guard the main road from Black Dragon Ridge. Scimitar, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap and Whiskers were to lead the attack on Muzhou from the north. First Thunderer was ordered to fire nine explosive shells into the city. The shells fell with an earth-shattering din, a huge explosive force, and the troops in the city were frightened out of their wits and thrown into confusion without a blow struck.
After Monk scattered the enemy rearguard and pursued Colonel Xiahou none knew whither, the Devil's Marshal and the Sorcerer had taken refuge in the city and were discussing their plan of action with Deputy Chief Minister and other officials. Someone said: "The Song army is here, how can we save our-selves?"
The Minister said: "History tells us that when the enemy are at the walls, when they reach the moat, there is only one way to save yourself: face them and fight to the death! If the city falls we will all be captured. The situation is desperate. Our only hope is to attack!"
So the Devil's Marshal with a dozen or so commanders and ten thousand troops charged out through the city gates and faced Song Jiang. The latter ordered his troops to fall back half a bowshot to allow the enemy to take up a position outside the city. The Sorcerer had a chair brought out onto the battlements, while the Minister and his officials were all sitting in the watch tower as spectators. The Devil's Marshal levelled his lance and galloped forward. On the other side Scimitar came out, wielding his blade. The horses met and they fought several bouts. The Devil's Marshal was no match for Scimitar. All he could do was parry and block, or dodge to left or right. So from his vantage point on the wall the Sorcerer made his magic, muttered a spell and shouted: "Chrrr!"
As he pronounced the magic word and blew, from the Marshal's helmet there sprang a black cloud and in the midst of this cloud appeared a spirit warrior in golden armour, wielding a magnificent demon-quelling sword that he raised on high before letting it fall. Among the southern ranks a black cloud spiralled up. Song Jiang summoned Demon King to see what was happening and ordered him to do some magic. He himself also employed the secret formula he had learnt from the mystic books for turning the wind and dispelling darkness. Then from Scimitar's helmet a white cloud burst forth, in the midst of it a spirit warrior with flaming hair, a blue face, green eyes and flashing teeth, astride a black dragon and wielding an iron mace. He and the god in golden armour issuing from the Marshal's helmet did battle while the two armies cheered them on. They fought countless bouts until the warrior on the black dragon began to force the one in golden armour back. At this point Scimitar with one blow of his sword cut the Devil's Marshal from his horse. The Sorcerer had seen how the wind was rising and thunder crashing from the Song side and was just rising to his feet when one of Thunderer's explosive shells hit him. It smashed him to smithereens. The southern troops were routed and fled back into Muzhou as fast as their legs would carry them. Whiskers knocked one of their commanders from his horse with a spear thrust and Skyhawk killed another with a throwing knife. When the soldiers inside the city saw the Sorcerer killed by a shell, they began pouring out over the walls. Song Jiang's men burst through the gates and pressed forward eagerly to seize the Minister and the rest. No one stopped to ask any names: they were all killed. The first thing Song Jiang did was to burn down Fang La's palace. The valuables in it were shared out among the army commanders. A proclamation was issued to reassure the populace. But before they even had time to number their losses, a scout reported: "The Flautist has been knocked from his horse by a spear thrust on the road west to Black Dragon Ridge and cut in two by Marshal Shi Bao's sword. The Dandy tried to retaliate and Shi Bao, the bastard, killed him with his flying hammer. After his successes Shi Bao is sure to attack us." On hearing of these two further losses, Song Jiang was sick at heart. He immediately sent Scimitar, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap and Whiskers to confront Marshal Shi Bao and try to capture Black Dragon Ridge. Now had these four not attacked Black Dragon Ridge, things might have been different. For in Clearwater a rebel host is to be annihilated, at Bangyuan Gap the outlaw Prince taken alive, and in consequence the fame of Song Jiang and his company will live a millennium, their deeds be proclaimed in a million chronicles.

The Unicorn Lu Junyi Wages a great Battle at Sundance Pass; Song Jiang plans to capture the citadel at Bangyuan Gap & Cleverly Takes Clear Stream Cavern

Guan Sheng and the other three chieftains led their men rapidly up Black Dragon Ridge. They soon encountered the army of Shi Bao.
"Bandit, how dare you kill my brothers!" Guan Sheng shouted from his horse.
Shi Bao saw it was Guan Sheng, and he lost his eagerness for combat. He withdrew to the top of ridge and ordered Bai Qin to take him on. The two had fought less than ten rounds when, from the summit, gongs hastily sounded the call to retreat. Guan Sheng did not pursue.
The southern soldiers had been thrown into confusion. Shi Bao, repelling the raiders from the east, had neglected the west. Now, a large unit under Chancellor Tong was swarming up this side of the ridge.
Song army general Wang Bing clashed with southern commander Jing De. After something over ten rounds, Wang cut Jing from his saddle. At the same time, chieftains Lu Fang and Guo Sheng raced to capture the top. But before they reached it, a huge boulder came bounding down. Guo Sheng and his steed were crushed to death.
Meanwhile on the east side Guan Sheng, noting the confusion in the southern position above, realized that Song forces must be attacking on the west, and led his men in a charge to the summit. The enemy contingent, assailed from two sides, was quite disorganized.
Lu Fang and Bai Qin met in battle. They hadn't fought three rounds when Bai lunged with his lance. Lu dodged and the thrust slid by his ribs. But Bai grabbed Lu's lance and twisted it completely around. Too close to ply their weapons, they both dropped them of one accord and, still mounted, grappled in hand-to-hand combat. The perilous ridge was a difficult place for horses to keep their footing. The strenuous wrestling of their riders threw the animals off balance. They stumbled over the edge and rolled down the cliff. Both warriors were killed in the fall.
Guan Sheng and his men drove upwards on foot. Shi Bao saw that he was blocked on both sides. He feared humiliation if captured. With his Wind Splitter Sword, he cut his own throat. The Song forces were in control of Black Dragon Ridge and the pass. Guan Sheng dispatched a swift messenger to Song Jiang with the news.
Upstream from Muzhou, another Song unit closed in, so that a squeeze was being exerted from both above and below. The four southern admirals in the naval base on the river saw that Black Dragon Ridge was gone, and that Muzhou had fallen. They abandoned their boats and fled to the opposite shore. There, the local people caught Cheng Gui and Xie Fu and turned them over to the conquerors in Muzhou. Zhai Yuan and Qiao Zheng managed to escape.
The large Song force under Chancellor Tong and Deputy District Commander Liu returned to Muzhou, and Song Jiang went out to welcome them into the city. The armies were installed in camps, and proclamations issued exhorting the people and local soldiers to resume their jobs. Countless southern troops had surrendered. Song Jiang opened the storehouses and distributed grain among the populace. They went back to their original occupations as good citizens.
The hearts of Admirals Cheng Gui and Xie Fu were cut out and offered in sacrifice to Ruan the Second and Meng Kang. Similar ceremonies were held for the chieftains slain on Black Dragon Ridge. Li Jun was ordered to take the captured high southern officials on many vessels and deliver them to Governor Zhang.
Song Jiang was greatly distressed by news of the death of Lu Fang and Guo Sheng. He made no further troop movements, but waited for Lu Junyi and his column. When Lu arrived they would jointly assault Clear Stream.
After the division of forces at Hangzhou, Lu had set forth with twenty-eight chieftains and thirty thousand men. They marched along mountain paths in the direction of Shezhou. Passing through Linan Town, an ancient capital, they neared Yuling Pass.
The pass was held by Pang Wanchun, one of Fang La's leading generals, and the best archer in the southern kingdom. His lieutenant commanders were called Lei Jiong and Ji Ji, each of whom operated an eight-hundred-catty crossbow which had to be cocked by foot pressure, and wielded a big spiny club. Pang had a force of three thousand. He had heard Lu was coming, and was all prepared, just waiting for him to get closer.
Lu sent an advance probe of thee thousand infantry under six mounted chieftains headed by Shi Jin. Winding towards the pass they didn't encounter a single enemy soldier. Shi Jin grew suspicious and conferred with the other chieftains.
At that moment a white banner appeared at the top of the pass, and beneath it stood the crack archer Pang Wanchun. Pang looked at Shi Jin and laughed.
"You should have stayed in Liangshan Marsh, scruffy bandit," he said contemptuously, "where you begged an amnesty from the Song emperor. You've got a nerve coming to my country and playing the bold hero! Of course, you've heard of me, and I know you have among you some scamp called Hua Rong. Let him come out and match archery with me. But first I'll show you one of my marvellous shots."
Before the words were out of his mouth, he whizzed an arrow at Shi Jin, hit him squarely and knocked him from his horse. The other five chieftains rushed forward, helped him back into the saddle, and they all withdrew.
A gong crashed on the mountain top, and from the pine groves on both sides swarms of arrows flew. The chieftains abandoned Shi Jin in their haste to get away. But when they rounded the gap, they saw Lei Jiong on one of the opposite slopes and Ji Ji on the other. The two deluged them with bolts from their crossbows. Not even the nimblest heroes could have avoided those lethal shafts. Poor Liangshan Marsh chieftains, life passed from them like a dream! Six of them lay below the pass in a heap of corpses.
Of the three thousand infantry only a hundred odd managed to escape. They told Lu what happened. It was a paralyzing blow. For a long time he sat in a dazed silence.
"Taking it so hard will only delay our important mission," Zhu Wu the Miraculous Strategist said. "We can work out another plan, capture the pass, kill their generals and obtain our revenge."
"Brother Song Jiang made a point of giving me many excellent chieftains," said Lu, "but I've already lost six of them without winning the battle. And only a hundred or so of the three thousand infantry remain. How am I going to face him when we get to Shezhou!"
"The ancients had a saying: 'The time isn't as important as the terrain. But the terrain isn't as important as unity with the people.' We're all from Shandong and Hebei on the Central Plain. We're not used to hilly warfare, and so we lost the advantages of terrain. What we now need is one of the local people to serve as our guide, someone who can show us through the twists and turns of the local mountain paths."
"You're quite right. Who can we send to scout the trails?"
"In my humble opinion, Flea on a Drum Shi Qian would be just right. He can fly over eaves and climb walls. He'll find a way if anyone can."
Lu summoned Shi Qian and spoke to him. Flea on a Drum took some dry rations, hung his dagger at his waist, and left the camp.
He travelled half the day. As night began to fall he saw a lamp gleaming in the distance. "Where there's lamplight there must be people," he thought, and groped towards it through the darkness.
The glow was coming from a small monastery. Flea on a Drum slipped in. An old monk was sitting in one of the buildings, chanting scriptures. Shi Qian knocked on the door. The old man told a young acolyte to open it. Flea entered and bowed.
"No need for ceremony, sir traveller," said the monk. "What brings you here in these times of war and slaughter?"
"To tell you the truth, Reverend, I'm a commander under Song Jiang of Liangshan Marsh. My name is Shi Qian. We have been dispatched by imperial decree to destroy Fang La. But last night the bandit generals at Yuling Pass killed six of our chieftains with arrows, and we can't get through. My mission is to find out whether we can bypass it, and I've wandered here deep in the mountains. Can you help us solve the problem, Reverend? If you know of some path that will get us secretly by the pass, we'll reward you handsomely."
"All the local people have been harmed by Fang La. There isn't one who doesn't hate him. The villagers here used to support me, but they've all ran away and scattered. I have no place to go, so I can only stay on and wait to die. Fortunately, the emperor's soldiers have arrived to restore happiness to the people. Finishing off the bandits will rid us of a scourge. I haven't dared to say much before, for fear the bandits would find out. But since you're a commander from the Imperial Army, I'll speak freely. There isn't any path here, but if you go to the ridge of the west mountain you'll find one that will take you above the pass. I'm only afraid that the bandits have blocked it and you won't be able to get through."
"Do you happen to know whether it goes to the enemy's fort?"
"It goes behind it. Another path goes down from there through the pass. But you may not be able to get through. They've probably built a big stone barricade."
"As long as there's a path I'll get by no matter what they've built! You've given us our opening. I'll report back to my chief and you'll be richly rewarded."
"Please don't tell any outsiders you got the information from me."
"I'm a very careful person, Reverend. I won't give you away."
Shi Qian bid the old monk farewell, returned to camp, and told Lu Junyi about the path. Delighted Lu called his advisor into conference.
"Excellent," said Zhu Wu. "We'll take Yuling Pass as easily as spitting on our hands. We must send another man with Shi Qian so that they can put through our plan."
"What has to be done, Advisor?" asked Flea on a Drum.
"Setting blazes and firing a cannon are the most important. You'll have to carry the cannon, flint and steel, up behind the fort above the pass, and fire a shot as a signal. That's your main task."

"Is that all? Then I don't need anybody else. I can do it myself. No companion can fly over eaves and walls like I do. He'd only slow things down. While I'm doing my part of the job, how will you be capturing the fort?"
"That's easy. The foe are sure to have troops lying in ambush, and we'll have to deal with them. All we have to do is set to the torch every thicket and grove along the way, and they'll have no place to hide."
"Very shrewd, Advisor."
Shi Qian took his fire-making equipment, toted the cannon in a pack upon his back, and bid Lu farewell. Lu gave him twenty ounces of silver and a bushel of rice for the old monk, directing a junior officer to carry the gifts.
In the afternoon of that day they reached the monastery. "Our Vanguard General is deeply grateful," Shi Qian said to the monk. "He sends these small things as a token of his appreciation."
Flea on a Drum handed over the gifts. He instructed the junior officer to go back to camp, then turned again to his host.
"Could I trouble you to tell your young acolyte to lead the way?"
"It would be better to wait till late at night. You might be seen from the fort during daylight."
That evening the monk laid a meal for Shi Qian and, when it was night, said to his acolyte: "Lead this commander over there and come right back. Don't let anybody know."
Shi Qian and the boy left the simple monastery and headed deep into the mountains. Through forests and over ridges, grasping bushes and vines, they laboriously climbed the rugged slopes in the dim light of a pale moon.
At last they came to a steep cliff face. Higher up were traces of a small path which had been cut into the rock. But at the top boulders had been piled and surmounted by a stone wall. How could anyone get past?
"Commander," said the boy, "the fort is on the other side. There's a road leading to it from the wall."
"You can go back, young acolyte. I know the way now."
The boy departed.
Flea on a Drum was a man who could fly over roofs, walk on walls, leap fences and steal horses. Using that ability now, he scaled the barricade easier than twiddling your thumbs.
In the wooded area to the east, half the sky was red. Lu and Zhu had broken camp and marched, setting fires as they advanced towards the fort. A forward unit of four or five hundred cleared the road of corpses, for the fires had left the enemy ambushers no place to hide.
Pang the crack archer in the fort above was informed. "Their method makes our ambushers useless," he said. "But we'll hang on here. Let's see them get through!"
As the Song forces drew near, he rode out with Lei Jiong and Ji Ji to defend the entrance to the pass.
Step by step, Shi Qian crept towards the fort. He climbed a tall tree and concealed himself amid the leafy branches. He saw the three southern commanders, with bows and arrows and big crossbows, lying in wait outside the pass, and the Song column moving up like a trail of fire. Lin Chong and Huyan Zhuo reined in their horses below and shouted at the foe.
"Bandit generals, how dare you resist the emperor's troops!"
The southern commanders, intent on readying their bows, had no idea that Flea on a Drum was already above the pass. He slid down the tree stealthily and crept to the rear of the fort. There he saw two haystacks. He hid between them, took out his fire-making apparatus and placed the cannon on one of the stacks. With sulfur and nitrate, he ignited first one stack, then the other. Lighting the fuse, he climbed swiftly with the cannon to the roof of the fort. It went off with a heaven-shaking boom just as the two haystacks burst into blaze.
Panicked before the fighting even started, the southern soldiers yelled and ran. Who had any stomach for battle? While Pang and his two lieutenants watched flames leaping behind the fort, Shi Qian, on the roof, fired another blast from his cannon. The explosion shook the entire fort, terrifying the southerners so that they dropped their weapons, shed their armor, and fled through the fort's rear.
From his perch on top of the roof, Shi Qian uttered a loud cry: "Ten thousand Song troops are already in the pass! Surrender quickly if you don't all want to die!"
Scared out of his wits, Pang could only stamp in frustration. Lei and Ji were wooden with shock. They couldn't move a muscle.
Lin Chong and Huyan Zhuo were the first up the mountain. The other chieftains rushed beyond the fort and chased the fleeing foe more than thirty //: Sun Li caught Lei Jiong, Wei Dingguo captured Ji Ji. Only Pang Wanchun escaped. Over half the southern effectives were rounded up. The Song column camped at the fort.
Lu rewarded Flea on a Drum generously. He cut the hearts from Lei Jiong and Ji Ji and offered them as sacrifices to Shi Jin and Shi Xiu and the other four chieftains who had been slain. Their six bodies were recovered and buried high on the slope. All the other corpses were burned.
The next day Lu and his chieftains donned their armor and mounted. Lu rushed a dispatch to Governor Zhang reporting the capture of the pass. At the same time, the column hastened through and marched directly to the outskirts of Shezhou, where they made camp.
Prince Fang Hou, the Governor of Shezhou, was Fang La's uncle on his father's side. Under him were two generals, and together they ruled Shezhou Prefecture. One was Minister Wang Yin, the other Vice-Minister Gao Yu. They garrisoned Shezhou with twenty thousand troops led by a dozen or more commanders. Wang originally was a stonemason in the Shezhou hills. He wielded a steel lance and rode a fine horse called Around the Mountains Flyer. This steed could climb slopes and ford rivers as if on level land. Gao was also a local man. He came from an old family. His weapon was a segmented lance. Because both were only slightly literate, Fang La, while giving them high administrative posts, actually limited them to military affairs.
After his defeat, Pang Wanchun returned to Shezhou and reported to the prince in the palace. "A native resident gave us away," said Pang. "He guided the Song forces along a secluded path to the pass. Our soldiers were scattered and we were unable to resist."
The prince was furious. "Yuling Pass is the most important barrier before Shezhou! Now that the Song troops have taken it, they'll be here sooner or later! How are we going to repel them?"
"Restrain your anger, Your Highness," urged Minister Wang. "As the ancients have said; 'Failure in battle should not be censured. Heaven gives perfection to no one.' Postpone punishing General Pang. Instead, issue a decree that he must win. Let him lead forth an army to drive back the Song column. If he fails to wrest victory, his crimes can be treated as double."
Fang Hou agreed. He gave Pang five thousand soldiers and ordered them to march, demanding that they return triumphant.
That day Lu Junyi launched his assault on Shezhou. The city gates opened and General Pang emerged with his large contingent. The two armies deployed in battle positions. Pang rode forward and challenged personal combat. From the Song side Ou Peng, carrying an iron lance, cantered out to meet him.
Less than five rounds they fought when Pang withdrew in defeat. Ou Peng, wanting to display his valor, galloped after. Pang turned in the saddle and let fly with an arrow. The skilful warrior Ou Peng caught it in mid-air. He didn't know that the southern general shot his arrows in series. After snatching the first missile, he raced heedless in pursuit of his foe. Pang's bow-string twanged, and a second shaft hit Ou Peng squarely, knocking him to the ground. Ministers Wang and Gao, on the city wall, saw Ou Peng fall and Pang lead his unit in a fierce charge.
The Song forces, defeated, retreated thirty //before making camp. A count of their officers and men revealed that Zhang Qing the Vegetable Gardener had been killed in battle. Sun the Witch, with the help of her soldiers, retrieved her husband's body and burned it. She wept distractedly. Lu was distressed at the sight. He felt his tactics were wrong.
"We lost another two chieftains in our attack today," he said to Zhu Wu. "How can we go on like this?"
"Victory and defeat are both usual fare to military men, and times of life and death are all predestined," said Zhu Wu. "The southerners believe they've compelled us to retreat. They're sure to launch a sneak raid against our camp tonight. We can move out and lie in ambush on four sides. In the center of camp we can tether a few sheep and then ..." Zhu Wu whispered the rest of his plan.
Huyan Zhuo hid with one unit to the left of the camp. Lin Chong with another unit to the right, Shan Tinggui and Wei Dingguo with a third unit to the north, and the other chieftains with the remaining forces along the paths all around. When the southerners raided that night, fire in the middle of the camp would be the signal for the ambushers to strike. The Song contingents took up their positions.
Meanwhile, Ministers Wang and Gao, who knew a bit of strategy, conferred with Fang Hou the king's uncle. They said: "We beat the Song forces today and forced them back thirty //: Their camp is defenseless, their men and horses exhausted. If we raid them now we can win a complete victory."
"Work it out carefully. If you're sure you can do it, go ahead."
"Pang and I will stage the raid," said Gao. "You and Wang stay here and guard the city."
That night the two generals donned their armor and marched with their troops. The horses' equipage was muffled, the men clamped sticks in their teeth to ensure silence. Nearing the camp, they saw that the stockade gate was open, and were hesitant to advance any further. The sound of the watch drum was clear, but its beat was confused. Gao reined his mount.
"Don't go in."
"Why not, sir Minister?"
"Their watch beat is all wrong. They must be up to something."
"Surely you're mistaken, sir. They're defeated, dispirited and weary. Even the watchman must be half asleep. No wonder his beat is sloppy. It's nothing to worry about. Let's just push on in."
"You're probably right."
They urged their raiders forward. Armed to the teeth, the troops entered the camp. The two southern generals went directly to headquarters, but not a commander was in sight. Suspended a few feet above the ground from some willows were a couple of sheep, drum-sticks tied to their legs. When they kicked about, they struck the drums beneath them. Thus, the erratic beat. The raiders had captured an empty camp.
"We've been tricked!" the two generals cried in alarm. They turned and ran.
Flames had begun to rise in the center of the stockade. On a mountain top a cannon boomed, and a fiery ball hit the camp. On four sides the men who had been lying in ambush now charged fiercely. The two generals, rushing through the stockade gate were met by Huyan Zhuo.
"If you want to live, bandits," he roared, "dismount and surrender!"
Minister Gao fled in panic. He wanted only to escape, he had no heart for battle. Huyan caught up, and brought his twin rods down in a blow that shattered half of Gao's skull.
General Pang fought desperately to break out of the encirclement. Just as he was getting away, a hooked pole snaked out and tripped up his horse. Tang Long, who had been hiding by the side of the road, captured Pang alive.
Song chieftains were slaughtering southern soldiers on all the mountain paths. At daybreak, they returned to camp. Lu Junyi, seated once again in his headquarters, handed out rewards. Of that we'll say no more.
A count of Lu's forces revealed the loss of chieftain Ding Desun. While in the mountains he had been bitten in the foot by a snake. The poison had seeped into his abdomen and killed him. The Song victors cut the heart out of Pang Wanchun and offered it in sacrifice to Ou Peng, Shi Jin and the other slain brothers, and sent Pang's head to Governor Zhang.
The next day, Lu and his column marched to Shezhou. The gate was open, no banners flew on the walls, the ramparts were devoid of soldiers. Shan Tinggui and Wei Dingguo, eager to win first honors, dashed in with a detachment before Lu could stop them. By the time he arrived with his central unit, they were already inside.
Minister Wang had been informed of the losses the southerners had sustained in their abortive raid on the camp. He pretended to have abandoned the city and dug a large concealed hole within the gate. When the two Song chieftains barged in, horses and riders landed in the pit. Southern spearsmen and archers, who had been hiding on either side, riddled them with spears and arrows. Poor mortals, their spirits left them in an earthen hole!
Angered by their loss, Lu ordered his vanguard to attack. Each man carried a clod of earth which he threw into the pit, then went on to join the wild carnage. In the end it was the bodies of southern soldiers and horses which filled the cavity.
On a cavorting steed at the head of his troops, Lu galloped to the center of Shezhou and ran directly into Fang Hou the king's uncle. They fought only a single round when Lu in his terrible fury called on all his might and cut Fang Hou from the saddle with a single thrust of his halberd.
The southern troops opened the West Gate and fled, hotly pursued by the Song forces. Many of the foe were killed or captured.
Meanwhile, the fleeing Minister Wang was stopped by Li Yun. Wang levelled his lance and cantered forward. Li Yun was on foot. Wang's charging steed knocked Li to the ground. Shi Yong, also on foot, ran to the rescue. But he was helpless against the southerner's lance, which darted like demon. After several rounds, it took Shi Yong's life.
From the city Sun Li, Huang Xin, Zhou Yuan and Zhou Run raced out and assailed Wang. He battled all four courageously and without fear. But then the formidable Lin Chong joined the fray. Even if he had three heads and six arms Wang couldn't have withstood five chieftains. In a concerted move, they closed in and stabbed him to death. Poor southern minister, thus ended his aspirations!
They cut off his head and galloped with it to General Lu, who was resting in the Shezhou palace. Order had been restored and proclamations reassuring the populace posted. The troops were already stationed in the city. Lu dispatched a messenger to Governor Zhang with news of the victory, and sent a similar report to Song Jiang.
Song Jiang, waiting with his army in Muzhou, was pleased that the joint offensive against the enemy's lair could now begin. But he was devastated by the loss of thirteen more chieftains, and he wept as though his heart would break. Military Advisor Wu Yong consoled him.
"Life and death are pre-ordained. Don't ruin your health with grieving. You have to deal with matters of major national importance."
"Yes, I know, but I can't help feeling awful. One hundred and eight are listed on the stone tablet in Heavenly script. Who would have thought we'd be cut down so severely. It's like losing my arms and legs!"
Wu Yong begged Song Jiang to calm himself. "Reply to Lu and fix a date for an assault on Clear Stream County," he urged.

Meanwhile, Fang La in his palace in Bangyuan Cavern in Clear Stream County summoned all of his top officials, civil and military, to discuss how to deal with Song Jiang's army. Leaders of defeated troops who had just returned reported: "Shezhou is finished, the Royal Uncle and Ministers Gao and Wang have been killed. The Song army is advancing in two columns to attack Clear Stream."
Startled, Fang La said to his ministers: "You have been appointed to the highest positions and have reaped the benefits of ruling our prefectures, shires and towns. But Song Jiang's army is rolling across the land and all of our cities have fallen, except for Clear Stream and this palace. Now he is coming here as well, in two columns. How shall we repel the foe?"
Prime Minister Lou Minzhong came forward and said: "The Song forces have nearly reached our palace, and it will be difficult to defend. Our soldiers are weak, our generals few. Unless Your Majesty takes personal command I'm afraid they won't do their utmost."
"It is indeed as you say," Fang La agreed, and he issued the order: "Let all officials of every rank prepare to go with me and fight a decisive battle."
"Who will lead the vanguard?" queried Lou.
"The Security General, Governor and Commander-in-Chief, our Royal Nephew Fang Jie. General Du Wei, Marshal of the Infantry and Cavalry, shall be his second in command. Under them will be thirty commanders leading fifteen thousand troops of the Royal Guards. Let them open paths through the mountains, bridge rivers, and advance in an offensive expedition."
Fang Jie, nephew of the king, was also the grandson of Fang Hou who had been killed at Shezhou. He had been about to ask to be sent out to avenge his grandfather, and now he was appointed leader of the vanguard. A diligent person, Fang Jie wielded a crescent-bladed halberd and was utterly fearless.
Du Wei had been a blacksmith in the mountains of Shezhou. He could forge arms and was a trusted confidant of Fang La. In battle he used six throwing knives. He fought on foot.
Fang La appointed Ho Conglong, who was master-instructor of Royal Guards, commander of another ten thousand Royal Guards, and ordered him to march against Lu Junyi in Shezhou.
Song Jiang's army meanwhile was advancing on land and water from Shezhou to Clear Stream. Li Jun was in charge of the naval units proceeding along the river. Wu Yong, riding by Song Jiang's side, had a suggestion.
"Fang La must know we're closing in. If he decides to hide in the mountains he'll be hard to find. To catch him and bring him before the emperor in the capital, we'll have to operate from within and without. Someone who recognizes him has to point him out before we can nab him. We also have to know where he's heading, so he won't escape.
"A false surrender will get our people inside his camp and enable us to cope with his moves. Chai Jin and Yan Qing have already gone as spies, but we haven't heard anything from them. Who should we have to pretend to surrender?"
"Li Jun would be best, in my humble opinion. He can sail in with grain boats and offer them as his entry gift. That will allay their suspicions. Fang La is a petty-minded fellow from a mountain hamlet. When he sees so much grain, he won't be able to turn it down."
"Very clever, Military Advisor," said Song Jiang. He dispatched Dai Zong with secret instructions to Li Jun.
The naval chieftain thereupon directed Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh to disguise themselves as captains and the Tong brothers to pretend to be sailors. They then set sail from Daxi with sixty vessels laden with grain. All flew banners indicating that they were delivering the cargo as a gift. As they neared Clear Stream County, they were met by a southern warcraft which showered them with arrows.
From the deck, Li Jun shouted: "Cease fire! I have something to say. We have come to surrender! We present this grain to your great country as a gift to your soldiers. We hope you will accept."
Clearly Li Jun and his men were unarmed. The southerners stopped shooting. They sent a boarding party, which made a careful examination then reported back to Prime Minister Lou.
"Li Jun is surrendering with a gift of grain."
Lou ordered that he be permitted to land. Brought before Lou, Li Jun bowed.
"What are you to Song Jiang?" Lou demanded. "What's your rank? Why have you come with this grain to surrender?"
"My name is Li Jun. Originally I was a bold fellow on the Xunyang River. I snatched Song Jiang from the execution grounds in Jiangzhou and saved his life. But now that he has been amnestied by the emperor and made a Vanguard General, he's forgotten the favor I and my mates have done him. Several times, he's humiliated me. Although he's occupied a number of prefectures in your great country, many of our brothers have been killed. He himself doesn't know whether to advance or retreat, but he's forcing me and my naval forces to go forward. I can't take any more of his insults! So I'm turning his grain vessels over as my personal gift, and surrendering to your great country."
Convinced, Lou conducted Li Jun to Fang La in the palace and told him about it. Li Jun kowtowed and repeated his story. Fang La saw no reason to doubt him. He appointed Li Jun Chief Admiral, and made admirals of Ruan the Fifth, Ruan the Seventh, Tong Wei and Tong Meng. The boats were to be moored in the Clear Stream naval installation.
"After I have driven back Song Jiang and restored my royal rule, I will reward you further," Fang La promised.
Li Jun bowed his thanks and left the palace. He unloaded the grain and delivered it to the granary. Of that we'll say no more.
Meanwhile, Song Jiang sent Guan Sheng, Hua Rong, Qin Ming and Zhu Tong forward with a probing contingent to the border of Clear Stream County. There they met Royal Nephew Fang Jie and his army. The two forces spread out in battle formation.
In the southern position, Fang Jie sat his horse, holding his halberd athwart. To his rear was Du Wei, on foot. Clad in full armor five throwing knives concealed behind his back, Du Wei carried a seven-starred precious sword. The two men proceeded to the front.

Qin Ming rode out from Song Jiang's position. Brandishing his wolf-toothed mace, he cantered directly towards Fang Jie. Without a word from either, they dashed. Fang Jie was young and spirited, and highly skilled with the crescent-bladed halberd. They fought more than thirty rounds, with neither emerging the victor. Both men battled relentlessly, exerting their utmost talent.
Since Fang Jie obviously wasn't making any progress, Du Wei slipped out from behind his horse and threw a knife directly at Qin Ming's face. As the thunderbolt dodged the flying blade, Fang Jie finished him with one thrust of his halberd. Poor Qin Ming the thunderbolt, he died an untimely death!
Fang Jie dared not press his advantage to attack the Song position. Junior officers quickly pulled back their slain leader with hooked poles. When informed of the loss of Qin Ming, Song Jiang blanched. He directed that the body be encoffined and prepared for burial, and again sent forward another contingent.
Emboldened by his triumph, Fang Jie shouted: "If you have any more bold warriors, let them come out and fight!"
Song Jiang hurried to the front. To the rear of Fang Jie he saw Fang La's royal entourage advancing in a body, amid poles topped by golden gourds and row upon row of battle-axes. There were lines of crescent-bladed halberds, corps of flags embroidered with dragon and phoenix, pennants of green and red, jade stirrups, tooled leather saddles, banners encrusted with pearls and sewn with kingfisher-blue thread. On panoplies of dragons rampant were stitched azure clouds and purple mist. On flags of flying tigers were designs of auspicious clouds and smoke. Civil officials stood to the left, military to the right, all in full ranks. The usurper king made a great show of having "ministers." No better than a bandit in the hills, he aspired to sovereign's rule!
And there in the middle, beneath a nine-segment imperial yellow umbrella, seated easily on a steed with a jade-encrusted bridle, was the usurper king himself—Fang La. He wore a high hood of bright gold with turned-up corners and a robe embroidered with nine dragons amid sun, moon, and clouds. A jade belt embossed with gold and precious stones bound his waist. His feet were shod in a pair of royal boots stitched in gold thread with soles of cloud design.
On a silver-white thoroughbred he rode to the front to direct the battle personally. He spotted Song Jiang, opposite on horseback, and ordered Fang Jie to capture him. The Song forces also prepared to fight and catch Fang La. Fang Jie was about to go forth when a mounted messenger galloped up and reported.
"The Song forces under General Lu Junyi captured Ho Conglong when his army went to the rescue of Shezhou. They have scattered our troops and are already at the rear of the mountain!"
Fang La was shocked. He hastily ordered a withdrawal and a defense of the palace. Fang Jie instructed Du Wei to hold the position while the king retreated, then the two commanders followed.
On arriving in Clear Stream, Fang La heard cries and lamentations rising from the palace. Everywhere was the glow of flames. Soldiers and horses milled about in confusion. Li Jun and his four companions had set the city to the torch. Fang La rushed in with his Royal Guards in an attempt to save Clear Stream.
Song Jiang and his army gave chase, fighting and killing. They saw that the city was on fire and knew that Li Jim and the others had performed their mission. They drove on. Just then Lu Junyi and his column rounded the mountain, and they joined forces and attacked together.
The Clear Stream palace was crushed in a vice of Song troops. Everywhere they captured southern soldiers. They broke the defenses of the city completely. Guarded by Fang Jie and his men, the king fled to Bangyuan Cavern.
Song Jiang and his main army entered Clear Stream. They sacked Fang La's palace, destroying his illegal royal paraphernalia and confiscating his valuables. They burned the palace to the ground and cleaned out his treasury and granary.
Reunited, the forces of Song Jiang and Lu Junyi made camp in Clear Stream, and the chieftains came forward to claim their rewards. A count revealed more losses. The tall Yu Baosi and Sun the Witch had died of wounds inflicted by Du Wei's throwing knives. Zou Yuan and Du Qian were trampled to death by horses. LiLi, Tang Long and Cai Fu had all been severely wounded, and medical treatment had been of no avail. Ruan the Fifth had been killed by Prime Minister Lou in Clear Stream County.
The chieftains received awards for the ninety-two southern officials they had caught. Lou and Du Wei had disappeared. Notices were posted reassuring the population, and the captured officials were sent to governor Zhang's headquarters, where they would be decapitated and their heads hung up on display.
A local informant reported: "When your army broke into Clear Stream, Lou hung himself in a pine grove because he killed Ruan the Fifth."
Du Wei hid in the home of the mistress he was keeping, a young singer. Her pander exposed him, and Song Jiang rewarded the man. On Song Jiang's orders, Du was decapitated. Cai Qing cut out Du Wei's heart and offered it, dripping blood, in sacrifice to the chieftains who died in the Clear Stream battle. Song Jiang officiated personally at the ceremony. The next day, he and Lu Junyi marched with their units to Bangyuan Cavern and surrounded the entrance. Fang La sat tight in his cavern, defended only by Fang Jie and his troops. But the southerners would not come out and fight and the Song contingents had no way of getting in.
Although Fang La was anxious, there was nothing else he could do. The stalemate continued for several days. Fang La was sunk in gloom. Suddenly, a high official in an embroidered silken robe prostrated himself at the foot of the gold dais. "I've no talents, Sire," said the man, "but I've never repaid for the great benevolence Your Majesty has bestowed upon me. I'm familiar with all the books of military lore and I've devoted my life to weaponry. If you'll give me a detachment, Sire, I'll drive back the Song army and restore our nation. I hope my proposal meets with Your Majesty's wishes." Delighted, Fang La mustered the soldiers in the cavern palace and sent the man forth with them to fight Song Jiang. It was impossible to predict who would win, since both sides were strikingly impressive. And because Fang La dispatched this unit, heads rolled at the foot of the golden dais and hot blood spattered the jade-panelled palace door. Fang La's nest was swept clean and Song Jiang performed a great deed.

Now as Scimitar and his three companions raced up Black Dragon Ridge they came face to face with Marshal Shi Bao and his men. "You bandits, how dare you kill our comrades!" Scimitar yelled at them.
When Marshal Shi Bao saw it was Scimitar he had no stomach for the fight. He retreated to the top of the pass and ordered his lieutenant Bai Qin to fight Scimitar. Two horses met, weapons were raised to strike, but before they had completed ten bouts, the gong was beaten urgently at the top of the pass to recall the troops. Scimitar did not pursue them.
Up on top of the pass there was a state of panic. Marshal Shi Bao had only been attending to the attack from the east. He had not been prepared for trouble from the west, where Marshal Tong now came storming up with a large squadron of cavalry. The chief Song general was Wang Bing and he took on the southerners' Jing De. After a dozen bouts Wang Bing knocked his opponent from his horse.
Little Duke and the Halberdier charged forward to capture the pass but before they got there a huge boulder came crashing down on the Halberdier killing both horse and man.
When Scimitar on the western slopes saw the tumult at the top of the mountain and learnt that there were Song troops on the west, he gave all his commanders the order to launch a concerted attack. There was fierce fighting on top of the pass, with the defenders pressed on both sides.
Little Duke met Bai Qin and they engaged in furious combat. After a couple of bouts Bai Qin thrust with his spear and Little Duke dodged, allowing the weapon to pass harmlessly under his armpit, and then responded by slashing with his halberd. The two horsemen were so close they had no room to wield their weapons, so they cast them aside and wrestled with each other. They had come to a very precipitous part of the mountain where there was no firm foothold for the horses and the furious struggle of the riders suddenly caused both men and horses to plunge over the edge. Both men fell together to their deaths on the mountain!
By now Scimitar and his men were storming up the mountain on foot. With Song troops coming up on both sides, Shi Bao could see there was no escape either way and rather than face the ignominy of capture he killed himself with his own sword. The pass at Black Dragon Ridge was taken and Scimitar ordered Song Jiang to be informed immediately.
Down at the river base the four southern boat commanders, seeing Black Dragon Ridge was lost and Muzhou had fallen, abandoned their boats and fled across the river, where people living along the other bank captured two of them and brought them in to Muzhou. The other two got away and it is not known where they went.
The main Song army now headed back to Muzhou. When Song Jiang heard, he came out to meet them. Marshal Tong and General Liu entered the city and took up quarters there. After they had installed themselves, they issued a proclamation to calm the enemy troops and civilians, telling them to go about their ordinary business. Countless southern troops surrendered. Song Jiang distributed all the public stores of rice among the people, and the whole district was pacified and renewed its allegiance to the Emperor. The two captured boat commanders were cut to pieces and their hearts offered up to the spirits of Ruan the Second and Flagpole. Offerings were also made to the spirits of all the comrades who had died on Black Dragon Ridge. White-Water Dragon and the other boat commanders were enlisted again to prepare several boats and transport the captured officials of the bogus king to Marshal Zhang at headquarters. Song Jiang's grief at losing Little Duke and the Halberdier was boundless. He ordered no further advance. He was waiting till the Unicorn and his forces arrived so they could carry out a combined attack on Clearwater.
We shall leave Song Jiang in the camp at Muzhou and tell how, after the troops were divided at Hangzhou, the Unicorn, as second-in-command of Song Jiang's army with thirty thousand men and twenty commanders under him, took the mountain route to Shezhou. They passed King Qian's old capital of Lin'an and began to approach Sundance Pass. This was guarded by one of Fang La's generals called Pang Wanchun, known as the Master Bowman. He was the finest archer in all the regions south of the river held by Fang La. He had two lieutenants, Lei Jiong and Ji Ji, who could handle immensely strong crossbows and also fought with spiked maces. They each had five thousand men.
The pass, then, was defended by these three. When they heard that the Unicorn, second-in-command of the Song forces, was on his way, they readied their weapons and awaited the enemy's arrival. Now the Unicorn's army was very nearly at the foot of the pass and they sent out an advance guard of three thousand infantry under Tattooed Dragon, Madcap, River-Jumper, White-Spotted Snake, Tiger-Killer and the Pill Monger to reconnoitre. These six commanders were all mounted on war chargers, while the rest were on foot. They proceeded to the foot of the pass without encountering a single enemy soldier and Tattooed Dragon began to get suspicious and was about to call for a discussion. But before he could open his mouth they reached the foot of the pass and looking up saw a white embroidered banner with Bowman standing beneath it.
When Bowman saw Tattooed Dragon and his companions, he began to insult them: "You're a bunch of robbers, only fit for life on Mount Liang! You wangled yourselves an amnesty from the Song emperor. How dare you invade our territory, and pretend to be heroes. Have you heard that men call me the Master Bowman? I'm told that among your rabble there's someone they call Hua Rong the Archer. Send him out so I can give him a lesson in archery! You lot can have a little demonstration of my mastery right now!" Even before this tirade finished, an arrow was winging its way. It hit Tattooed Dragon fair and square, toppling him from his horse. The other five rushed forward to pick him up and get him back on his horse, intending to carry him to safety. But at that moment gongs rang out on top of the mountain and volleys of arrows were fired simultaneously from the pine trees on either side of them. They had to forget about Tattooed Dragon; it was every man for himself. When they reached the mouth of the gorge, Lei and Ji were positioned there on either side and the crossbow bolts rained down. Brave as lions they might be, but there was no escaping this barrage. There on the river bank the unfortunate six learnt all about the vanity of human aspirations! Tattooed Dragon, Madcap and the rest, not one of them escaped; they were just a pile of corpses on the mountainside!
Of three thousand infantry only about a hundred men survived and got back to tell the Unicorn what had happened. The Unicorn was thunderstruck. For a long time he stood there in a daze, like someone out of his wits or drunk.
The Strategist also grieved for his old comrades River-Jumper and White-Spotted Snake, but in the end he said: "Calm yourself, commander, or we will fail in the main task. We should devise a new tactic for taking the pass and killing their commanders, in order to avenge this horror."
The Unicorn said: "The Leader gave all these commanders and men into my charge and now before even winning one battle I have lost six of the leaders and three thousand men. Only a hundred have come back. If things go on like this, how will I ever be able to meet him in Shezhou?"
The Strategist said: "There's an old military saying: 'Topography counts for more than time, and good relations with the locals are the most important of all.' We are all men from the central plains, from Shandong and Hebei. We're not used to fighting along the rivers, so we don't have the territorial advantage here. We must get some of the local people to show us the way; we must learn from them all the twists and turns of the mountain trails."
The Unicorn said: "You are quite right. But who should we send to find out about this?"
The Strategist said: "I'd like to suggest the Flea. With his ability to walk on rooftops and scale walls he should be ideal for the mission."
The Unicorn accordingly summoned the Flea and the latter, after he'd had it explained to him, set off, equipped with some dry rations and a sharp dagger.
The Flea made his way deep into the mountains. He was so intent on finding his way the day passed quickly and it began to get dark. He came to a place where he could see a light glimmering in the distance. He said to himself: "If there's a light, there must be someone's house." Under cover of darkness he crept towards the light. What he found was a little thatched hut, with light filtering through the walls. He walked up to the front and peered in. An old monk was sitting on the floor reciting the scriptures. The Flea knocked on the door and the monk called to a young boy, who opened up. The Flea entered and prostrated himself before the monk. The latter said: "No need for ceremony, sir. How did you find your way here, in these times of strife?"
"I will not deceive you, Master," the Flea said. "I am one of Song Jiang's officers, from Mount Liang, they call me the Flea. We have been commissioned by the Emperor to capture Fang La. Unfortunately yesterday six of our commanders were shot dead by the enemy forces holding Sundance Pass. We don't know any way to get across and they have sent me to reconnoitre and find out what trails there are that cross the mountain. I have been wandering all day through some very wild places and now I've got here. I very much hope you will be able to instruct me, if there are some hidden ways to cross the mountain. I should be extremely grateful."
The old monk said: "The people here have all suffered persecution from Fang La, there is none who does not hate him. I live here through the charity of the people, whose offerings feed me. But lately the villagers have all been driven away and since I have nowhere else to go I just have to stay here and wait for death to come. It is a great cause for rejoicing that the Song army is here and everyone is pleased about it. If you capture the bandits you will be delivering the people from a great evil. I have been afraid to say too much lest they get to hear of it. But if you are a representative of the imperial army, then I can talk to you freely. Where I am here there is no way over the pass. But there is a path over to the west that will take you across. I fear though that the enemy may have blocked it and you won't be able to get through."
The Flea said: "If there is this path, Master, I would like to know if it connects with the enemy's camp."
The old monk said: "This hidden path comes out right behind the enemy camp. Downhill from there is the way across the mountain. Only I'm afraid they may have put big boulders across it and it will be hard to get through."
The Flea said: "Never mind about that. So long as there is a path, there's no problem about anything they may have done to block it; we can find a way to deal with that. After what you've told me, I'd better go back and report to the commander-in-chief. I'll be back to reward you later."
The old monk said: "If you see any strangers, please don't talk to them about me."
"I'm very discreet. I won't say a word about you."
The Flea bade the old monk farewell and went back to the camp. He told the Unicorn what he had heard. The latter was delighted and asked the Strategist to devise a plan for capturing the pass. The Strategist said: "If there's a path through the mountain, we've got them! You must send the Flea out again with someone else because there's an important job to do."
"What is the job?" the Flea asked.
The Strategist replied: "The important part is starting fires and letting off flares. The two of you must carry rockets and kindling materials with you. Go to the back of their camp and get the fires and the rockets going, that is going to be your job."
The Flea said: "If that's all it is, there's no need for anyone else to come with me. I can do it all myself. If you send anyone else along he won't be as good at climbing as me and it could mess things up. But if I go and carry out this assignment, how are the rest of you going to get up the mountain?"
The Strategist said: "That's easy. That ambush of theirs can only work once. I don't care about their ambushes. Whenever we find thick undergrowth along the way we shall set fire to it. Then it won't make any difference if they do have an ambush."
The Flea said: "Brilliant!" He collected the incendiary materials, tied the rockets in a pack and strapped it to his back, bade the Unicorn farewell and was ready to set off. The Unicorn gave him twenty taels of silver and a catty of rice to give to the old monk and ordered a soldier to carry it. In the afternoon he and the bearer took his former route to the thatched hut where he said to the old monk: "Our commander-in-chief sends his respects and offers you this small gift." He handed over the silver and the rice, which the monk took, and then sent the soldier back to the camp. Then he asked the monk if he would show him the way. The monk said: "Wait a little. You can go when it's really dark. If you go in daylight I'm afraid they may spot you." He prepared some supper for the Flea and when night came he told his acolyte to guide the Flea as far as a certain place and then return, taking care not to be seen. The boy led them deep into the mountains by hidden trails. Traversing the forest and skirting peaks, sometimes having to clamber on hands and knees, they covered several miles of trail through mountain fastnesses under a pale moon, till they reached a forbidding cliff, a jagged wall of rock. A single narrow opening was visible in the distance, but great boulders were piled up there creating a formidable barrier.
The boy said: "You can see the pass from here, commander. It's where that pile of rocks is. Beyond that there is a clear road."
"You go back now, lad," said the Flea. "I can find my way from here."
The boy left and the Flea brought his special skills to bear — walking on roof tops, remember, scaling walls, vaulting fences and doing dodgy deals — as he negotiated the piled-up rocks. Over in the east a red glow was filling the sky, arising among the trees. It was the Unicorn and the Strategist, who had struck camp and were advancing towards the pass, setting fire to the forest as they went. The four or five hundred men in the lead, were picking up their dead as they skirted the mountain and setting fire to the undergrowth, to rob the enemy troops in ambush of their cover.
Up on Sundance Pass Bowman heard that the Song troops were setting fire to the forest and said: "So that's their plan. They want to prevent our setting up ambushes. Well, we'll just concentrate on holding the pass. They'll never get through."
As the Song troops gradually drew closer, he and his lieutenants, Lei and Ji, took up their positions in the pass.
Meanwhile the Flea had made his way step by step up the mountain. He climbed into the crown of a tall tree and hid among the foliage. From this vantage point he was able to observe the three enemy commanders preparing their arrows and cocking their crossbows and settling down behind cover to wait. He could also see the Song troops starting up the fires as they advanced. Among them were Leopard's Head and Twin Rods, who reined in their horses below the pass and shouted: "You villains, how dare you offer resistance to the imperial army?" The southerners were just waiting for the chance to shoot; they had not seen the Flea, who was already behind their lines.
Cautiously the Flea climbed down from the tree and made his way to the back of the pass. There he found two piles of firewood. He took out his tinder box and kindled a flame. He set the rockets up on top of the firewood, laid a trail of gunpowder to ignite the further of the two piles, and then lit the fuse on the nearer one. As the fuses burnt he took more rockets and a light and climbed onto the roof of a building to set fire to it. The two piles of firewood ignited simultaneously and the rockets went off with a shattering bang. The effect on the troops guarding the pass was devastating. A great cry went up and they all tried to flee. No one thought any more about fighting. As Bowman and his two lieutenants rushed back to put out the fire, the Flea set off more rockets on the roof of the building. They went off with a roar that shook the whole building and the terrified enemy troops threw down their weapons, abandoned their armour and clothing and fled down the other side of the mountain. From his position on the roof the Flea was shouting: "There's ten thousand Song troops on the pass. You'd all better surrender if you want to save your lives!"
Bowman was frightened out of his wits, stumbling about in panic. Lei and Ji were scared rigid, too shocked even to move.
Leopard's Head and Twin Rods led the charge up the mountain and dashed to the head of the pass. All the leaders were competing to be first and they chased the fleeing southerners more than ten miles beyond the pass. Colonel Sun captured Lei, the Fire General took Ji, Bowman was the only one who got away. Most of his troops were captured. The Song army made camp at the top of the pass.
With Sundance Pass now in his hands, the Unicorn rewarded the Flea. The hearts of Lei and Ji were cut out there on the mountain and offered to the spirits of Tattooed Dragon, Madcap and the other six, whose recovered bodies were buried there too. The rest of the dead were burnt.
Next day all the leaders armed and mounted. A report was sent to Marshal Zhang, informing him of the capture of Sundance Pass, and the troops moved on, making camp when they were close to Shezhou.
Now the governor of Shezhou was Fang La's uncle, Fang Hou. He had two assistants, civilian appointments, to help guard the town. One was Chancellor Wang, the other Secretary Gao. Under their orders were another dozen military officers and a garrison of twenty thousand men. Chancellor Wang had originally been a local stone mason. He wielded a bronze spear and had a fine horse, known as the Mountain Flyer, because it could traverse mountains and rivers as if they were level ground. Secretary Gao was also a local man, scion of an ancient family. His weapon was the rods. Because these two had considerable literary talents, Fang La had conferred high rank on them and given them temporary command of troops.
When the defeated Bowman returned he went straight to the palace and told the Royal Uncle: "The Song troops have overrun the pass because local people showed them the hidden trails to follow on the mountain. Our army has been routed and we cannot stop the enemy."
The Royal Uncle was outraged. He stormed at Bowman, saying: "Sundance Pass is our most important weapon against attack. If the Song army has broken through, it won't be long before they are at the gates of Shezhou. How are we going to keep them out?"
Chancellor Wang said: "Calm yourself, Your Highness. Remember the saying, 'Victory and defeat are a soldier's lot; you can't blame anything on a single battle.' Your Highness should postpone sentencing Bowman and let him lead the troops again with orders to win, to be first in the field and repulse the enemy. If he fails again you can double the sentence."
The Royal Uncle concurred and gave Bowman five thousand troops, with orders to go out and face the enemy and not come back till he had defeated them.
After Sundance Pass, the Unicorn pressed on to Shezhou and launched an attack with all his commanders. The gates opened and Bowman rode out to offer battle. The two armies took up their positions and Bowman rode out in front and issued his challenge. Golden Wings rode out from the Song ranks with his steel spear and engaged him. Before they had fought five bouts, Bowman fled. Golden Wings, eager to show his prowess, gave chase. Bowman twisted in the saddle and fired an arrow behind him. Golden Wings adroitly plucked the arrow from the air. Unfortunately it did not occur to him that Bowman could fire off two arrows in quick succession. Having caught one arrow he relaxed his vigilance and gave himself up to the chase. The bowstring twanged as Bowman fired a second arrow and Golden Wings fell. On the city walls Chancellor Wang and Secretary Gao saw the enemy commander fall and reckoning that Bowman had won the fight charged out with all the troops remaining in the city. The Song forces were defeated and retreated to a position ten miles away where they made camp. The leaders were counted and it was found that they had also lost the Gardener in the fighting. When she heard her husband was dead, Sister Sun the Ogress sent some of her troops out to bring the body back for cremation and she wept for a long time. The Unicorn's heart was heavy. His plan, he felt, had not been good, and he summoned the Strategist to develop a new one: "In today's attack we lost two more leaders. What are we going to do?"

The Strategist said: "Winning or losing, victory or defeat, it's all in the day's work for a soldier. Today the enemy saw us retreat and they'll want to make the most of it. They'll be thinking tonight is the time to take advantage and I'm sure they'll raid our camp. Let us redeploy all our troops and set up ambushes on all sides. Tie some sheep up here and then make certain arrange-ments. Twin Rods can set up an ambush on the left, Leopard's Head on the right, the Water General and the Fire General to the rear and the rest of you conceal yourselves all around along all the small paths. Tonight when they attack wait for the signal flare from the centre and then fall on them from every direction."
When the Unicorn had issued all the instructions, everyone went off to make their preparations.
Now Chancellor Wang and Secretary Gao were not without ideas. After discussing things with Bowman, they went to the Royal Uncle and put a proposal to him: "Today the Song army is defeated, They have retreated to a position about ten miles away. They are camped in the middle of nowhere and their army must be exhausted. Surely we should take this opportunity to go there and finish the business off?"
The Royal Uncle said: "Consider it carefully with all the com-manders, and if it can be done, do it."
Secretary Gao said: "I propose with Bowman to carry out an attack on their camp. The Chancellor will stay here with Your Highness to guard the city."
That night the two commanders put on their armour and led out their forces, with harness bells muffled and the troops gagged to prevent talking. They reached the Song camp. The gates were closed and they were at first reluctant to go in. For a while they listened to the drum beat sounding the hours. At first it sounded clearly enough, but later it became confused. Secretary Gao reined in his horse and said: "We can't go on!"
Bowman said: "Why not, Your Excellency?"
"The sound of their drum is unclear. There's something up!"
"I don't think so, Your Excellency. They came back defeated today. They must be exhausted. They're half asleep. that's why the drumbeat is not clear. We're wasting time, Your Excellency. We ought to attack!"
"All right then!" with this Secretary Gao gave the word for an all-out attack on the camp. But when they got through the gate and headed for the enemy headquarters, there was not a single enemy soldier to be seen. All they found was a willow tree with a number of sheep tied to it. Attached to the sheep's legs were drumsticks, arranged to beat the drums. So that was why the drum beat had sounded so unclear! They had captured an empty camp. It was extremely ominous. The cry went up: "It's a trap!" As they turned to leave fire broke out in the enemy headquarters and explosions sounded on the surrounding hillside. On every side the troops in ambush sprang out and attacked. The southerners raced for the gate, but here they met Twin Rods, who roared: "Dismount and surrender, you bandits, if you want to save your lives!"
Secretary Gao's only thought was to run for it. He had no stomach for a fight. But Twin Rods was onto him, bringing his weapon down with a force that split his skull. Bowman fought desperately to escape from the encirclement and succeeded in getting away. But he was not watching out for Spots who was still concealed and with his hooked spear tripped Bowman's horse and captured him alive. The rest of the army pursued the southerners along the mountain trails until dawn and then returned to camp.
Back at headquarters the Unicorn ordered the leaders to be counted and it was reported that Scarface had been bitten in the foot by a poisonous snake on one of the mountain paths and the poison had risen to his stomach and killed him. They cut out Bowman's heart and offered it to the spirits of Golden Wings, Tattooed Dragon and the rest. The head was then sent back to Marshal Zhang.
Next day the Unicorn renewed the attack on Shezhou. They found the gates of the town open. No flag was flying on the walls and there were no sentries in the watchtower. The Fire General and the Water General eager for glory charged through the gate, the Unicorn following with the rest of the army. He had cause to lament. The other two had already gone through, but Chancellor Wang on learning that the force sent to attack the enemy camp had been destroyed had set up this pretence of an abandoned town and had dug a big pit just inside the gate. The two leaders bursting with heroism had taken no precautions as they entered and both men and horses had plunged into the pit. The spearsmen and archers concealed on either side stepped forward and slaughtered them. Unfortunate water and fire geniuses, their fame was buried with them in a hole in the ground!
The Unicorn grieved for the loss of two more leaders. He quickly gave the order that each man in the advance guard was to carry a sack of earth to throw in the pit and to go on in and massacre the southerners till the pit was filled with their bodies too. He led the charge into the city himself, on a prancing horse. He met the Royal Uncle, Fang Hou. They had fought just one bout before the Unicorn, driven by his burning rage, summoned up all his considerable powers and struck a blow with his halberd that swept his opponent clean off his horse. The troops in the city opened the west gate and fled. The leaders of the Song army fought their way forward to capture the southerners.
As Chancellor Wang was trying to escape he ran into Green-Eyes, who attacked with his spear. Wang counter-attacked, also with a spear. Since Green-Eyes was fighting on foot and Wang was mounted, Green-Eyes was soon trampled under the horse's hooves. The Guv saw him knocked down and rushed to the rescue. Wang was fiendishly skilful with the spear and the Guv had no chance against him. After several bouts Wang had a clear advantage and with a sudden spear thrust took the Guv's life. He died on the spot.
Colonel Sun, the Tamer, Forester and Rhinoceros now arrived on the scene and halted Wang's charge. He fought furiously against four adversaries at once and showed absolutely no fear. Then suddenly Leopard's Head joined the fray. This was another who could not be frightened and even if Wang had had three heads and six arms he wouldn't have been able to stand up against five. All of them now were stabbing and hacking away at Wang, and this time things were quite beyond the unfortunate Chancellor's control. The five Song commanders were soon galloping back with the head to show it to the Unicorn, who by now was resting in the Shezhou governor's residence. Order was restored, a proclamation was issued to reassure the citizens, the leaders were given quarters inside the town and a messenger was sent with a report to Marshal Zhang. At the same time the Unicorn informed Song Jiang that he was ready to attack.
Song Jiang and his comrades, remember, were at Muzhou, waiting for the armies to join up so they could attack the bandits' hideout together. He received the Unicorn's dispatch announcing that Shezhou had been reconquered and the commanders had occupied the city centre and were awaiting the command to move against the viper's nest. Song Jiang also learnt that they had lost Tattooed Dragon, Madcap, River-Jumper, White-Spotted Snake, Tiger-Killer, Pill Monger, Golden Wings, the Gardener, Scarface, the Fire General, the Water General, Green-Eyes and the Guv, thirteen leaders in all, as well as many junior officers. It was extremely painful and he grieved bitterly. The Professor did his best to animate him: "A man's living and dying are ordained by fate. This grieving is damaging to your health. Let us keep our eye on what is important, the national interest."
Song Jiang said: "You are right, but one cannot help grieving. I keep remembering how at the outset one hundred and eight names were recorded in mystic writing on the stone tablet. Who would have expected that now so many are fallen! One after another, so many of my limbs hacked off!"
The Professor tried to console Song Jiang and then wrote a reply to the Unicorn, fixing a date for the joint attack on Clearwater.
Now we shall leave Song Jiang and the Unicorn and turn to Fang La, sitting in council in his citadel at Bangyuan Gap in Clearwater, discussing with his officials, civil and military, how to deal with Song Jiang's offensive. When the remnants of the defeated army straggled back and told him Shezhou had fallen, and that his uncle, Fang Hou, the Chancellor and the Secretary were all dead, and the Song forces in two divisions were advancing to attack Clearwater, Fang La was horrified. To the ranks of his assembled courtiers he said: "All of you have received honours from me, you have your share of power in my government and enjoy great riches. How can you allow Song Jiang's forces to push you back like this and allow so many cities to fall, so that now Clearwater remains our only stronghold? I have just been told that the Song army is on its way here. How are we to confront them?"
Then Chief Minister Lou stepped forward and declared: "Now that the Song forces have reached Shezhou, it will be difficult to defend this palace. Since our numbers are small and our leaders few, I am afraid that unless Your Majesty leads the campaign himself our generals will not go forward with confidence."
Fang La said: "That is reasonable." He accordingly issued a proclamation in which he declared that every region and every district, every official and imperial servant, councillor or officer was to go forward under the sovereign's leadership to conclude the war.
Lou also asked: "What leader should we appoint to command the vanguard?"
Fang La replied: "I will appoint the commander of my own palace guard, the royal nephew Fang Jie, with Colonel Du Wei from my personal staff as his deputy. They can have thirteen thousand guards from the citadel and three thousand officers to lead the attack."
This Fang Jie was indeed Fang La's nephew, grandson of the Fang Hou who had commanded the garrison at Shezhou and had just been killed by the Unicorn, and he was eager to avenge his grandfather, so he really wanted this command. He was a scholar, but he had learned to manage the square halberd and was as brave as they come. As for Du Wei, he had been a Shezhou blacksmith skilled in the manufacture of weapons and was a close friend of Fang La's. He used six throwing knives and fought on foot.
Fang La also gave out another order sending Instructor Ho Conglong of the palace guard with ten thousand men against the Unicorn in Shezhou.
We will leave Fang La to his arrangements for countering the enemy on two fronts, and rejoin Song Jiang and his army as they set off by land and water, leaving Muzhou and heading for Clearwater. White-Water Dragon with his sailors and boats pushed off from the river bank while the Professor and Song Jiang rode with the land force. The Professor spoke as follows: "My one fear about this campaign is that Fang La may escape deep into the mountains where it will be difficult to catch him. If we are to take him alive so that he can be handed over and exhibited to the Emperor, we need cooperation from within. If we can make contact with one of his own people we will be able to get him. We need to know his whereabouts, so he can't get away."
Song Jiang said: "Right, in that case we must use the trick of pretending surrender, we must fight deception with deception, in order to set up a conspiracy within. We sent Mr. Chai and the Prodigy there as spies, but we have not heard anything from them. Who can we send now? It must be someone who can plausibly pretend to be surrendering."
The Professor said: "In my view the White-Water Dragon would be the best one to send. He can take some transports full of grain and pretend he is handing them over as a pledge of his good faith. Fang La is a peasant at heart and when he sees so much grain he won't be able to resist it."
Song Jiang said: "Good thinking!" He sent Magic Messenger by water to where White-Water Dragon was, to acquaint him with the plan and give him his instructions. As soon as White-Water Dragon had grasped what was wanted, Magic Messenger returned to the main army.
White-Water Dragon told Ruan the Fifth and Ruan the Seventh to disguise themselves as bo'suns with Cave Dragon and River Rider as ordinary seamen. With sixty transports, all flying newly altered flags signalling that the supplies they carried were intended as tribute, they sailed up the main river. When they approached Clearwater, southern war boats appeared up river and bore down on them, simultaneously firing arrows. White-Water Dragon shouted out: "Don't fire, I want to talk! We want to surrender and we are bringing these supplies as tribute to your prince, to feed his army. We hope you will accept us."
The commander of the other boats, seeing they were unarmed, held his fire and sent someone across to question them. He saw that the boats were indeed full of grain and a report was sent to Chief Minister Lou, saying that the White-Water Dragon had surrendered and was handing over grain supplies as tribute. The Chief Minister ordered the men ashore. When White-Water Dragon had paid his respects, the Chief Minister asked him: "What exactly are you in Song Jiang's army? What is your position? And why do you want to surrender?"
"My name is Li Jun and I was born on the Yangtze. I saved Song Jiang's life when we raided the execution ground in Jiangzhou. Recently he received an amnesty from the Emperor. Since he was made general and commander of the government expeditionary force, he has forgotten what he owes to us. He has slighted me many times. Now with this invasion of your territory we keep losing more and more of our comrades and he himself cannot make up his mind whether to go forward or retreat, but he always forces us sailors into the front line. We are tired of being humiliated, and we have secretly diverted his grain supplies to hand over to you so we can surrender."
After all this the Chief Minister not only decided to trust him but also took him into the palace to tell Fang La about his surrender and the supplies. White-Water Dragon prostrated himself before Fang La and repeated his request. Fang La suspected nothing. He told the four boat captains to bring their boats into the government harbour and promised that when he had driven out Song Jiang's army he would reward them further. White-Water Dragon prostrated himself in thanks and went out to supervise the unloading of the supplies, for removal to the government granary. Of this no more.
We now return to Song Jiang and the Professor and their arrangements. Four commanders, Scimitar, Colonel Hua, Thunderclap and Whiskers were appointed to the vanguard and they led the army as far as the border of Clearwater, where they came into contact with Fang La's nephew, Fang Jie. The two armies took up their positions and then Fang Jie rode out with his halberd at the slope, while Du Wei on foot stood behind him. This Du Wei was in full armour with five throwing knives slung behind him and a seven-star sword in his hand. One behind the other they rode out in front of their army. Thunderclap was the first out on Song Jiang's side. Whirling his wolf's-tooth mace he charged Fang Jie. Now Fang Jie was a young man, but very determined and he handled the square halberd with great expertise. He fought more than thirty bouts with Thunderclap and neither had the advantage. Fang Jie could see that Thunderclap was extremely skilled, and was fighting with a lifetime's experience behind him; he gave his opponent no opening. The contest was at its height and Thunderclap continued to use all his skills, not offering his opponent the slightest chance. But he failed to observe the scoundrel Du Wei who had followed on behind Fang Jie's horse and who now darted out with one of his knives in his hand and flung it in Thunderclap's face. As he tried to dodge, Thunderclap was caught by a blow from Fang Jie's halberd and knocked from his horse. He was dead before he hit the ground. Poor Thunderclap, he was extinguished quite soundlessly! Fang Jie did not dare follow up this victory and the Song troops were able to drag the body away, using hooks. They were demoralized by the loss of Thunderclap and Song Jiang had to reorganize them to continue the battle as well as make arrangements for the burial.
Fang Jie was full of his victory. He stood in front of the ranks and yelled: "If there are any more of you Song warriors who fancy yourselves, come out and fight!"
Thereupon Song Jiang rode out in front. He could see that behind Fang Jie on horseback under a yellow silk umbrella was the rebel prince himself, Fang La.
Fang La now rode out in front and took control of the battle. When he saw Song Jiang there he sent Fang Jie off to fight and capture him. For their part, the Song troops were preparing to engage with the aim of capturing Fang La. As Fang Jie was about to do battle, a messenger arrived: "Instructor Ho of the royal guard and his men on their way to relieve Shezhou have been captured by Song troops under the Unicorn. Their forces have been destroyed and Song troops have reached the mountain behind us."
Horrified by the news, Fang La hurriedly ordered the army to fall back on the citadel. Fang Jie told Du Wei they must hold the front line to give the royal carriage time to get away. Having done this, they too withdrew. As they reached the outskirts of Clearwater they heard a tremendous uproar rising heavenwards, and saw fires blazing everywhere, men and horses milling about. It was White-Water Dragon and the boat captains setting fire to Clearwater. When Fang La saw this he ordered the royal guard into the city to save it. They charged in and the situation became very confused. Seeing that the enemies were in retreat, Song Jiang's forces gave chase. When they reached the city and saw the flames they knew that White-Water Dragon and his companions were at work. The troops were mustered and every commander ordered to attack on his own initiative. By now the Unicorn's men had also got beyond the pass and were coming up in support on either side, their arrival most timely. Song troops were attacking the Clearwater base from every side. Song Jiang and all his comrades were charging in from all directions, every one of them bent on capturing southern troops and razing Clearwater to the ground. Fang La now had only Fang Jie to lead the army, protect him, and cover his withdrawal to the citadel at Bangyuan Gap. Song Jiang's main force now entered Clearwater. They burst into Fang La's palace, collected up all the illegal weapons, money and treasure, and after checking the palace stores set fire to it, burning down Fang La's whole establishment. The government warehouses were also ransacked. Song Jiang and the Unicorn's joined forces and made camp inside the city. The commanders all gathered to claim their rewards. When the leaders of both armies were counted it was found that Perilous and the Ogress had both been killed by Du Wei's throwing knives, Rhinoceros and Skyscraper had been trampled to death in the mêlée by cavalry; the Executioner, Spots and Strongarm, who had received wounds so serious that the doctor was unable to save them, were dead too. Ruan the Fifth who had been first into Clearwater was killed by Chief Minister Lou. The Song leaders claimed the capture of ninety-two of the usurper's officers, and were duly rewarded. Only Chief Minister Lou and Du Wei were unaccounted for. A proclamation was issued to reassure the populace and the captured officers were sent off to Marshal Zhang at headquarters for beheading. Later a member of the public came and reported that the Chief Minister, having killed Ruan the Fifth and knowing that the city was lost, had hanged himself from a tree. As for the villainous Du Wei, he tried to hide in the house of his kept woman, Baby Wang, but had been handed over by her protector. Song Jiang rewarded the protector, and then sent people to fetch the body of the Chief Minister. He ordered Blossom to cut out Du Wei's heart and liver and the warm blood was spilt in offering to the spirits of Thunderclap, Ruan the Fifth, Perilous and the Ogress and all the rest who had given their lives in the battle for Clearwater. Song Jiang publicly offered incense with his own hands and then next day with the Unicorn marched to the citadel at Bangyuan Gap and invested it. As for Fang La, with only his nephew Fang Jie to guard him he had withdrawn to his citadel. There his forces strengthened their defences and would not come out to fight. Song Jiang and the Unicorn laid siege to the place, but they had no means of getting inside. For Fang La, however, it was like sitting on needles. When the siege had been continuing for a number of days and Fang La's spirits were at very low ebb, a tall gentleman in court robes presented himself, bowing to the ground in front of the throne. "Your Majesty," he said, "I am nothing, but your munificence and grace are such that I must do my best to requite them by offering you my services, relying on the ancient knowledge of tactics I have acquired, the hidden secrets of warfare, all the lessons and experience derived from the manuals of military art. If Your Majesty will grant me the troops, I shall repel the Song invaders and restore national honour. Will Your Majesty accept my offer?" Fang La was overjoyed and gave orders immediately for the palace guard to be put at the speaker's disposal to counter-attack and challenge Song Jiang, for whatever might result from it, this person was clearly someone outstanding. Now if Fang La had not given command of his army to this person, things would certainly have been different. For now there were to be heads rolling on the steps to the throne, hot blood gushing over palace walls. The viper's nest would be swept clean and Fang La taken, and Song Jiang would reach the pinnacle of his fame.

Monk Lu Zhishen Expires in Zhejiang by the riverside in a Trance; Song Jiang returns to his birthplace Home in his Official silk robe Finery

The official who offered to lead the expedition from the Cavern was none other than Ke Yin the Duke Consort. Fang La was overjoyed. "We are very fortunate," he said, "that the consort is willing to exercise his might in battle against the brigands. We gladly utilize his genius to regain our national glory."
Ke Yin immediately prepared to set forth with his troops. Yun Bi was his second in command. Fang La presented the consort with his personal golden armor and silken robe and a fine horse. Accompanied by Fang Jie the Royal Nephew and more than twenty generals, Ke Yin marched from Bangyuan Cavern with ten thousand of the Royal guards and spread out in battle position.
The news was reported to Song Jiang and Lu Junyi, who also deployed their forces. They saw Duke Consort Ke Yin riding forward. No one recognized him as Chai Jin. Song Jiang ordered Hua Rong to fight him. Lance at the ready, Hua Rong cantered to the front and shouted derisively at his challenger.
"Who are you, knave, that you dare help rebels against the Imperial Army? Just wait till I get my hands on you! I'll pound you to mincemeat! Dismount and surrender, and I'll spare your life!"
"I'm Ke Yin from Shandong. Everyone knows my fame. A bunch of scruffy robbers like you from Liangshan Marsh are really beneath my notice! We're more than a match for you! I'm determined to wipe you out and recapture our cities!"
Song and Lu, on their horses, listened and thought: "That's Chai Jin's voice. He never in the past said anything which indicated he might betray us. He's changed his name from Chai Jin to Ke Yin, but the names mean virtually the same thing."
"Before Lord Chai became an outlaw he often gave shelter to wanted men and disguised them as merchants," said Wu Yong. "Can he have forgotten his old loyalties?"
"Let's see what happens in his joust with Huan Rong," said Lu Junyi. Hua Rong kicked his steed faster. The horses met, the weapons clashed, and the warriors fought. Gradually they moved into a ravine, battling ever closer to one another.
"Pretend to be defeated, brother," Chai Jin said in a low voice. "I'll explain later."
Hua Rong heard. After three rounds, he turned his mount and withdrew.
"Beaten officer, I won't chase you," Ke Yin shouted. "Is there anyone else who thinks so well of himself? Let him come out and fight!"
Hua Rong galloped back to the position and told Song and Lu what had happened. "Let Guan Sheng do combat," Wu Yong suggested. Waving his halberd, with its blue dragon etched into the steel, Guan Sheng raced to the front.
"Petty officer from Shandong," he yelled, "I dare you to joust with me!"
Fearlessly, they battled less than five rounds when Guan Sheng feigned defeat and returned to the Song lines. Ke Yin did not pursue. Instead, he rode forward and shouted another challenge.
"Is there any strong general among you who dares to fight?"
On Song Jiang's orders, Zhu Tong was the next contender. Back and forth the two battled, deceiving both armies. After only six or seven rounds, Zhu Tong fled. Chai Jin gave chase and lunged in a false thrust with his lance. Zhu Tong leaped from his saddle and ran back to the Song position.
The southern soldiers captured the abandoned horse and the consort waved them forward in a wild charge. Song Jiang and his troops hastily retreated ten *//*before making camp. Ke Yin pursued them for a distance, then returned with his contingent to the cavern.
The news was reported to Fang La: "The heroic duke consort has defeated three enemy generals and driven the Song forces back ten //."
Fang La, delighted, ordered a royal banquet. After the consort had removed his armor he was invited into the rear palace and given a seat of honor at the festive board. The king raised his gold goblet and toasted him personally.
"I knew you were a scholar, but I never realized you had such military skill! Had I known earlier what a hero you are, we wouldn't have lost so many cities. Give full play to your brilliance, slaughter the bandits, and restore our sovereignty, and you shall share with us the glories of peace and enjoy together national restoration."
"Rest assured, Sire," said Ke Yin. "I will do my utmost. I pray Your Majesty will watch tomorrow from the top of the hill while I annihilate Song Jiang and the rest of his crew!"
Fang La consented. He was very pleased. That night they feasted until late, then each retired to his quarters in the palace.
The next morning Fang La held no royal court, but ordered the slaughter of steers and horses to feed his troops to the full. Then all donned armor and mounted. They rode cheering from the cavern, amid waving banners and pounding drums. Accompanied by his retinue and cabinet officials, the king climbed to the top of the hill above the cavern to watch the duke consort do battle.
Song Jiang transmitted this order to all his chieftains: "Today's engagement will be critical. Do your utmost to catch Fang La, but don't kill him. When your soldiers see Chai Jin in the southern position turn his horse, charge after him into the cavern and capture Fang La."
Rubbing their hands in anticipation, the northerners took up their weapons. Every man was eager to plunder the riches of the cavern, and win glory and rewards by seizing Fang La.
The Song forces deployed outside the cavern. On the southern side, Ke Yin sat his horse beneath an arch of pennants, about to ride forth into combat. But Fang Jie the Royal Nephew, his lance held athwart his saddle, intervened.

"Wait until I've killed one of their generals," he urged. "Then you can lead our men against the foe."
The Song units were pleased to see that Yan Qing was standing behind Chai Jin. "This scheme is sure to succeed," they said, and prepared for action.
Fang Jie rode forward and issued his challenge. From the Song position Guan Sheng cantered out, brandishing his halberd. The two warriors had fought only ten rounds or so when Hua Rong joined in the fray. Though assailed by two opponents, Fang Jie battled without fear. They could not subdue him, but gradually he was forced onto the defensive.
Then Li Ying and Zhu Tong rode forth and also attacked. Four against one were too much. Fang Jie turned his mount and started to leave. Ke Yin emerged from the arch of pennants and blocked his way. The consort waved his hand, and the four Song chieftains closed in, while Ke Yin himself charged with levelled lance. Fang Jie jumped from his steed and tried to flee, but Chai Jin pierced him with a single thrust. Yan Qing dashed up from behind and finished Fang Jie off with his sword.
The southern soldiers were stunned. Then they ran for their lives. The "duke consort" raised his voice in a shout.
"I am not Ke Yin but Chai Jin, a chieftain in the army of Song Jiang. The Royal Attendant, with me, is actually Yan Qing the Prodigy. We now know all about everything inside and outside the cavern. Whoever captures Fang La alive will be made a high official and ride a fine horse. Surrender and avoid bloodshed! Resist and be slaughtered with your entire family!"
Chai Jin, Yan Qing and the four chieftains, leading a large contingent, drove into the cavern. Fang La saw it all from the top of the hill. Angrily, he kicked over his golden throne and plunged deep into the hills. When five columns of Song Jiang's army rushed into the cavern, they discovered he was gone, and caught only some of his retinue.
Yan Qing and a few trusted confidants, after removing two loads of gold and jewels from the treasury, set fire to the inner palace. When Chai Jin entered his own consort's residency, he found that his wife the princess had hung herself. He burned the residency down, cremating her inside it. He allowed her attendants to run away.
In the main palace the Song chieftains slaughtered everyone—the king's concubines, his personal guards, his royal relations... and plundered his treasures. Song Jiang urged them to search the palace for Fang La.
Ruan the Seventh discovered in an inner room the trunk in which Fang La kept his crown, his royal robe, his green jade belt, his white jade scepter, his Care-Free boots. He couldn't resist the temptation to try the lavish finery on. In full regal attire, he mounted his steed and trotted to the front of the palace. The soldiers at first thought he was Fang La. But when they crowded around they saw it was Ruan the Seventh, and everyone laughed. Ruan thought it was all a great joke, and rode about the palace grounds watching the looting.
Wang Bing and Zhao Tan, the two generals who had come from the Eastern Capital with Minister Tong, had taken part in the assault on Bangyuan Cavern. They heard the tumult among Song Jiang's troops, and someone said that Fang La had been caught. They hurried to join in the seizure so that they could claim some of the credit. But they saw only Ruan the Seventh, all togged out the royal robe, the crown upon his head, laughing uproariously.
"You've got a nerve dressing up like Fang La and making a spectacle of yourself!" they fumed.
Ruan pointed his finger at them and raged. "Who do you pricks think you are! If it weren't for our brother Song Jiang your donkeys' heads would have been chopped off by Fang La long ago! All you can do is try to cut in on the glory my brother chieftains and I have earned! You'll go back and tell the emperor it couldn't have done without the help of you two big generals!"
Wang and Zhao, infuriated, were ready to fight. Ruan snatched a spear and raced towards them. Huyan Zhuo, who witnessed the quarrel, galloped up and separated the contestants. An officer had notified Song Jiang, and he too hurried to the scene. He and Wu Yong yelled at Ruan to dismount, remove the royal vestments and cast them aside. Song Jiang apologized to the two generals. Although Wang and Zhao had no choice but to accept the placatory words of Song and his chieftains, inwardly they would not forget their hatred.
That day corpses littered the ground in Bangyuan Cavern, and blood flowed in streams. According to Song Annals over twenty thousand of Fang La's soldiers were annihilated. On Song Jiang's orders, the palace buildings were put to the torch. The royal halls, the ornate towers, the inner chambers, the bejewelled alcoves—all were reduced to ashes. The Song army made camp at the entrance to Bangyuan Cavern and built a stockade, A check of the prisoners revealed that only Fang La had escaped. Song Jiang ordered a search of the mountains and had the local populace notified: Whoever captured Fang La would be recommended to the emperor for a high official post; whoever supplied information as to his whereabouts would be rewarded.
Meanwhile Fang La scurried through the mountains like a dog whose master just died, like a fish which evaded the net. Discarding his robe of imperial yellow, his golden-flowered hood, his royal court boots, he fled over the heights in grass and hempen sandles. In a single night he crossed five mountains.
He came at last to a hollow. There, nestled against a slope was a rude monastery. Fang La was hungry. He started towards it to ask for something to eat. From behind a pine tree a big fat monk suddenly emerged. He knocked Fang La down with his Buddhist staff and tied him up. The cleric was none other than Zhishen the Tattooed Monk. He took Fang La to the monastery, obtained some food, then started down with him. They met a party of soldiers who had been searching the mountains for the former king. Together, they escorted the captive under guard and brought him before Song Jiang.
When he saw who it was, Song Jiang was delighted. "Where did you find him, Reverend?" he asked Lu Zhishen.
"After the battle in the Grove of Ten Thousand Pines on Black Dragon Ridge, I chased Xiahou Cheng into the mountains and killed him. I pushed on in deeper, looking for more of the southern brigands. But I got lost and was wandering around when I met an old monk on a wild and verdant slope. He led me to his rustic monastery and said: 'We've plenty of fuel and grain and vegetables. Wait here. If you see a big fellow come out of the pine forest, grab him.' I saw fires burning at the foot of the mountains, and kept watch all night. I didn't know where the paths ran in those parts. But this morning I spotted this rogue climbing over the rise. So I knocked him down with my staff and tied him up. I had no idea it was Fang La."
"Where is the old monk now?"
"I don't know."
"He must be a saintly person to be so psychic. When I get back to the capital I'm going to report your great deed to the emperor. You'll be able to return to secular life and become an official. Your future wife and children will be honored, you'll be a credit to your ancestors, you'll recompense your parents for their kindness in raising you."
"I've lost interest in mundane affairs. I don't want to be an official. It will be enough if I can find a quiet place to live out the rest of my life in peace."
"We'll make you abbot of some big monastery. That also is very honorable. Your parents will be proud of you."
Lu Zhishen shook his head. "I don't want any part of it. Having a lot of things is no use. Just this flesh on my frame of bones—nothing could be better than that."
Song Jiang fell silent. Neither he nor Zhishen was happy. The troops were already mustered. Fang La was locked in a cage cart, to be delivered to the emperor in the Eastern Capital. Song Jiang issued the order and the army left Bangyuan Cavern in Clear Stream County and headed for Muzhou.
In Muzhou Governor Zhang, Deputy District Commander Liu, Chancellor Tong and staff officers Cong and Geng joined forces and made camp. They learned of Song Jiang's great victory, and that he had captured Fang La and brought him to Muzhou. All called to congratulate him. Song Jiang and his chieftains bowed respectfully.
"We've heard that it was an arduous campaign, General, and that brothers have been lost," said Zhang. "But you've been completely victorious. We're extremely happy."
Song Jiang again bowed. Weeping, he replied: "There were a hundred and eight of us when we went to break the Liao Tartars, and we returned to the capital intact. Gongsun Sheng left us, and several more remained in the capital. But since conquering Yangzhou and crossing the Yangzi, we've lost seven out of ten. Although I'm still alive, how can I go back to Shandong and face my old neighbors and relations!"
"Don't talk like that, General. You know the old saying: 'Poverty or wealth, high rank or low, short life or long—all are predestined.' Those fortunate enough to live must send off the unfortunates who have died. You have no reason to be ashamed of your losses. You're successful and famous. The emperor will surely reward you with high honors and rank. When you visit home in your official finery you'll be envy of all. Don't concern yourself with incidentals. Just concentrate Oil returning with your army and reporting to His Majesty."
Bowing his thanks, Song Jiang issued appropriate orders to his chieftains. Governor Zhang directed that, with the exception of Fang La who was to be delivered to the Eastern Capital, all captured southern officials were to be decapitated in Muzhou's public square.
Officials of counties not yet captured, on learning that Fang La had been taken, either fled or came to Muzhou to surrender and pay their respects to Governor Zhang, in about equal number. The capitulators were accepted and treated as good citizens. Notices, posted everywhere, reassured the populace.
As to the remaining adherents of the southern rebels, if they hadn't harmed anyone and were willing to surrender, they were allowed to return to the countryside and their land and property were restored. With all the counties and prefectures now under control, Song officials and garrisons were placed in charge to defend the territory and protect the people. Everyone resumed his original occupation.
Zhang gave a large banquet in Muzhou to celebrate peace, congratulate his officials and generals, and issue awards. He directed that Song Jiang and Lu Junyi return with their Vanguard Army to the capital. The various units assembled their equipment and got ready to march.
Tears fell from Song Jiang's eyes whenever he thought of the chieftains who had died. Then Zhu Fu and Mu Chun went to visit the six chieftains who were ill in Hangzhou, and they too were stricken. Only Yang Lin and Mu Chun survived and were able to join the march. Today, at last, there was peace, after the many hardships they had been through together, but six poor brothers had passed on.
In a quiet spot in a Muzhou temple Song Jiang had a long banner hung, three hundred and sixty scriptures read, and prayers offered so that the deceased might ascend from the Nine Depths into Heaven. The next day he had steers and horses sacrificed at the Black Dragon Temple in ceremonies which he attended with Wu Yong and the other chieftains. They burned paper replicas of gold and silver ingots as thanks to the Black Dragon Prince for his benevolent protection. Returning to camp. Song Jiang collected the bodies of all the chieftains who had died and gave them proper burial.
The expeditionary army prepared to follow Governor Zhang to Hangzhou, there to await the official imperial decree ordering their return. A list of chieftains who had distinguished themselves was sent to the sovereign with a report. Only thirty-six of the original one hundred and eight were left. They were as follows: Song Jiang the Defender of Chivalry; Lu Junyi the Jade Unicorn; Wu Yong the Wizard; Guan Sheng the Big Halberd; Lin Chong the Panther Head; Huyan Zhuo the Two Rods; Hua Rong the Lesser Li Guang; Chai Jin the Small Whirlwind; Li Ying the Heaven-Soaring Eagle; Zhu Tong the Beautiful Beard; Zhishen the Tattooed Monk; Wu Song the Pilgrim; Da Zong the Marvelous Traveler; Li Kui the Black Whirlwind; Yang Xiong the Pallid; Li Jun the Turbulent River Dragon; Ruan the Seventh the Devil Incarnate; Yan Qing the Prodigy; Zhu Wu the Miraculous Strategist; Huang Xin the Suppressor of Three Mountains; Sun Li the Sickly General; Fan Rui the Demon King Who Roils the World; Ling Zhen the Heaven-Shaking Thunder; Pei Xuan the Ironclad Virtue; Jiang Jing the Magic Calculator; Du Xing the Demon Face; Song Qing the Iron Fan; Zou Run the One-Horned Dragon; Cai Qing the Single Blossom; Yang Lin the Elegant Panther; Mu Chun the Slightly Restrained; Tong Wei the Dragon from the Cave; Tong Meng the River Churning Clam; Shi Qian the Flea on the Drum; Xun Xin the Junior General and Gu Dasao the Tigress.
The march to Hangzhou was uneventful. Because Governor Zhang's troops were in the city, Song Jiang camped at Six Harmonies Pagoda. He and his chieftains took quarters in the Six Harmonies Monastery. Song Jiang and Lu Junyi went frequently into Hangzhou while waiting for orders.

*

Lu Zhishen and Wu Song, quartered in the monastery, relished the beauty of the hills and streams in the outskirts of the city. That night the moon was bright and the breeze cool, the sky and waters an azure blue. The two were asleep in the monastery when, around midnight, they were awakened by the boom of the incoming river tide. Lu Zhishen was from west of the Pass and had never heard this sound before. He thought it was a battle drum, that brigands were again attacking. He leaped from his bed and grabbed his iron staff. With a yell he started to rush outside. The monks were astonished.
"What's wrong, Reverend?" they asked. "Where are you going?"
"I heard a battle drum. I'm going to fight!"
The monks laughed. "You're mistaken, Reverend. That's no battle drum. It's the Old Faithful Tide on our Qiantang River."
Lu was surprised. "Why do you call it that?"
Opening the window, the monks pointed at the great head of water rolling up the river. "The tide comes in once during the day and once at night, always on time. Today is the fifteenth of the eighth month, and it arrives at the third watch. We call it Old Faithful because it's never late."
Zhishen peered at the water, then suddenly he understood. He clapped his hands and laughed.
"The prophesy of my old abbot said: 'Take Xia when you encounter him,' and after the fight in the Forest of Ten Thousand Pines I captured Xiahou Cheng. 'Seize La when you meet,' said the abbot, and I've caught Fang La. Now I must fulfil the rest of the prophesy: 'When you hear the ride, round out the circle. When you see the tide, in silence rest.' Well, I've heard the tide and I've seen it, but how do I do the other part? Can you brothers tell me?"
"You've joined the Buddhist order, how is it you don't understand?" said the monks. "In our religious parlance 'to round out the circle and in silence rest' means to die."
Zhishen laughed. "So that's what it's called. In that case I'll have to round out my circle and rest in silence. Heat a few buckets of water. I must bathe first."
The monks thought he was joking. But they knew he had a violent temper, and dared not refuse. After Lu had cleansed himself and changed into the fresh monk's clothing presented to him by the emperor, he instructed one of his junior officers.
"Notify brother Song Jiang. Ask him to come here and see me."
He went into the interior of the temple and wrote an ode on a slip of paper. In the meditation hall, he pulled a hassock to the center, lit some fragrant incense in a burner, and placed the slip of paper on a meditation couch. Then he seated himself cross-legged on the hassock, with his left foot resting on his right and, quite naturally, transcended into space. By the time Song Jiang received the message and hurried with his chieftains to the temple, Lu Zhishen was already motionless. The ode read as follows:

Hark! The Old Faithful Tide comes on the Qiantang River, and today I know myself at last.

On reading the ode, Song Jiang and Lu Junyi sighed without cease. The chieftains burned incense to the departed Lu Zhishen and kowtowed. Governor Zhang and Chancellor Tong and the other officials hastened from the city and did the same.
Song Jiang distributed the deceased's Buddhist garments and the rewards given to him by the emperor among the monks, and asked them to conduct memorial services for three days and three nights. The body he had put in a cinnabar red casket and requested the abbot of Jiangshan Monastery to officiate at the cremation. Abbots came also from ten other monasteries to join in the prayers.
Lu Zhishen's remains were cremated behind the Six Harmonies Pagoda. The Jiangshan abbot approached the encoffined body, torch in hand, and pointed at it.
"Lu Zhishen, Lu Zhishen," he intoned, "you began your career in the greenwood. Arson burned in your eyes, murder festered in your heart. Now you have gone with tide to where none can find you. Amazing! Flying white jade flakes shall fill the sky, the earth shall be covered with yellow gold!"
The abbot lit the pyre, the monks prayed, and flames consumed the casket. Then the bones were collected and interred in the pagoda courtyard. All of Lu Zhishen's extra clothing, money and the contributions he had received from various officials were donated to the Six Harmonies Monastery for the common use of whoever resided there.
Wu Song, though he was still alive, now had only one arm.
"I'm a cripple," he said to Song Jiang, "and I don't want to go to the capital to be presented to the emperor. I'm giving all my money and awards to Six Harmonies Monastery so that I'll be clean and unencumbered. When you send in the list of those going to the capital, brother, leave my name off."
"As you wish," said Song Jiang.
Wu Song became a monk in the Six Harmonies Monastery. He lived to the ripe old age of eighty, but that was later.
Song Jiang went daily into Hangzhou to inquire for news. Governor Zhang and his forces departed first, and Song Jiang moved his troops into the city. Half a month went by and an imperial emissary arrived with an order directing Vanguard General Song to return to the capital with his army. By then Governor Zhang, Chancellor Tong, Deputy District Commander Liu, staff officers Cong and Geng, Generals Wang and Zhao, and the central forces had all departed for the capital.
When Song Jiang and his army were about to set forth, Lin Chong was unexpectedly stricken by paralysis, Yang Xiong developed a growth on his spine and died, and Shi Qian expired from appendicitis. Song Jiang felt very badly. Then a dispatch arrived from Dantu County saying that Yang Zhi had died and had been buried there. Since Lin Chong's paralysis could not be cured, they left him in Six Harmonies Monastery under Wu Song's care. He passed away half a year later.
Yan Qing the Prodigy approached his former patron Lu Junyi privately after they left Hangzhou.
"I have been with you since childhood," he said, "and you have been kinder than words can say. Now that we have accomplished our mission, why shouldn't we two give up our official ranks and live out our lives in some secluded place where our fame is unknown?"
"Ever since Liangshan Marsh returned to the fold of the Song Dynasty, we've been going north to subdue the Liao Tartars and south to capture Fang La. They've been bitter costly campaigns in which many of our brothers have been lost. Of my own family, only you and I are left. Now that we shall soon be able to return home in official finery and have honors bestowed on our future wives and children, why should you choose so pointless a course?"
The Prodigy smiled. "You're making a mistake, patron. There is a point to my course. It's your course which probably will turn out badly."
Yan Qing was a very far-sighted young man.
"I haven't the slightest personal ambition," Lu protested. "Are you suggesting the imperial court will consider me dangerous?"
"Many famous and loyal heroes of ancient times who contributed much to the founding of new dynasties were executed by their sovereigns."
"They all committed offenses of one sort or another. I've done nothing wrong. What cause have I for concern?"
"You'll be sorry that you haven't listened to me, but then it will be too late. I was going to bid farewell to General Song Jiang, but he's very strong on fraternity. I'm afraid he wouldn't let me go. So I'll take my leave only of you, patron."
"Where will you go?"
"Either ahead of or behind you!"
Lu Junyi laughed. "All right, have it your way. Let's see where you end up."
Yan Qing kowtowed eight times. That night he gathered some money and valuables and departed for a destination unknown. The next morning a note was delivered to Song Jiang. It read:

I, Yan Qing, greet the Vanguard General with the deepest respect. I am extremely grateful for your benevolent teachings. Even my utmost efforts could never repay you. Because of my feeble destiny and weak talents I am not worthy of official honors. I intend to retire to rustic life. I wanted to bid you farewell, but knowing your strong fraternal sentiments I feared you would not let me go, and slipped away in the night Please forgive me. I would like to leave these four lines by way of respectful farewell:

I gladly relinquish official rank,
For wealth and honors I have no need.
Only the amnesty I retain,
With simple fare my life sustain.

The verse struck a chord of melancholy in Song Jiang's heart. He collected the tablets of office of the chieftains who had died and sent them on to the capital, so that the appointments might be cancelled. Travelling along a winding road, the troops reached the outskirts of Suzhou. Li Jun the Turbulent River Dragon pretended to be stricken with an ailment and took to his bed. The news was reported to Song Jiang, who came personally with a doctor to see him.
"Don't delay the march on my account, brother," Li Jun pleaded. "The emperor will reproach you. Governor Zhang probably has already been back for some time. Have pity, brother, and leave Tong Wei and Tong Meng to look after me. We'll catch up and attend the imperial court as soon as I am well again. You hurry on to the capital with the army."
Though reluctant, Song Jiang could not procrastinate. Zhang was sending dispatches urging speed. Li Jun and the two Tong brothers were left behind, and Song Jiang and his chieftains rode on.
Li Jun and the Tong brothers then sought out Fei Bao and the three other rustic friends, and the seven conferred in Willow Hamlet. They disposed of their family possessions, built a ship and set sail from the port of Taicang for foreign parts. Li Jun eventually became king of Siam. Tong Wei and Fei Bao also became officials in a foreign land, each occupying coastal territory and doing as he pleased. But that was all in Li Jun's later history.
The march of the Song troops was uneventful. Song Jiang's heart was heavy when they traversed Changzhou and Runzhou, where the had fought costly battles. Only two or three out of ten of his chieftains remained since crossing the Yangzi. The army passed Yangzhou and entered Huai'an. The capital wasn't far away. Song Jiang ordered the chieftains to get ready to be received by the emperor.
They reached the Eastern Capital on the twentieth day of the ninth month. Governor Zhang and his forces entered the city first. Song Jiang's men camped at their old site in the outskirts, Chen Bridge Station, and waited for orders.
A count of the chieftains showed a total of twenty-seven, including Song Jiang. Of these, only twelve were senior officers. He wrote out a list of those who had died for their country to present to the emperor, and instructed his remaining chieftains to prepare suitable attire for attending the imperial court. Three days later, they received the emperor's summons.
That morning at daybreak the twenty-seven rode into the city. This was the third time the capital's populace had seen the chieftains arrive for a reception by the Taoist Sovereign. The first was when they were granted the imperial amnesty. They were garbed in the silks of red and green given to them by the emperor then, and wore tablets of silver and gold. The second time, on their return to the capital after defeating the Liao Tartars, they were dressed in armor. Today, on His Majesty's orders, they wore civilian robes and headgear. The watching crowds sighed in admiration.
At the palace gate, the twenty-seven dismounted and entered. They kowtowed eight times at the foot of the vermilion jade stairs, then retreated and kowtowed another eight times, then advanced to midway between the two positions and kowtowed eight times more. Their twenty-four obeisances raised a cloud of dust, and their cries of "Long live!" shook the air.
Emperor Hui Zong saw how drastically their numbers had been depleted, and his heart was moved. He summoned them into the hall. With Song Jiang and Lu Junyi in the lead they mounted the golden stairs and knelt before the jewel-encrusted curtain. The sovereign instructed them to rise. By then his ministers had rolled up the curtain.
"We have heard of your hardships in the punitive expedition across the Yangzi, and that you have lost more than half your brothers," said the emperor. "We feel very badly about that."
Song Jiang, weeping, remained on his knees. "Because I am only a crude talentless rustic, I can never repay Your Majesty's kindness, though I spill my liver and brains on the battlefield! There were a hundred and eight of us when we pledged brotherhood in the Wutai Mountains. Who would have thought we'd lose eight out of ten! I have a list here, Your Majesty, which I hesitate to present. I pray that in your benevolence, Sire, you will make a suitable disposition."
"We shall honor the graves of those who died for the throne. Their contribution shall not be forgotten."
Song Jiang again bowed and submitted his petition. It read:

Vanguard General and Commander-in-Chief of the Pacification of the South Song Jiang and others respectfully report: Though ignorant and crude and having committed heinous crimes, we have been the recipients of Your Majesty's kindness, for which we can never repay though our bones be ground to powder and our bodies pulverized. We and our brothers, on leaving the Marsh, have done our utmost to eradicate evil. Of one mind, we vowed fraternity on Mount Wutai, and have been defending our country and protecting the people with full loyalty ever since. In Youzhou we defeated the Liao Tartars, near the cavern in Clear Stream we captured Fang La.
In making these modest contributions, we have lost many excellent commanders. For this we grieve night and day. We pray Your Majesty will consider the matter and bestow your benevolence on those who have died and your protection on those who still live.
Our only wish is to return to the countryside and till the land. We beseech you, Sire, to allow us to retire. Earnest and trembling, we await Your Majesty's decision with bowed heads. The following is a list of our commanders …

The itemization showed that fifty-nine had been killed in battle, ten died of illness, one expired in a religious trance, one was crippled and became a monk at Six Harmonies Monastery, another was a Taoist who returned to Qizhou, four had gone off on their own, five had remained in or returned to the capital, and twenty-seven now presented themselves before the throne. The petition was signed by Vanguard General Song Jiang and Vice-Vanguard General Lu Junyi.
"One hundred and eight of you, all stars in the firmament," the emperor sighed, "and only twenty-seven left after another four departed! You literally have lost eight out of ten!"
He bestowed posthumous titles on those who had died. If they had surviving sons, he called them to the capital and gave them official posts. If they had none, he had temples built where sacrifices might be dedicated to their memories. Because Zhang Shun's spirit had performed deeds of conspicuous value, it was named a Golden Glory General. Lu Zhishen, for having captured Fang La and transcending from life in a trance, was named the Chivalrous Illustrious Reverend. Wu Song was made abbot of the Six Harmonies Monastery, where he lived out his days. Ten Feet of Steel and Mother Sun, who had died in battle, were also given honorific posthumous tides.
The ten senior chieftains present at the imperial ceremony were made prefects or prefectural or district military commanders. The fifteen lieutenant chieftains were given command of various army units. All were to await formal certification by the appropriate departments. Gu Dasao was appointed magistrate of Dongyuan County.
Song Jiang was entitled Marshal of Military Virtue and made governor of Chuzhou Prefecture and commander of its armed forces.
Lu Junyi was entitled Marshal of Military Contribution and made governor of Luzhou Prefecture and deputy commander of its armed forces.
His Majesty also presented the fifteen lieutenant chieftains with three hundred ounces of gold and silver and five sets of silken clothing each. For each of the ten senior chieftains the gift was five hundred ounces of gold and silver and eight sets of the silken clothing. Song Jiang and Lu Junyi were each awarded one thousand ounces of gold and silver, ten sets of silken clothing, an imperial court robe, and a fine horse.
All thanked the sovereign.
The spirit of the Black Dragon Prince had twice manifested itself in Muzhou, defended the country and the people, and enabled the army to win complete victory. The emperor bestowed on the Black Prince a long and magniloquent title. He also changed the names of Muzhou to Yanzhou, and Shezhou to Huizhou, because these had been seats of Fang La's rebellion.
Clear Stream County became, for the same reason, Chunan County, and Bangyuan Cavern was split away from the rest of the peninsula to form an island in the river. The prefect of Muzhou was directed to use money from his treasury to erect a temple for the Black Dragon Prince, and the emperor personally sent a name plaque. The building still stands to this day.
South of the Yangzi Fang La's depredations had been severe. His Majesty exempted the people there from all taxes and labor levies for the next three years.
Each of the chieftains thanked the monarch. He invited them to an imperial feast to celebrate the peace and to congratulate them on their achievements. Civil and military officials of the highest rank entered the banquet hall. When it was over, Song Jiang addressed the sovereign.
"Since receiving the amnesty in Liangshan Marsh, we've lost more than half our troops. Some wish to return home. We pray, Sire, that you exercise your benevolence."
The emperor decreed as follows: Those who wished to remain in the army would be given a hundred strings of cash, ten bolts of silk and be assigned to either the Fierce Dragon or the Imposing Tiger Camp, where they would receive monthly stipends of money and grain. Those who wished to leave would be given two hundred strings of cash, ten bolts of silk, and be permitted to return home and be civilians again.
"I was born in Yuncheng County," said Song Jiang, "but since committing my crimes I have not dared to go back. Pray grant me permission, Sire, to sweep my family graves and visit my relatives and neighbors. I will then go to Chuzhou and assume office."
Very pleased, the monarch presented him with ten thousand strings of cash for maintaining his ancestral manor. Song Jiang and the chieftains, again expressing their gratitude, took leave of the sovereign and withdrew.
The next day the Council of Administration gave a banquet to celebrate peace, to which all the chieftains were invited. The day after, the Council of Military Affairs did the same. Governor Zhang, Deputy District Commander Liu, Chancellor Tong, staff officers Cong and Geng, and Generals Wang and Zhao were all raised in rank. But that is not part of our story.
On the recommendation of the Military Procurate, and in accordance with an imperial decree, Fang La was sliced to bits and beheaded in a public square of the Eastern Capital, and the remains placed on display for three days.

Song Jiang and his brother Song Qing left the capital with a company of one or two hundred soldiers who carried their chieftains' luggage and awards. The return to Shandong Province was without incident.
On reaching their native village in Yuncheng County, they were welcomed by neighbors and relations, but when they arrived at the manor they found that their lather, the old squire, had died, and that he was still lying in his coffin. The two brothers wept heartbrokenly. They were deeply grieved. Family and vassals offered condolences.
The old squire had kept the manor's farm and property in excellent condition. Song Jiang was able to concentrate on making funeral arrangements. He hired monks and priests to offer prayers for his departed parents and ancestors. Officials from county and prefecture called without cease.
A propitious day was chosen and, with the brothers serving as pallbearers, the squire's body was carried to a high plateau and laid to rest. Prefectural officials, neighbors and elders, friends and family, all attended. Of that we'll say no more.
Song Jiang thought of the Mystic Queen of Ninth Heaven, and recalled that he had not yet shown his gratitude. He paid artisans fifty thousand strings of cash to build her a temple. Soon it was completed—with two covered walks, a mountain gate, a statue of the Mystic Queen, and painted decorations.
Afraid that if he stayed too long in the countryside the emperor would reproach him, Song Jiang selected a date for the removal of his mourning vestments and again had several days of prayer services conducted. Then he gave a farewell feast for neighbors and village elders. The following day his relations gave him a banquet to congratulate him and demonstrate their affection. Of that, we'll say no more.
Song Jiang entrusted the affairs of the manor to his brother. Although Song Qing had also been made an official, Song Jiang instructed him to remain at home, attend to the farm, and maintain the family shrine. What money he still had with him he distributed among the people. But to put idle chatter aside, after several months at home Song Jiang left his native village and returned to the Eastern Capital. Many of his brother chieftains had fetched their families and settled down. Some had already assumed office. Families of those who had died for the throne went back to their villages with the bonuses the emperor had bestowed upon them. Song Jiang gradually dispersed his army. Soon the families of the slain had all departed. Those appointed to office bid farewell to the various ministers and left to take up their duties. Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller came to see Song Jiang. As they sat and chatted, Dai told him something. And as a result, Song Jiang the hero of Yuncheng County became the ghost of Liao Er Flats. His name was recorded in history for thousands of years; his deeds were inscribed for centuries. Truly, his splendid spirit pervaded his temple, and his picture was hung in the Imperial Hall of Fame.

Now the gentleman who had appeared on the steps to the throne and offered to lead Fang La's army out to fight was in fact the royal son-in-law and Master of the Rolls, Prince Ke Yin. After hearing what he had to say, Fang La could scarcely contain his joy. Prince Ke Yin was to be joint commander of the southern forces and with Yun Bi, known as the Master's Man, he put on his armour and rode out to take up his command. Fang La, after giving him his own gilt armour and royal robe and finding him a good mount, sent him forth. Together with Fang Jie, the royal nephew, Prince Ke Yin commanded ten thousand palace guards, with more than twenty subordinate officers. They rode out of the citadel and deployed in battle formation.
Song Jiang's army besieging the citadel had already allotted different sectors to the various commanders. Song Jiang was in the centre, and because he was troubled by the thought that two thirds of his comrades had been lost and they still had not captured Fang La and that the southerners would not come out to fight, his brows were knitted in a frown and his countenance expressed deep gloom, until, that is, a soldier came in and reported: "They are coming out of the citadel to fight!"
Song Jiang and the Unicorn immediately ordered everyone to mount and ride forward. As the armies took up their positions, Prince Ke Yin was the first to be seen riding out in front of the southern ranks to do battle. Was there anyone in Song Jiang's army who did not recognize him? For who else was it but Mr. Chai!
Song Jiang ordered Colonel Hua out to take on the challenger. Colonel Hua galloped forward, his lance in the rest. He stopped in front of the enemy and shouted: "What kind of villain are you, you traitor, daring to oppose our might? If I capture you, you will be hacked to pieces, your flesh and bones made into mincemeat! Your only chance is to dismount now and give yourself up."
Prince Ke Yin, Mr. Chai that is, replied very clearly: "I am Ke Yin of Shandong. Who does not know my name? You scum, you're just a bunch of outlaws from the Marshes of Mount Liang. Do you think I'm not a match for your tricks? I am resolved to exterminate you and deliver the city."
Song Jiang and the Unicorn had been listening to this. They thought carefully about Mr. Chai's words. There must be a hidden meaning. His name was Chai, and he had changed it to Ke. Well, chai, "firewood", and ke, "a wooden handle", were pretty similar. And his given name jin, "enter", had been changed to yin, "lead in", that was the same too. The Professor said: "Let's watch and see what happens when Colonel Hua fights him."
Colonel Hua, levelled his spear, made his horse prance and charged into battle. Two horses met, two kinds of weapons were raised and the two leaders became so closely embroiled that they blended into a single mass. Then Mr. Chai murmured to Colonel Hua: "Now please pretend to be defeated, brother." Colonel Hua heard. He went on fighting for another three bouts, then turned his horse and galloped off: "I disdain to chase you, you coward," Mr. Chai shouted. "If there's anyone else who thinks himself a fighter, let him come out and face me!'
Colonel Hua galloped back to his side and told Song Jiang and the Unicorn what had happened. The Professor said: "Send Scimitar out to fight him."
Scimitar raced out to fight, flourishing his bright crescent blade: "Do you dare take me on, you petty Shandong chieftain?" he shouted.
Mr. Chai levelled his spear and charged. Two weapons clashed and both men fought fearlessly. Before they completed five bouts, Scimitar also feigned defeat and galloped back to his ranks. Ke Yin did not pursue him, but shouted: "Is there anyone else among you who dares to face me?"
Song Jiang ordered Whiskers out. Whiskers charged, but he too was only pretending to fight and after five or six bouts he fled. When Mr. Chai pursued and threatened him with his spear, he abandoned his horse and scurried away on foot, while the southerners rushed out and seized his horse. Mr. Chai encouraged the southern troops to charge and Song Jiang ordered his troops to fall back about three miles and take up a position there. After pursuing them for a while, Mr. Chai withdrew to the citadel. Someone had already told Fang La: "Ke Yin is incredibly valiant! He's routed the Song army and beaten three of their commanders! Song Jiang has lost the battle and has retreated three miles."
Fang La was delighted and ordered a royal banquet. As soon as Mr. Chai had taken off his armour and changed his uniform, he was invited to sit in the inner palace. The King himself toasted him and praised him, saying: "I had no idea your fighting skills were so great! I only knew you, dear son-in-law, as a scholar. Had I known before you had such military prowess, we need never have lost so many cities. I hope you will use your talents to the full and teach these adventurers a lesson, restore our territory and allow us to enjoy peace and boundless prosperity."
"Have no fear, Your Majesty! You can rely on me to strive heart and soul for the nation's glory. I would suggest that tomorrow you go up onto the hill to see me do execution on Song Jiang and his ilk."
Fang La gave proof of his satisfaction by holding a banquet that went on long into the night before they all retired. In the morning he had oxen and horses slaughtered so the whole army could eat their fill, after which everyone armed and rode to the mouth of Bangyuan Gap to challenge the enemy, with banners waving, much cheering and a thunderous tattoo of drums. Fang La with his entourage went up onto the heights above the citadel to watch Ke Yin fight.
Song Jiang had given his men these orders: "Today's battle is not like before. It is needful for you to do your utmost. You leaders must make every effort to capture their chief, Fang La. But do not kill him. Every officer must observe them carefully and watch when Mr. Chai turns his horse and retreats. That is the moment to rush forward and capture Fang La. There must be no mistake!"
Everyone was gleefully preparing, unsheathing their weapons. All were eagerly anticipating the sacking of the citadel, all were ambitious to capture Fang La and achieve glory and rich rewards. Song Jiang now ordered his leaders to deploy their troops and take up their positions in front of Bangyuan Gap.
Just as Ke Yin was about to ride out from the ranks of the southerners, Fang La's nephew Fang Jie, mounted and carrying his halberd at the ready, said: "Stay your hand, Commander, and hold in your horse, until I have had a go at them. You can bring your troops in afterwards to mop up!"
Everyone on the Song side could see the Prodigy behind Mr. Chai, and they said excitedly: "Today all our planning is bound to pay off!" They were raring to go.
Now Fang Jie urged his horse on. From the opposing ranks Scimitar rode out to meet him, brandishing his famous blade. The horses clashed, and this way, that way, thrust and counter-thrust, they fought ten bouts. Then Song Jiang ordered Colonel Hua into the arena. Undismayed, Fang Jie fought bravely against two for a few more bouts. Though he could not win outright, he skilfully parried and dodged their blows. Song Jiang now sent out Skyhawk and Whiskers, who galloped into the attack. Pressed hard by four opponents, Fang Jie turned his horse and galloped back towards his own side. Mr. Chai, who was waiting for him in front of the southerners' position, waved his hand and the four Song leaders gave chase. Mr. Chai levelled his spear and charged Fang Jie. Taken aback by this turn of events, Fang Jie leapt from his horse and tried to flee. But before he could get anywhere Mr. Chai's spear had knocked him down. Following up behind, the Prodigy dispatched him with his sword.
The southern troops were totally bewildered. They ran for their lives. Mr. Chai shouted out: "I am not Ke Yin. I am Chai Jin, the Little Whirlwind, in the service of Song Jiang! And my follower here is Yan Qing, the Prodigy! We know all the secrets of the citadel! Anyone who captures Fang La will be rewarded with high office and fine horses. Troops who surrender will be spared, those who resist will be executed." Signalling to the four leaders and the rest of the Song army to follow, he turned and charged into the citadel. Fang La, who had been watching on the heights with his entourage and had seen Fang Jie killed and the army routed, realized the situation was desperate. Kicking over his gilt throne, he fled and headed into the mountains.
Song Jiang, with his army in five divisions, charged into the citadel, hoping to take Fang La alive. But Fang La was gone and they only got his followers. The Prodigy called to some trusted companions and burst into the treasury. They grabbed two loads of gold and valuables and then started a fire in the inner court of the main building. When Mr. Chai broke into the eastern palace, Princess Golden Iris had already hanged herself. He set fire to every building. The servant girls he spared, allowing them to run off. But when the army invaded the main palace, they slaughtered all the concubines, royal guards and members of the royal family, and plundered all the valuables. Song Jiang and the rest continued to search the palace for Fang La.
Ruan the Seventh penetrated into the innermost regions of the palace and came across a trunk containing the usurper's regalia: the royal cap, the dragon robes, the jade belt, the white jade tablet and the shoes. Seeing all this finery, he thought to himself: "These are Fang La's clothes. Why shouldn't I try them on, just for a laugh?" He put on the dragon robe, fastened the jade belt, slipped into the shoes and set the cap on his head and stuck the white jade tablet in his belt. He leapt onto his horse and whip in hand galloped out of the palace. It caused a tremendous com-motion, as the soldiers thought it was Fang La. But when they rushed forward for a closer look they saw it was only Ruan the Seventh and everyone burst out laughing. To prolong the joke he rode up and down watching the looting that was under way.
In the midst of these goings-on, Generals Wang Bing and Zhao Tan, the two who had come from the court with Marshal Tong, arrived on the scene. They had heard the noise and heard rumours that Fang La had been taken and they were hoping to share in the glory. When they saw it was only Ruan the Seventh fooling around, dressed in the royal regalia, complete with royal cap, the generals berated him: "What, are you planning to follow in Fang La's footsteps, dressed up like that?"
Ruan the Seventh took it badly. Pointing at the generals he said: "Who the fuck are you? If it wasn't for our leader, Song Jiang, you two asses would have got your heads cut off by Fang La. Now that we've done all the hard work, you two think you'll come along and pretend to the Emperor, who doesn't know any better, that you had a hand in the victory."
The two generals were outraged by this and would have assaulted Ruan the Seventh. But Ruan grabbed a soldier's short spear and charged Wang Bing first. Twin Rods hurriedly rode between them. By now Song Jiang had been informed and he came racing up. When they saw Ruan dressed in the royal regalia, he and the Professor ordered him to dismount at once. The clothes were torn off him and thrown aside, while Song Jiang tried to make peace with the generals using conciliatory language. But although Song Jiang and the others did their best to calm them down, the two continued to harbour a grudge.

The ground was littered with corpses and the gutters ran with blood in the citadel that day. According to Song dynasty records, more than twenty thousand of Fang La's troops were killed. Song Jiang gave orders for fires to be started everywhere to make sure all the buildings were burnt to the ground. All the royal towers and terraces, palaces and courtyards, the delicate pavilions and gorgeous dwellings were consumed by the flames.

When Song Jiang and his companions were satisfied that the burning was complete, the troops were quartered at the entrance to Bangyuan Gap and a palisade was erected. The prisoners were listed and only the chief, Fang La, was missing. A thorough search of the mountainside was ordered and it was announced that anyone bringing Fang La in would be recommended to the Emperor for promotion; anyone providing information leading to his capture would be duly rewarded.

Now Fang La had in fact escaped from the heights above the citadel by means of hidden paths and headed for the wild country deep inside the mountains, traversing high ridges and impenetrable forests. Having shed his imperial robes, cast off his golden crown and exchanged his court boots for hemp sandals, he fled for his life, scrambling over the mountainsides. All night he was on the run. After crossing five peaks he came to a hollow in the hill where there was a thatched hut built in the lee of the slope. He was starving and he was just about to enter the hut to look for something to eat when from behind a group of pines a great fat monk sprang out, knocked him down with his staff and tied him up with a length of rope. This was none other than Lu Zhishen, the Flowery Monk. He took Fang La into the hut and gave him some food, then dragged him down the mountain till they met up with one of the army's search parties. Together they took the prisoner to Song Jiang.

Song Jiang was delighted to learn that they had captured Fang La. "How did you happen to be waiting there for him, Father?" he asked.

"After the battle at Thousand Pines on Black Dragon Ridge," Monk replied, "I chased Colonel Xia deep into the mountains, killing any enemy troops who put up a fight. I went so far that I lost my way. As I was trying to find the way back I came to a very wild patch of forest, where I met this old monk, who guided me to a little thatched hut and said: 'There's plenty of firewood and food. Just stay here and wait. When you see a big chap coming out of the forest, grab him.' That night I saw fires down the mountain. I watched them all night, but I didn't know where the paths were to get down. This morning I saw this bugger scrambling across the mountain so I knocked him down with my staff and tied him up. I had no idea it was Fang La!"

Song Jiang again asked: "Where is the old monk now?"

"I haven't the faintest idea. He disappeared after taking me to the hut and telling me about the firewood and food.

"That monk was obviously a luohan or bodhisattva," Song Jiang said. "This apparition led you to accomplish a famous deed. The Emperor must be told of it when we return to the capital. You can leave the monkhood and become a great official with a comfortable position in the capital and marry someone from a good family, conferring honour on your descendants and repaying your parents for all they have done."

Monk said: "My heart is ashes, I have no ambition for high office. My only desire is to find a quiet, pure place to go where I may rest my body and prepare my soul."

Song Jiang said: "If you really do not want to leave the monkhood, why not go to the capital and become abbot of some famous monastery? That too would be a way to pass on glory to your posterity and to honour your parents."

Monk shook his head and cried out: "I want none of that! To desire much is no use. If one can die with a complete body, that is more than enough."

Song Jiang was filled with sadness by what he heard, as were the others.

As soon as a role had been called of their commanders, Fang La was placed in a prison cart and sent to the capital to be shown to the Emperor. Song Jiang now ordered the army and all the leaders to depart from Bangyuan Gap and Clearwater and return to Muzhou.

Marshal Zhang now met with General Liu, Marshal Tong and two other members of the Military Council in Muzhou where all the armies were united in one camp. When they heard that Song Jiang had succeeded in capturing Fang La and was bringing him to Muzhou, they all joined in congratulations. When Song Jiang and his companions finished paying their respects, the Commissioner said: "I already know how hard you have striven on the frontier and how many of your comrades you have lost. Now your efforts have been crowned with success. Allow me to congratulate you!"

Song Jiang again prostrated himself and, weeping, said: "At the start we were one hundred and eight. When we dealt with the Tartars we had absolutely no losses. Then we unexpectedly lost the services of Taoist Gongsun, and later the Grand Preceptor retained some of our company. Since we put down the insurrection in Yangzhou and crossed the river, I regret to say we have lost seven out of ten. Although I myself have come out of it alive, what of my honour? What can I say when I return to family and home in Shandong?"

The Marshal said: "Don't speak like that. Remember the old saying: 'Rich or poor, noble or base, our lot is given us; a short life or a long one, it's fixed by fate.' What does the proverb say? 'It's an ill wind that blows nobody any good.' What's the point in grieving over the leaders you have lost? You have distinguished yourself and achieved much and when the court hears of it you will be rewarded with high office. You will have position and honour and a fine house. You will return to your birthplace in sumptuous robes. Who can quarrel with that? Don't waste your time on other things. Just get on with organizing the army for the return."

Song Jiang prostrated himself in thanks and then went to summon his commanders. The Marshal had already given orders for all the captured insurgents and usurping officials, with the exception of Fang La, who was to be sent under guard to the capital, to be executed in the market place. In a few villages that had not yet been recaptured the rebels and corrupt officials, on learning of Fang La's capture, had either fled or given themselves up. They were spared and returned to being loyal citizens. A notice was circulated to calm fears and reassure the people. The rest, who had followed the insurrection but not done anyone any harm, were allowed to surrender and go back to their villages and were directed to return to their normal trades or plots of land. Once order had been restored to the whole district, guards were appointed to defend the borders and make the people secure. Of this no more.

The Marshal's officials now organized a banquet to celebrate the peace, honour the generals and officials and reward the army for its efforts. All commanders were told to conclude any unfinished business. Orders came from the court that they were all to pack up and set out in due course.

But Song Jiang continued to weep copiously whenever he thought of his dead comrades. The Pilot and five more of those who had suddenly fallen ill in Hangzhou together with Smiler and the Irrepressible, who had stayed to look after them, had died from the disease. Only Panther and the Irrepressible had returned to join the army attack. Remembering the hardships they had all undergone, he felt it only right and proper now peace had returned to organize prayers for the release of their souls. A tall banner was raised in Muzhou and a service for the release of souls, their deliverance from the nine infernal regions, and the remission of their sins was organized in one of the temples. Libations were made to the three hundred and sixty points of the compass.

Next day oxen and horses were slaughtered for the sacrifice and they all gathered in the Temple of the Black Dragon Lord to make the offering in thanksgiving for his protection. On their return to the camp, the bodies of all who had died in action were collected and prepared for burial. After the interment, Song Jiang and the Unicorn ordered their armies to rejoin Commissioner Zhang in Hangzhou, until the Emperor authorized their withdrawal to the capital. First everyone's achievements were recorded in a report which was forwarded to the Emperor.

There were now only thirty-six of the original company surviving, to wit: Song Jiang, the Unicorn, the Professor, Scimitar, Leopard's Head, Twin Rods, Colonel Hua, Mr. Chai, Skyhawk, Whiskers, Monk, Pilgrim, Magic Messenger, Iron Ox, Morbid, White-Water Dragon, Ruan the Seventh, the Prodigy, the Strategist, Tamer, Colonel Sun, Demon King, Thunderer, Sterling, Calculator, Uglymug, Iron Fan, Rhinoceros, Blossom, Panther, Irrepressible, Cave Dragon, River Rider, the Flea, Blackface and Auntie Gu.

So Song Jiang and his leaders and troops left Muzhou and set off for Hangzhou. Then indeed the mountains resounded with the sound of gongs summoning the troops, the countryside was filled with a red tide of victory banners!

The journey was uneventful. Marshal Zhang's troops were in the city, so Song Jiang was quartered outside at the Pagoda of the Six Harmonies, where they all rested for a while until Song Jiang and the Unicorn went into the city to receive their orders.

Meanwhile Monk and Pilgrim, who were also quartered at the temple, had been admiring the scenery around the city, which was quite beautiful, with magnificent views. One night when the moon was bright and a soft breeze blowing, water and sky uniformly translucent, the two went to sleep in the monastery. Around midnight the roar of the tide on the river was suddenly heard. Monk was from Guanxi, west of the mountains, and had never encountered something like the Zhejiang tide, known as "Old Faithful". He thought it was war drums beating and imagined bandits were attacking. He leapt out of bed, groped around for his staff and with a loud shout rushed outside. The monks were amazed and came to ask: "What's come over you? Where are you off to?"

Monk replied: "I thought I heard war drums. I was going out to fight."

They all roared with laughter. "You're mistaken," they said. "That's not war drums. That's just Old Faithful on the river Qiantang."

It was Monk's turn to be shocked. "Why is it called Old Faith-ful?" he asked.

The monks flung open the windows and pointed out the tide to him. "It comes twice a day, regular as clockwork. Today is the fifteenth of the eighth month, the tide is due precisely at midnight. Because it never fails it's known as Old Faithful."

When Monk looked at that tide, it was as if his eyes were opened. He clapped his hands and laughed. "My teacher, Abbot True Knowledge, presented me with a mantra which says 'Meet Xia and take a prisoner' and during the battle in Thousand Pine Woods I did indeed encounter one Colonel Xiahou; then it's 'Find La and make an arrest', and in fact I captured Fang La also. Now it must be 'Hear the tide and awake from darkness, recognize Old Faithful and learn stillness.' Well, I've just encountered Old Faithful, so what comes next ought to be 'learning stillness'. The question is, can any of you lot tell me what 'learning stillness' might mean?"

"You a monk," they chorused, "and you haven't yet learnt that in Buddhism learning stillness means death?"

Monk grinned and said: "If that's what they call learning stillness, it's going to happen to me today. Would you please warm some water for me, I'm going to take a bath."

They all thought he was joking, but they knew what he was like and dared not disobey. An acolyte was ordered to prepare hot water for him to bathe himself. When he had changed into new monk's clothing, from the imperial gift, he told the soldiers under his command to fetch Song Jiang and asked the monks to bring him paper and brush. With these he wrote out an elegy and then went to the meditation hall, where he appropriated a meditation couch and sat down in the middle. He lit some fine incense and placed the paper beside him. He sat cross-legged, left leg resting on right, and his soul flew easily up to heaven. When Song Jiang received the message and rushed there with the others to see him, he was no longer stirring. The elegy said:

All my life long I never sought to gain merit;
Now of a sudden the golden cord is cut,
The jade lock shattered;
Now Old Faithful rides on Qiantang's stream,
And I know at last who I really am.

When Song Jiang and the Unicorn read this their sadness knew no bounds. The other leaders also came to burn incense and pay their last respects. Marshal Zhang and Marshal Tong came and offered incense and paid their respects. Song Jiang distributed alms among the monks and arranged for a three-day service. He had the body enclosed in a red sarcophagus and asked Abbot Benevolence of the famous Mount Jing temple to officiate at the cremation. Monks from the Ten Houses of the Five Sacred Peaks also came to participate. The sarcophagus was borne in procession to the cremation ground in the inner court of the Pagoda of the Six Harmonies. Father Benevolence holding a torch stood before the sarcophagus. He gestured towards Monk Lu Zhishen and delivered this short address:

O Lu Zhishen, O Brother Profound Knowledge, you come out of the greenwood with your eyes of an arsonist, your mind full of killing, and all of a sudden you return with the tide: we shall find you no more among the living. O the sky's vault is filled with jade, the earth transmuted into pure gold!

Father Benevolence lit the pyre and all the monks began to recite sutras. When the flames had consumed the sarcophagus the bones were collected and buried right there in the courtyard of the Pagoda of the Six Harmonies. All the deceased's possessions, his monk's robes, his begging bowl, the wealth which had been his part of the Emperor's reward, were handed over to the pagoda for the benefit of the community. His monk's staff and cassock of black cloth were also donated.

Song Jiang inquired about the health of Pilgrim Wu Song. Though he had survived his wound, he was permanently disabled. He said to Song Jiang: "I am a cripple now. I don't want to go back to the court. I shall donate all my wealth and possessions to the community of this temple and become a free monk, or pilgrim, that's what I shall do. When you draw up the list of those who are returning, please leave my name out."

Song Jiang said: "I shall respect your wishes."

Pilgrim remained at the temple and died peacefully, aged eighty. But that was later.

Song Jiang attended in the city each day to await orders, until Marshal Zhang arrived with the main army. Two weeks after the Marshal took over in the city, the Emperor's envoy arrived with orders for Song Jiang and the rest of the company to return to the capital. Marshal Zhang and the other top-ranking officers left first. Song Jiang and the others took a little longer to pack up. Before they left, Leopard's Head suddenly became paralysed. Morbid died of a tumour on his spine and the Flea succumbed to cholera. These deaths were a heavy blow to Song Jiang. News came from Dantu that the Blue-Faced Beast was also dead and had been buried in the cemetery there. Leopard's Head's paralysis was found to be incurable so he was left at the temple in the care of Pilgrim. Six months later he too was dead.

As Song Jiang and the others were leaving Hangzhou to return to the capital, the Prodigy came in private to the Unicorn and said: "I have served you since childhood. I owe everything to you, master. Now that our task is completed, I would like to suggest that we resign the positions we were granted and go away quietly to hide our footsteps and bury our names, find some place where we can live out our days in peace. What do you think about this?"

The Unicorn said: "Since the time we were pardoned, we have gone through a hundred battles, laboured ceaselessly, suffered many a hardship. Many of our comrades have died but we two have been fortunate enough to survive. Now is the time to return home in glory, start a home, with a wife of good family and privileged sons. Why do you want to embark on a project that has no future?"

"You are mistaken, master," said the Prodigy with a wry smile. "My plan is the one which has a future. I'm afraid it's what you propose that has no future!"

This Prodigy one can say truly was one who knew when to advance and when to retire, or to put it another way, knew how to read the signs:

The battle's fought, the day is won,
A quiet retreat's his only thought.
Let worldly men for fame strive on;
Ambition's measure's always short.

The Unicorn said: "I've never for a moment wavered, lad, so how could the Court hold anything against me?"

The Prodigy said: "Have you never heard of all those faithful ministers and generals of antiquity whose services to the crown were rewarded with disgrace and death?

The Unicorn said: "What I heard was that they brought trouble on themselves through excessive ambition. Whereas I don't aspire to such heights, so I can't provoke such accusations."

The Prodigy said: "Well, if you won't listen to me, I fear you will come to regret it. If I go to tell Song Jiang I'm leaving, he is an inflexible man and I'm afraid he won't release me, so I shall say farewell only to you, master."

"Where will you go if you leave me?" the Unicorn asked.

"I shall not be far away from you," he replied.

"So be it," said the Unicorn. "But I'd still like to know where you're thinking of going!"

The Prodigy prostrated himself eight times and on the same day tied some valuables in a bundle and set off for who knows where. Next morning a soldier found a paper addressed to Song Jiang. This is what Song Jiang read:

Your servant Yan Qing, the Prodigy, humbly greets you and declares: Since you received me into the company I have received such favours from you as even with my death I could not fully repay. Now in view of my weakness and inadequacy I feel myself unfit for public service and beg permission to retire to the countryside and live as a private citizen. I wanted to bid you farewell, but I feared that your sense of responsibility would make it difficult for you to release me, so I shall depart quietly tonight. I leave you with these short verses and hope that you will find it in you to forgive me:

I resign my appointment, all honours despise.
With the pardon in hand I shall now prepare

After reading the Prodigy's letter and poem, Song Jiang felt truly saddened.

Song Jiang had the tablets awarded by the Emperor to leaders who had since died collected up and returned to the appropriate authorities in the capital.

Song Jiang's army set off, and when they reached Suzhou the White-Water Dragon, pretending to have caught a cold took to his bed. His men informed Song Jiang. Song Jiang himself went with the doctor to see him. White-Water Dragon said: "Brother, do not delay your journey or the Emperor will blame you. I am afraid Marshal Zhang will have been there a long time already. If you want to do me a favour, you might leave Cave Dragon and River Rider to look after me. When I am better we can come after you to see the Emperor. Please go on ahead with the army."

Although he had misgivings, Song Jiang could not waste any more time. He had to start. There was even a dispatch from Marshal Zhang demanding haste so he left the three boat commanders behind and set off with all the others for the capital.

As for White-Water Dragon and his friends, the three of them in accordance with their previous agreement went off to find the four fishermen. They spent all their capital building themselves a boat at Elmhurst, after which they sailed from Taicang Harbour for foreign lands. Later White-Water Dragon became lord of Siam. Cave Dragon, River Rider and the rest filled positions overseas and prospered, holding sway in other coastal regions. But that is part of another story, the story about White-Water Dragon.

After an uneventful journey Song Jiang and his men reached Changzhou and Runzhou, two towns they had previously fought for. Song Jiang could not help feeling the pain of it: only twenty or thirty percent of the leaders who had crossed the river still survived. After Yangzhou, when they reached Huai'an and knew the capital was not far off, Song Jiang ordered all his commanders to prepare themselves for their audience with the Emperor. On the twentieth of the ninth month they reached the Eastern Capital. Marshal Zhang and the main army were already in the city, so Song Jiang had to be stationed outside and they set up camp as before at Chenbridge to await the Emperor's orders.

At this point some soldiers from the company that had remained behind with White-Water Dragon in Suzhou arrived and announced that he had not been ill at all but simply unwilling to join government service in the capital, and that he had now gone off somewhere with Cave Dragon and River Rider. This gave Song Jiang further cause for sadness. When he told Sterling to draw up the list of leaders present in the capital, there were only twenty-seven of them on it, besides those who had died in the Emperor's service. A letter of thanks was written to all those listed and they were ordered to remain at hand in readiness for their audience. Three days later at the dawn court, when all the courtiers assembled to greet the Emperor, the Emperor ordered Song Jiang and his company to be summoned.

As the light slowly spread in the east, Song Jiang, the Unicorn and the others rode into the city. The people turned out to see them. This was their third audience with the Emperor. The first time, after the amnesty, they had paraded in the red and green silk robes that were the Emperor's gift to them, displaying the gold and silver tablets they had been awarded. After defeating the Tartars, at the Emperor's command they had ridden in fully armed. This time, since peace had been restored, the Emperor ordered civilian dress, so they were in the ceremonial attire of the court as they rode into the city. When the people saw how few of them remained, a great sigh went up. They reached the Meridian Gate and smartly dismounted and went in. A chamberlain led them to the foot of the palace steps. With Song Jiang and the Unicorn in front, they advanced and prostrated them-selves eight times, then retreated and prostrated themselves another eight times. Finally they positioned themselves halfway between the two extremes and prostrated themselves eight times again — making twenty-four times in all, producing an effect of lively movement and ending in rousing shouts of "Long live the Emperor!"

The Emperor responded by expressing his sadness on seeing they were so few. He ordered them all to be admitted to the imperial presence and Song Jiang and the Unicorn led them up the steps. They knelt at the top before the pearl screen. His Majesty graciously invited them to rise and his attendants raised the screen. "I know that you have suffered many hardships in subduing the disturbances in the South and that you have lost most of your comrades. It causes me enormous grief," he said.

Song Jiang, his face streaming with tears, prostrated himself all over again and gave the following account. There were fifty-nine leaders, he said, who died in His Majesty's service, to wit:

Fourteen senior commanders: Thunderclap Qin Ming, Spearsman Xu Ning, Twin Spears Dong Ping, Hotshot Zhang Qing, Red-Haired Devil Liu Tang, Tattooed Dragon Shi Jin, Hasty Suo Chao, White Eel Zhang Shun, Ruan the Second, Ruan the Fifth, Sergeant Lei, Madcap Shi Xiu, Snake Xie Zhen, Scorpion Xie Bao

And forty-five junior commanders: Door-God Song Wan, Nameless Jiao Ting, Turtle Tao Zongwang, Victorious Han Tao, Supremo Peng Qi, Whitey Zheng Tianshou, Knife Cao Zheng, Fleetfoot Wang Dingliu, Ugly Son-in-Law Xuan Zan, Star Kong Liang, Young Master Shi En, Hound Hao Siwen, Redeye Deng Fei, Big Chief Zhou Tong, Stripes Gong Wang, Pluto Bao Xu, Yellow Dog Duan Jingzhu, Ape Hou Jian, Flagpole Meng Kang, Short-Arse Wang Ying, Steelbright Hu Sanniang, Eight-Armed Ogre Xiang Chong, Winged Ghost Li Gun, Dandy Yan Shun, Magic Flautist Ma Lin, Water General Shan Tinggui, Fire General Wei Dingguo, Little Duke Lu Fang, Halberdier Guo Sheng, Golden Wings Ou Peng, River-Jumper Chen Da, White-Spotted Snake Yang Chun, Perilous Yu Baosi, Tiger-Killer Li Zhong, Pill Monger Xue Yong, Green-Eyes Li Yun, Guv Shi Yong, Skyscraper Du Qian, Scarface Ding Desun, Forester Zou Yuan, Executioner Li Li, Spots Tang Long, Strongarm Cai Fu, Gardener Zhang Qing, Ogress Sun Erniang

Ten leaders died of illness, namely:

Five senior commanders: Leopard's Head Lin Chong, Blue-Faced Beast Yang Zhi, Pilot Zhang Heng, Unstoppable Mu Hong, Morbid Yang Xiong

And five junior commanders: Comet Kong Ming, Crocodile Zhu Gui, Smiler Zhu Fu, Daytime Rat Bai Sheng, Flea Shi Qian

One senior commander achieved enlightenment and passed away at the Temple of the Six Harmonies: Monk Lu Zhishen

One senior commander who lost an arm had refused all honours and chosen a life of contemplation: Pilgrim Wu Song

One senior commander previously in the capital had returned to a life of contemplation in the provinces: Taoist Gongsun Sheng

Four had refused all honours and departed along the way: Prodigy Yan Qing, White-Water Dragon Li Jun, Cave Dragon Tong Wei, River Rider Tong Meng

Five were previously retained in the capital, including the doctor who was sent for by the court: Doctor An Daoquan, Redbeard Huangfu Duan, Craftsman Jin Dajian, Magic Hand Xiao Rang, Lungs Yue Ho

Thus twenty-seven leaders only were present that day at court.

The Emperor continued to express his grief: "Originally there were one hundred and eight of you, all corresponding to stars," he said. "Now there are only twenty-seven — and the four who have departed already. It is quite true that you have lost four-fifths of your company." He ordered that all the leaders who had died in the service of the Emperor should receive titles of nobility. The leaders who were present at this audience were given official posts, of which the secretariat was informed, with the exception of Auntie Gu, who was however given a title of nobility.

Song Jiang was to be imperial commissioner in Chuzhou and commander-in-chief of the garrison. The Unicorn was to be imperial commissioner in Luzhou and deputy commander of the troops. The Professor was to be chief of communications in one of the guards regiments. Scimitar was to be military governor in the district of the Northern Capital. Twin Rods was to be chief instructor with the Imperial guard. Other posts went to Colonel Hua, Mr. Chai, Skyhawk, Whiskers, Magic Messenger, Iron Ox and Ruan the Seventh.

All went to give thanks for the titles and offices they had received and each received in addition a generous financial reward.

Song Jiang told His Majesty how the Black Dragon Lord had appeared to him twice and protected both the country and the army, helping them to victory. The Emperor accordingly conferred on the Dragon Lord the title of "Dragon Lord, patron of loyalty and of virtue, provider of protection and purveyor of comfort". He also changed the names of Muzhou and Shezhou to Yanzhou and Huizhou, to efface the memory of the part they played in Fang La's uprising. Clearwater was renamed Peacehaven and Bangyuan Gap was opened up and converted into an island. The local authorities were ordered to build a temple to the Black Dragon Lord on Black Dragon Mountain, for which the Emperor provided an inscription in his own hand. Traces of this temple remain to this day. In recognition of what the people in many towns south of the river had suffered under Fang La, they were excused from taxes for three years.

When Song Jiang and the others had expressed their gratitude, The Emperor ordered a peace banquet to honour their achieve-ments. All the officials civil and military were present, all the ministers and secretaries. When the leaders went to thank the Emperor, Song Jiang took the opportunity to make a request: "Since we received the amnesty many of our troops have died. If there are some who would like now to return home, I beg Your Majesty to look kindly on them."

The Emperor assented and gave the order: "Any soldier who wishes to serve in the imperial army shall be given a hundred strings of cash and ten rolls of material and enlisted in a regiment of the royal guards, either the Dragons or the Tigers. Those who do not wish to serve, let them be given two hundred strings of cash and ten rolls of material and sent home to their villages to work as ordinary citizens."

Song Jiang had another request: "I was born and grew up in the village of Yuncheng. Since the time I fell from grace I have never dared return. Would Your Majesty graciously grant me some leave, so that I may go back and attend to the tomb of my ancestors and visit my family, before taking up my post in Chuzhou? Of course I would not go without Your Majesty's consent."

The Emperor was pleased with the respectful tone and granted Song Jiang an additional hundred thousand strings of cash to facilitate his return home. Song Jiang took leave of the court. Next day the Privy Council gave a banquet to celebrate the peace and the day after the Military Council gave their banquet. Marshal Zhang and all the other senior officers had already received important honours but that does not concern our story. Fang La, on the other hand, was taken on the Emperor's order to the market-place and cut to pieces there. His death lasted three days.

Honour and rank the one secures,
While the other a cruel death endures.
Men get their just reward at last,
Which for some comes slow, for others fast.

Song Jiang was given the leave he had requested. Those of his troops who wanted to continue serving in the army were rewarded and appointed to two of the imperial guards regiments as grooms. Those who wanted to leave the army were also rewarded and sent back home to serve the people there. The junior commanders all received rewards and were given military or civil appointments or sent off to serve on the frontier. With their official letters of appointment they went off to their posts where they helped preserve the peace.

When all this was settled, Song Jiang said farewell to them for the time being, and with his brother Iron Fan and a few hundred troops, carrying the Emperor's gifts, his luggage, uniform and campaign booty, left the capital and headed for Shandong. They were returning home in fine silk robes. The journey was uneventful. Formerly when he reached the neighbourhood his father and family would come out to meet him. Now when he got to the manor he learnt that the old squire was already dead, though the burial of the coffin had yet to take place. The two brothers could not restrain their grief. Their relatives and the retainers all came to pay their respects. Before he died, squire Song had left the fields and the household in very good order, all just as it had always been. Song Jiang organized a service at the manor and invited Buddhist and Taoist priests in to pray for his deceased parents. A constant stream of local officials visited. When the day and time had been chosen, the two brothers themselves carried their father's coffin to a place on the hill for burial. Many people came for the funeral that day, local dignitaries, family and neighbours, old and young, connections of all kinds. But enough of this.

Mindful of his as yet unfulfilled promise to the Mystic Lady, Song Jiang used fifty thousand strings of cash to pay stone-masons and others to restore the temple of the Mystic Lady of the Ninth Heaven and had new images installed in the two side galleries and new decorations, all of which was carried out with great care. But time was passing and Song Jiang was afraid of incurring the Emperor's displeasure, so he appointed a day to end his mourning. After a few more days of Taoist ceremonies, he organized a big banquet to which he invited all the village worthies.

The next day his relatives gave him a banquet. No more need be said of this.

He transferred ownership of the estate to his brother, Iron Fan who, although he had received honours, preferred to remain in the country where he could attend to the farm and tend the ancestral shrine. All the wealth Song Jiang had earned he distributed among the poor.

Having spent several months in his native place, Song Jiang bade farewell to home and old friends and returned to the capital to be reunited with his comrades. Some of them by now had moved their families to the capital to live, and others had left for their posts elsewhere. The close relatives of those who had died in the Emperor's service had received a handsome reward and been told to return home and compensate the families. By the time Song Jiang returned to the capital, these had all returned home well satisfied.

In obedience to the court's order, Song Jiang had bade farewell to the members of the Military Council, packed his things and was ready to go to his post, when the Magic Messenger appeared with something to tell him. Magic Messenger sat down and said a great deal that was to have important consequences: Song Jiang while living was to become known as the Hero from Yuncheng and after death Lord of Duckweed Marsh. It will be true to say:

How noble and pure the breeze that is born in the temple!
How imposing the portraits in the mausoleum!

Song Jiang after death goes to Duckweed Marsh & his Ghost Haunts Liao Er Flats; The Emperor Hui Zong Dreams a visit to Mount Liang Marsh

Dai Zong rose and said to Song Jiang: "The emperor in his benevolence has appointed me prefect of Yanzhou. Today I intend to submit my resignation and leave for the Sacred Mountain Temple in Tai'an Prefecture where I shall become a Taoist priest and live out my life in tranquility."

"Why do you take this course of action, brother?"

"I had a dream that the Summoner to the Nether World was calling me. So I made up my mind."

"You have that marvellous ability to travel quickly, brother. You'll surely become a spirit of the district after you die."

They parted. Dai Zong resigned his post, went to the Sacred Mountain Temple, and became a Taoist priest. Every day he burned incense and diligently prayed for the Emperor of Heaven. Though he was not ill, several months later he bid farewell to his fellow priests and died, smiling cheerfully. His spirit appeared in the temple frequently after that. Worshippers set up a statue of him in the temple, using his original skeleton as the framework.

Ruan the Seventh, when he received his appointment, took leave of Song Jiang and assumed office as commandant of the Gaitian Military District. In the next few months, Generals Wang Bing and Zhao Tang, remembering how he had insulted them at Bangyuan Cavern, frequently complained about him to Chancellor of Military Affairs Tong.

"He put on Fang La's royal garments and jade girdle. Though it was only a joke at the time, it's still on his mind," they said. They wanted to have him killed. "That Gaitian Military District is a secluded place, and the people there are savage," they said. "He's sure raise a rebellion."

Tong told Premier Cai Jing, who reported to the emperor and requested an order canceling Ruan the Seventh's appointment and reducing him to ordinary civilian status.

No one was more pleased than Ruan when the decree was issued. He returned with his old mother to Stone Tablet Village in Liangshan Marsh and became a fisherman again. Ruan supported the old lady for the rest of her days. He himself later died at the age of sixty.

Chai Jin the Small Whirlwind, in the capital, noted that Dai Zong had resigned his post and become a priest. He learned, too, that the imperial court had removed Ruan the Seventh from office and reduced him to an ordinary citizen on the theory that because he had worn Fang La's royal vestments he probably wanted to rebel.

"I was a duke consort under Fang La," Chai Jin said to himself. "If those evil ministers find out and slander me before the emperor, won't I be dismissed and humiliated also? It would be better if I took the initiative and saved myself the trouble."

Claiming that he could not function efficiently because of recurring bouts of rheumatism, he asked to resign and return to his farms. Permission was granted. He bid farewell to the officials and went back to his estate in Henghai District, Cangzhou Prefecture, where he lived a life of ease. One day, though in perfect health, he suddenly passed away.

Li Ying served as commandant of Zhongshan District for half a year, when he heard of Chai Jin's retirement. He too claimed inability to serve due to rheumatism. He resigned and returned to his village of Lone Dragon Mountain. Later he joined up with Du Xiang, and they became rich. Both came to a good end.

Guan Sheng, commandant of the Daming garrison in the Northern Capital, won the respect of his troops and the local populace. One day, returning drunk from military maneuvers, he fell from his horse and took ill and died.

Huyan Zhuo, who had been appointed a commander of the Imperial Guards, drilled his men every day. In later years he led an army against the Fourth Prince of the Golden Tartars. He was killed in battle west of the Huai River.

Zhu Tong performed well as commandant of the garrison at Baoding. Later he fought under General Liu Guangshi against the Golden Tartars, and ended his days as governor of the Taiping Military District.

Hua Rong assumed office as prefect of Yingtian, where he went with his wife and younger sister. Wu Yong, who was unmarried, took charge in the Wusheng Military District, where he arrived accompanied only by a boy servant. Li Kui, also unmarried, had just two servants with him when he assumed office in Runzhou Prefecture.

Why do we tell of these latter three only up until the time they commenced their official duties, but reveal the final fate of the previously mentioned seven? That is because the seven do not appear again in our story. As to the other five senior chieftains—Song Jiang, Lu Junyi, Wu Yong, Hua Rong and Li Kui—we shall be hearing more of them.

Regarding the fifteen lieutenant chieftains, aside from Song Qing who was already at home, Du Xing also returned to the countryside to join Li Ying. Huang Xin assumed office in Qingzhou. Sun Li, with his brother Sun Xin and sister-in-law Gu Dasao, plus his own wife and children, resumed their former jobs in Dengzhou. Zou Run had no desire to become an official and went back to the Mountain in the Clouds.

Cai Qing returned with Guan Sheng to the Northern Capital as an ordinary citizen. Pei Xuan and Yang Lin, after talking it over, returned to Horse Watering Valley and retired. Jiang Jing, missing his old home, went back to Tanzhou as a plain civilian. Zhu Wu had been learning Taoist lore from Fan Rui for some time and, like him, became a Taoist priest. Together, they roamed the land, finally joining the temple of Gongsun Sheng, where they lived out their days.

Mu Chun returned to civilian life in Jieyang Town. Ling Zhen the remarkable cannoneer was appointed to the Imperial Explosives Bureau. Doctor An Daoquan became a senior physician in the capital's Imperial Hospital. Huangfu Duan was given charge of the Imperial Stables. Jin Dajian was already an official of the Imperial Treasury. Xiao Rang was named tutor in the Residence of Premier Cai. Yue Ho remained in the palace of Prince Consort Wang, where he lived out his days in ease and contentment. Of these we'll say no more.

Song Jiang and Lu Junyi, after parting, left to take up their respective posts. Lu Junyi, who had no family, proceeded to Luzhou accompanied by a few travelling companions. Song Jiang bid farewell to the emperor and his ministers and departed for Chuzhou with several family servants.

From then on, each of the chieftains went his separate way. We'll say no more of that either.

When Tai Zong succeeded Tai Zu the first Song emperor he proclaimed his aims, but in the end he couldn't see through the deception being practiced upon him. Hui Zong the present sovereign was clairvoyant and wise, but corrupt ministers managed to gain control under him as well, to the detriment of the virtuous and loyal. It was a great pity. Cai Jing, Tong Guan, Gao Qiu and Yang Jian created wide confusion and harmed the country and the people sorely.

The high honors and substantial rewards given to Song Jiang and his chieftains profoundly disturbed Marshals Gao and Yang. They conferred about it.

"Song Jiang and Lu Junyi are our enemies," said Gao. "Now they've been made high officials and honored by the imperial court. Swinging into the saddle they command armies, dismounting they rule the population. We ministers have become a laughing stock! We must remember the old saying: 'Gentlemen scorn the timid, heroes must be ruthless.' "

"I have a plan," said Yang. "We'll get rid of Lu Junyi first. It will be like cutting off Song's right arm. The man's tremendously brave. If we dealt with Song first and Lu found out he'd surely turn on us and create a very bad situation."

"Let's hear your plan."

"Have a couple of Luzhou military men complain to the ministry that Lu is raising an army and storing up grain and fodder with the intent to revolt. We'll take them to the premier and they'll ask him to report this to the emperor. Premier Cai will carry through the deception and request the emperor to invite Lu to the palace. When His Majesty entertains him at an imperial feast, we'll slip some mercury into his food. It will lodge in his kidneys and he'll be incapacitated. He won't be able to do anything of any importance. Then we can send an emissary to Song Jiang with imperial wine in which we'll have put a slow-working poison. In half a month he'll be beyond saving."

"An excellent idea," said Gao. The two wicked ministers dispatched a confidant to fetch two local men from Luzhou. They wrote out a complaint for them and sent them to the Council of Military Affairs. The complaint alleged that Lu Junyi was raising an army in Luzhou and storing fodder and grain in preparation for a revolt, also that he was in constant touch with Song Jiang in Chuzhou and kept him informed of his scheme.

Tong Guan the Chancellor of Military Affairs also hated Song Jiang. He accepted the complaint and relayed it to the office of the premier. Cai read it and summoned the others to a conference. Gao and Yang proposed that the accusers be brought directly before the emperor. This was done.

"When Song Jiang and Lu Junyi smashed the Liao Tartars, and later when they captured Fang La, they had hundreds of thousands of soldiers under their command, yet they showed no indication of wicked ideas," said the sovereign. "Now that they have taken the path of virtue, would they leave it and return evil for good, revolt even? I have never wronged them. Why should they rebel against the throne? There's something fishy here. I don't believe it."

"Your Majesty talks of loyal love," said Gao and Yang. "But a man's heart is hard to fathom. Lu Junyi probably considers his rank too low. He's not satisfied and wants to rebel. Fortunately, people have discovered it."

"I shall call him before me and get at the facts personally."

Cai and Tong had a suggestion. "Lu Junyi is a wild beast. He's difficult to control," they said. "If he's startled he'll become suspicious. That will make things very awkward. It won't be easy to catch him. Why not invite him to dine, Sire? In the course of conversation Your Majesty can feel out his real intentions. If there's nothing to it, we can forget the whole thing. He'll think inviting him is just a sign that Your Majesty doesn't forget his meritorious officials."

The emperor agreed. He sent an emissary with a summons to Lu Junyi to appear at the imperial court for an assignment. When the emissary arrived at Luzhou, officials came out of the city to greet him. They escorted him to the prefectural office, where he read the document.

To skip the petty details, Lu immediately rode back to the capital with the emissary. He rested in quarters outside the palace. Early the next morning, he waited at the East Glory Gate for the imperial audience to commence. Premier Cai Jing, Chancellor of Military Affairs Tong Guan, Marshals Gao Qiu and Yang Jian escorted Lu Junyi before the monarch. When obeisances were completed, the sovereign spoke.

"I wished to see you again. Are you comfortable in Luzhou?"

"Thanks to Your Majesty's fortunate emanations, the army and populace are all peaceful."

The emperor chatted with Lu until nearly noon. The Master of the Imperial Chefs announced that lunch for the traveller was ready if the monarch wished him to dine. Gao and Yang had already placed mercury in the food which was set upon the table. The emperor directed the Chef Master to serve Lu Junyi. Lu bowed to the sovereign and ate.

"You must look after our troops in Luzhou well," the emperor admonished. "We don't want anything to happen."

Lu Junyi respectfully expressed his thanks and left for Luzhou. He had no inkling of what the four wicked ministers were plotting.

"We'll soon see important results," Gao and Yang exulted.

Starting the return trip, Lu felt a pain in his back and a general weakness. He couldn't ride a horse, so he took a boat. After several days on the Huai River, they reached Sizhou Prefecture. There, something happened. Lu had been drinking that night, and he insisted on standing on the prow. By then the mercury had seeped not only into his kidneys but into his bones as well. He was unable to stand firmly, and his drunkenness made him stumble. Lu fell into the Huai River and drowned.

Poor Jade Unicorn of Hebei, to become a wronged ghost in the watery kingdom! His body was fished out, encoffined in Sizhou, and buried on high ground. The local officials wrote a report to the imperial ministries.

When the four plotters received the news, they reported to the emperor: "Sizhou notifies us that Lu Junyi fell into the Huai and drowned. Song Jiang is sure to become suspicious. He may start something. We suggest Your Majesty send an emissary with imperial wine as a mark of sympathy and calm him down."

The monarch thought for some time. If he didn't agree, he wasn't sure what Song Jiang's reaction would be. Yet if he did agree, he had a feeling Song Jiang might be harmed. But he could see no other alternative. In the end he let himself be persuaded by the lies and deceptions of the four wicked ministers. He directed an emissary to take two bottles of imperial wine to Chuzhou.

It happened that the man was a trusted crony of Gao and Yang. Fate had determined the day when Song Jiang must die, but who would have thought that the four would be the instrument of his demise! They put a slow-working poison in the wine and directed the emissary to go directly to Chuzhou and deliver it.

After Song Jiang assumed the governorship of Chuzhou and command of the local troops, he was solicitous of the welfare of both the soldiers and the people. The populace loved him like a parent, the troops adored him. He was lenient in his judgments, wise in his administration. The people willingly obeyed him, he had the respect of all.

He enjoyed walking outside the city's South Gate, where there was an area called Liao Er Flats. It was laced with waterways and in the center was a tall beautiful mountain thickly covered with pine and cypress. Its scenic loveliness reminded him of Mount Liangshan and its surrounding marsh. Though smaller, it had the same peaks and winding paths, the same swelling heights like crouching dragons and tigers, the same abrupt cliffs, stairways and terraces, the same streams everywhere, and lakes front and rear.

The place gave him much pleasure, and he said to himself: "When I die, this is where I'd like to be buried." Whenever he was free, it was here he wandered, happy and relaxed.

During the first ten days of summer in the sixth year of Xuan Ho, half a year after he took office, Song Jiang heard that an emissary had arrived from the capital with imperial wine. Accompanied by other officials, he went out of the city to welcome him and escort him in. In the public hall the emissary read the emperor's greeting, presented the wine and urged Song Jiang to drink. When Song Jiang requested the emissary to join him, the man refused, saying he was a teetotaler. Song Jiang ceremoniously drank and the emissary returned to the capital. He would not accept the gift which Song Jiang offered.

Song Jiang's stomach began to pain him soon after, and he suspected something had been added to the wine. He quickly made inquires and learned the emissary had in fact done some drinking while stopping at a hostel for officials along the road. Song Jiang realized he had been tricked. He was positive the wine had been poisoned by the evil ministers. He sighed.

"Since childhood I studied Confucianism, and when I grew up I learned how to be a minor official. Unfortunately I became involved in crime, but I never had the slightest desire to rebel. Now the emperor listens to deceitful ministers and sends me poisoned wine! What have I done to deserve this! It doesn't matter if I die, but Li Kui, who is today the commandant of Runzhou, will certainly take to the hills again when he hears about this dirty trick the imperial court has played. That will ruin the reputation of loyalty to the emperor I have sought so diligently all my life! There's only one thing I can do."

He dispatched a man that same night to Runzhou with a message to Li Kui to come to Chuzhou immediately.

Black Whirlwind Li Kui was morose and depressed ever since becoming commandant of Runzhou. All day long he drank with his companions. That was the only thing he enjoyed. When he received the message from Song Jiang he said to himself: "Big Brother has sent for me. It must be important." He embarked by boat at once with an aide. On reaching Chuzhou he went directly to Song Jiang in the prefecture.

"From the time we broke up I've done nothing but think of you brothers," said Song. "Wu Yong is in the far-off Wusheng Military District. Hua Rong is in Yingtian, but I haven't had any news of him. Only you, brother, are relatively near. So I've asked you to come and discuss a very serious matter."

"What is it, Big Brother?"

"First have some wine."

Song Jiang escorted Black Whirlwind into a rear hall, where wine and a goblet was waiting. Li Kui drank for some time until he was half intoxicated.

"I must tell you, brother," said Song. "I hear the imperial court is sending me poisoned wine. If I die what will you do?"

"Rebel, brother," Li Kui shouted. "Let's rebel!"

"Our army is gone, our brothers are scattered. How can we rebel?"

"I've got three thousand men in Zhenjiang, you have soldiers here in Chuzhou. We'll muster them, and as many of the local people we can get to join us, raise more troops, buy horses, and fight! We'll be happy back in Liangshan Marsh. At least we won't have to take any more crap from those rascally ministers!"

"Slowly, brother. We must talk this over."

Black Whirlwind of course didn't know that the wine he imbibed contained a slow poison. That night he drank more. The next day Song Jiang saw him off to his boat.

"When will you start your revolt, brother?" Li Kui asked. "I'll come with my troops and reinforce you."

"Brother, don't blame me!" said Song Jiang. "The emperor sent me some poisoned wine the other day, and I drank it. I'm going to die soon. All my life I've tried to adhere to two principles—loyalty and righteousness. I would never practice deceit. Now, though I am innocent, the imperial court is causing my death. But I'd rather the emperor wronged me than wrong the emperor.

"I was afraid that after I died you would rebel and spoil our reputation for loyalty and righteousness, earned while acting in Heaven's behalf in Liangshan Marsh. And so I asked you here and gave you the poisoned wine also. When you return to Runzhou you'll surely die.

"After you've expired, come to Liao Er Flats, outside Chuzhou's South Gate. It's a beautiful place, and looks just like Liangshan Marsh. Our spirits can meet there. That's where I'm going to be buried after I die. I've already decided!" As he spoke, Song Jiang's tears fell like rain.

Li Kui also wept. "Enough, enough, enough!" he cried. "I took care of you in life, Big Brother, and I'll be a minor ghost and serve you after death as well!"

His body felt heavy. Weeping, he bid Song Jiang farewell and boarded his craft. When he reached Runzhou, sure enough, the poison activated.

As Black Whirlwind lay dying, he instructed his attendants: "After I'm gone you absolutely must take my coffin to Liao Er Flats outside Chuzhou's South Gate and bury me beside Big Brother." Later, his orders were carried out.

Song Jiang felt very badly when Li Kui sailed away that day. He thought of Wu Yong and Hua Rong, and sorrowed that he'd never see them again. The poison began to work during the night. On his deathbed he said to his trusted followers: "You must fulfil my request. Bury me on high ground above Liao Er Flats. Your virtuous conduct will certainly be rewarded. Promise that you will." So saying, he died.

His followers prepared to bury him in Chuzhou, according to ceremony. The prefectural officials, informed of his request, agreed to honor it. Together with his intimates, functionaries young and old carried his coffin to a place above Liao Er Flats and buried him there. A few days later, the coffin of Li Kui was brought from Runzhou. His associates kept their word and interred him next to Song Jiang.

Song Qing was ill at home. A member of the family returning from Chuzhou informed him that his brother Song Jiang had passed away there. Qing was too sick to attend the funeral, but he sent a family member to conduct a sacrificial ceremony at Liao Er Flats and arrange for the grave to be kept in order.

As for Wu Yong, he was not happy either after assuming office. He thought constantly of the affection between Song Jiang and himself. Suddenly, one day he felt very depressed and uneasy. That night Song Jiang and Li Kui came to him in a dream and tugged at his clothes.

"We always put loyalty and righteousness above all, acting on Heaven's behalf and never wronging the emperor," they said. "But the imperial court sent us poisoned wine and, though blameless, we died. We're buried in Liao Er Flats outside Chuzhou's South Gate. If you still remember the old days come and visit our graves."

Wu Yong was about to ask questions when he suddenly awakened. It had been only a dream. But his tears fell like rain, and he sat up in bed until daylight.

The next day he packed some belongings and hurried, alone, to Chuzhou. When he got there he learned that Song Jiang indeed was dead. There wasn't a person he spoke to who didn't sigh. He went to Liao Er Hats, swept the graves, and sacrificed to the spirits of Song Jiang and Li Kui. Beating his hand on Song Jiang's grave mound, he wept.

"Your spirit is not yet gone, brother, hear what I say! I was a village school teacher. First I followed Chao Gai, then I met you, brother, and you saved my life. We shared honors together for several decades, all thanks to your virtue. Now you have died for our country and appeared to me in a dream. I still haven't repaid your kindness, brother. I shall be glad to take the dream as an omen and join you in the Nether World."

Wu Yong wept bitterly. He decided to hang himself. Just then Hua Rong, who had arrived in Chuzhou by boat, came rushing to the grave. He was startled to see Wu Yong.

"I thought you were an official in Yingtian," said Wu Yong. "How did you hear about Big Brother's demise?"

"Ever since we broke up I've never felt easy in my mind. I kept thinking of all of our brothers. The other night Song Jiang and Li Kui came to me in a dream and said they had been killed by poisoned imperial wine and were buried above Liao Er Flats. They said if I hadn't forgotten the old days I must visit their graves. I dropped everything and travelled day and night to get here."

"I had the same dream and came for the same reason. Nothing could be better than our meeting here today. I've been thinking—I can never repay brother Song Jiang for all he's done for me, and I can't bear to part with him. I'm going to hang myself here so that our spirits can be together, and as a demonstration of my loyal and righteous heart."

"Since that's how you feel, General, I'll join you," said Hua Rong, "and show my devotion to Big Brother as well."

"I was hoping that after my death you'd bury me here," said Wu Yong. "How is it that you want to do the same thing?"

"I hate to part with Big Brother, and I can't forget his kindness. In Liangshan Marsh we were major criminals, but luckily we survived. We fought in battle after battle as bold gallants together. Then the emperor amnestied us, and we marched on expeditions north and south, distinguishing ourselves by our valor. Today, we're known throughout the land. But the imperial court suspects us. They're bound to be watching us for 'offenses.' If they trump up charges and have us executed, regrets will be too late. I'd rather go with you to the Nether World. I will at least leave a clean name and my body will be given proper burial."

"Listen to me, brother, I'm alone, without any dependants. It doesn't matter if I die. But you have a young son and a sweet wife. What will they do?"

"There won't be any problem. I've left them a bit, enough to feed themselves. Besides, my wife's family will look after them."

The two men wept together, then hung themselves from a tree.

On Hua Rong's boat his attendants became concerned when, after a long time, their master failed to return. They went to the graves and found him and Wu Yong dead. Hastily, they reported to the local officials, obtained coffins, and buried the two beside Song Jiang's grave. The burial mounds were like four hills.

Moved by Song Jiang's virtue and righteous loyalty, the people of Chuzhou erected a shrine to his memory. They offered sacrifices the year round, and none of their prayers were unanswered.

Meanwhile in the Eastern Capital, the Taoist Sovereign had been uneasy ever since sending Song Jiang the imperial wine. Though he had no news, he thought of him frequently. But Gao Qiu and Yang Jian constantly diverted him with talk of pleasurable pursuits. They wanted only to block off the righteous and injure the loyal.

Then, one day, while amusing himself in the palace, the monarch suddenly recalled his mistress Shishi. Accompanied by two young eunuchs, he went through the tunnel to her rear garden and pulled the bell cord.

The girl hurried out and received him. She led him to the bedroom and asked him to be seated. The emperor ordered that all the gates, front and rear, be bolted. The girl adorned herself formally and proffered respectful obeisances.

"I've been slightly unwell lately," said the sovereign, "but Dr. An Daoquan has cured me. It's been months since we've met, beloved, but you've been always on my mind.. Seeing you again makes me very happy."

"I'm unworthy of your affection, Sire." The girl laid out wine and delicacies for the ruler's delectation.

After only a few cups, he felt very sleepy. The lamps flickered and a chill breeze blew through the room. He saw standing before him a figure in a yellow robe.

"Who are you?" asked the startled monarch. "Why are you here?"

"I am Dai Zong the Marvellous Traveller, a lieutenant of Song Jiang of Liangshan Marsh."

"What brings you to this place?"

"Brother Song Jiang is nearby. He requests that Your Majesty come with me."

"Where do you wish to take me?"

"To a place that's pure and fair. Please come, Sire."

The emperor rose and walked with Dai Zong to the rear garden. A horse stood waiting. The monarch mounted and they were off. Travelling through cloud and mist, he could hear the sound of wind and rain. At last they arrived.

All around were misty waters and cloud-obscured heights. Neither the sun nor moon could be seen, the sky and water were of one color. Liao Er Flats was a riot of red smartweed and green reed leaves. Waterfowl gambolled on stony beaches, mandarin ducks and drakes rested in pairs beside ponds of lotus. On the wooded slopes frost had turned the leaves to ten thousand scales of a fiery dragon, dew on the dykes glistened like the golden eyes of countless savage beasts. Gradually, a pale moon and a few scattered stars appeared in the night sky. It was autumn, and the breeze was chill and the dew icy.

The emperor couldn't gaze enough at the beautiful scene. "What is this place?" he queried. "Where are you taking me?"

They climbed the slope, passing through three fortified passes. Before the third, more than a hundred men prostrated themselves by the roadside. All were armed, and wore helmets and armor of gold. The monarch was astonished.

"Who are these people?"

The first of them, plumes flying from his golden helmet, stepped forward and said: "I am Song Jiang of Liangshan Marsh."

"I appointed you governor of Chuzhou. What are you doing here?"

"Please come to Loyalty Hall, Your Majesty, and I will tell you all about my wrongful demise."

At the hall the emperor got down from his horse, entered the building and was seated. He saw many people kowtowing in the mist outside.

The monarch couldn't understand. Song Jiang mounted the steps and knelt, tears streaming down his face.

"Why do you weep?" asked the sovereign.

"Although I at one time fought against the imperial troops, I was always loyal to Your Majesty and never had a seditious thought. After the amnesty, I drove back the Liao Tartars in the north and captured Fang La in the south, at the cost of eight out of ten of my brothers, who were like my arms and legs. In keeping with your decree, Sire, I took office in Chuzhou. I never squeezed a penny from the army or the people. Heaven and Earth knew the purity of my heart. Your Majesty sent me poisoned wine and I drank it. I died with no regrets."

"But I was afraid Li Kui would be angry, and rebel. So I summoned him from Runzhou and killed him with the poisoned wine. Wu Yong and Hua Rong visited my grave and hung themselves out of chivalry. We four are buried above Liao Er Flats outside of Chuzhou's South Gate. Pitying us, the villagers have built a shrine there. But although we are dead, our souls will not depart. We have remained to inform Your Majesty of our unwavering fidelity and to beg you to determine the justice of the matter."

The monarch was amazed. "I sent an emissary with sealed imperial vintage. Who could have substituted poisoned wine?"

"Ask your emissary. Then you'll know which treacherous scoundrels were behind it!"

Gazing around at the magnificent citadel and its three fortified passes, the emperor was impressed. "What is this place?"

"Liangshan Marsh, Sire, where we dwelt in the old days."

"Although you have passed on, you will be reincarnated as men again. Why do you congregate here?"

"The Jade Emperor of Heaven, moved by my righteous loyalty, designated me Deity of Liangshan Marsh. Since this is my domain, my chieftains have joined me. We sent Dai Zong, the Marvellous Traveller to bring you, Emperor of Ten Thousand Carriages, to our marsh, so that we might state our grievances and assure you personally of our devotion."

"But why didn't you appear to me in my inner palace?"

"I am a spirit of the Nether World. How could I appear amid imperial splendor? Today you left your palace, so we were able to invite you."

"I've been sitting a long time. Is it possible for me to look around?"

Song Jiang bowed and conducted him from the building. The sovereign noted the plaque above the entrance. It read, in large letters, Loyalty Hall. He nodded and descended the steps. Suddenly, from behind Song Jiang, Li Kui appeared, battle-axes in hand.

"Emperor, emperor!" he cried in a terrible voice. "How could you believe your four deceitful ministers and wrongfully destroy us? Today we've met and I can take vengeance!" Brandishing his axes, he rushed at the monarch.

Startled, the sovereign awoke. It had all been a dream. He was drenched in perspiration. Shishi was sitting alone in the lamplight.

"Where was I just now?" he asked.

He told her of his strange dream, and she said: "The righteous become saints when they expire. Can it be that Song Jiang really has died and appeared to you in a dream?"

"I'll certainly inquire about this. If it's true, I'll have a temple built in his memory and give him a posthumous title."

"A good idea. It will show that Your Majesty does not forget your meritorious officials."

The emperor sighed much that night.

The next morning he summoned his ministers to the palace. Cai Jing, Tong Guan, Gao Qiu and Yang Jian, afraid he would question them about Song Jiang, left the moment the imperial court was concluded. Only Marshal Su and a few other high officials remained waiting for an audience.

"Have you any news of Song Jiang, Governor of Chuzhou?" the sovereign asked Su.

"No news, Sire, but last night I had a peculiar dream."

"Tell me about it."

"I dreamt that Song Jiang came to my home dressed in his usual armor and helmet. He said he had died from poisoned wine Your Majesty had sent him. Sympathizing with his righteous loyalty, the people of Chuzhou buried him above Liao Er Flats outside the South Gate of the city and built a shrine where they sacrifice to him."

The emperor shook his head. "Very strange. I had the same dream." And he said to the marshal: "Send someone you trust to find out whether this is true, and report back to me immediately."

Su dispatched a man as directed.
The next day, the monarch sat in his Hall of Culture and Virtue. Gao Qiu and Yang Jian were present.
"Have your ministries any news of Song Jiang?" he asked them.
They dared not reply truthfully. Both said they did not know. Suspicious, the emperor had an uncomfortable feeling.
Marshal Su's man returned from Chuzhou. He said that Song Jiang had died of drinking poisoned imperial wine, that the people, respecting his loyalty to the emperor, had buried him on high ground above Liao Er Flats. Moreover, Wu Yong, Hua Rong and Li Kui were interred there with him. Local citizens, out of pity, had built a shrine to his memory. They sincerely worshipped there, and their prayers were always answered.
Su hastily led his emissary before the emperor in the palace. The man repeated his story. The sovereign was stricken with grief.
At his imperial court the next day, he was very angry. He berated Gao and Yang in the presence of all his officials.
"Traitorous liars, would you ruin my empire!"
Falling to their knees the two kowtowed and begged forgiveness. Cai and Tong spoke up on their behalf. "Life and death are pre-ordained. The ministries have received no official notification, so they dared not report. In fact, they didn't know. A document arrived from Chuzhou only last night. They're intending to report to you this morning, Sire. They're just waiting for you to ask." Again, the monarch was deceived by the four rogues, and their crimes were concealed. He shouted for Gao and Yang to withdraw and directed that the emissary who delivered the wine be produced. But the fellow had unexpectedly died on the return trip from Chuzhou. The next day Marshal Su called on the sovereign and related how Song Jiang had become a saint, and how efficaciously he responded to the prayers of the people. The emperor ordered that Song Qing carry on his brother's rank and office. But the younger man was suffering from rheumatism and could not assume the duties. He sent a reply of thanks and regrets, saying he wanted only to remain in Yuncheng and farm the family estate. Sympathizing with Qing's filial sentiments, the sovereign made him a gift of a hundred thousand strings of cash and three thousand mu of land. He decreed that if Qing had a son he would be given an official post. In subsequent years Qing's son Song Anping, after qualifying in the imperial examinations, was appointed a secretary scholar. But that was later. At Marshal Su's request, the emperor conferred on Song Jiang the posthumous title of Loyal, Chivalrous, and Efficacious Duke, and authorized funds for the construction of a temple dedicated to his memory in Liangshan Marsh. In the main building, statues were placed of Song Jiang and the other chieftains who died for the empire. The monarch personally wrote the words for the name plaque— Loyalty Temple. On receipt of the imperial funds, Jizhou Prefecture immediately started construction. Song Jiang's spirit appeared frequently in Liangshan Marsh, and the people sacrificed to him constantly. When they prayed for wind they got wind, when they prayed for rain they got rain. He appeared too in Liao Er Flats. There the people also built a large temple, with two wings. They petitioned for and received an imperial donation. In the main hall they installed statues of the thirty-six senior chieftains. In the wings, they put statues of their seventy-two lieutenants, plus figures of servants. People came from near and far to worship, and their prayers were always answered. Those who defend their country and protect the people have incense burned to their memories for ten thousand years. Sacrifices are made to them for generation after generation. They bring to their worshippers security and peace. In response to prayers, they bestow riches and prosperity. Remains of these ancient sites still exist to this day.

When Song Jiang returned to the capital after his triumphant visit to his native village, he summoned his comrades and ordered them all to pack their bags and proceed to their posts. At this time the Magic Messenger came to see Song Jiang. They chatted for a while and then Magic Messenger stood up and said: "Don't think I am not grateful for my post, but I propose to resign it. I want to go to the Temple of the Eastern Peak in Tai'an and become a lay-brother and serve the temple. My greatest wish is to be granted an easy end to my life."
Song Jiang said: "Whatever gave you such an idea, brother?"
"I dreamt last night that the Lord of the Underworld had sent for me," he answered. "That is why I have made this resolu-tion."
"Dear brother, you have always been the Magic Messenger in this world. No doubt you are destined to be the messenger of the gods in the next."
Magic Messenger said goodbye and after handing in his resignation went to the temple in Tai'an, where he joined the community as a lay-brother and diligently attended the gods each day, praying and burning incense with unfailing piety and devotion. One evening a few months later, without having been ill at all, he bade farewell to all the monks and passed away with a smile on his face. Later his spirit manifested itself many times at the temple of the Eastern Peak, and local people who prayed in the temple had an image placed there which was a perfect representation of his features.
Ruan the Seventh also received a title and said farewell to Song Jiang and went to Gaitian as military governor. Not long after he was in trouble because Generals Wang Bing and Zhao Tan, moved by their old grudge from the time when they lost face because he shouted at them in Fang La's citadel, went on repeating to Marshal Tong the story of his misdemeanour when he dressed up in Fang La's royal regalia. Although it might appear just an impromptu joke, they said, in reality it was evidence of a dangerous tendency and in a backward place like Gaitian he was bound to stir up rebellion. Marshal Tong informed the Grand Preceptor who spoke to the Emperor and got him to publish an order and send it down there stripping Ruan the Seventh of his title and making him a commoner again. When this happened, Ruan the Seventh at heart was not sorry. Taking his mother with him he returned to Stonetable in the Marshes of Mount Liang and resumed his old trade as fisherman, caring for his mother till the end of her days. He lived till sixty.
As for Mr. Chai, the Little Whirlwind, when he saw the Magic Messenger give up his post and go into retirement, and when he heard how the court had removed Ruan the Seventh from his post and stripped him of his title because his prank with Fang La's clothes was interpreted as a sign that he wanted to imitate that rebellion, he was reminded how he himself had acted as a son-in-law to Fang La. He thought that if at some future date evil ministers discovered this and wanted to make trouble for him with the Emperor, he too would be dismissed from his post and how would he bear the shame? Surely it was better to recognize the problem now and take action to avoid it. On the pretext of suffering from an intermittent fever of unpredictable occurrence, which made it difficult for him to carry out his duties, he asked permission to retire to his estate. He said goodbye to the others and returned home to live an independent life there, dying suddenly one day without an illness.
Skyhawk was made governor of Zhongshan, which office he filled for six months, until he heard that Mr. Chai had retired and decided himself to claim that mental illness prevented him from carrying out his duties. He asked the Military Council for permission to surrender his post and return to his estate on Lone Dragon Heights. Later with Uglymug he acquired wealth and had an easy death.
Scimitar commanded the garrison of the Northern Capital and was such a brave heart that everyone respected him. One day coming back very drunk after some military exercises he lost his seat and fell from his horse. He never regained consciousness.
Twin Rods received a command in the imperial barracks and every day drilled the Emperor's guard of honour. Later he took part in the campaign against the Fourth Prince of Jin and died in action west of the River Huai.
Whiskers achieved success in the Baoding garrison and later went with General Liu Guangshi to fight the Jin. He achieved high military rank.
Colonel Hua took his wife and family and his younger sister with him to his post in Yingtian. The Professor, who had never had a family, went by himself, with just a boy to serve him, to his post in Wusheng.
Iron Ox went off with two servants to his post in Runzhou.
Now you may ask why I have only told you where these last three went to, and not what happened to them later. That's because the previous seven you will not meet again so I had to tell you how they finished up. But the last three, together with Song Jiang and the Unicorn, you will be meeting again and you will see what befell them in due course.
Song Jiang and the Unicorn remained in the capital while they said goodbye to the others and saw them all off to their posts. Some had no official duties and went off to their families, well provided with gifts of silk, gold and silver from the Emperor. Back in their native places they pursued their own interests. The fifteen lesser leaders who had survived had been in the capital, except for Song Jiang's younger brother, Iron Fan, who had gone back to their estate. Uglymug accompanied Skyhawk back to the country. The Tamer was reassigned to his old post in Qingzhou. Colonel Sun went back with his younger brother Blackface and Auntie Gu to serve as before in Dengzhou. The Rhinoceros did not want to be a government official and went back to the moun-tains. Blossom returned to the Northern Capital with Scimitar and remained a commoner. Sterling had come to an agreement with Panther and after receiving their titles they were given leave to return to Waterworld and the Magic Calculator missed his old home and returned there as a commoner. The Strategist had become interested in Demon King's Taoist magic and the two of them became priests wandering among the rivers and lakes, winding up in Taoist Gongsun's establishment where they ended their days. Mu the Irrepressible went back to Jieyang and became a model citizen. Thunderer, with his exceptional skills with gunpowder, was reassigned to his old post as chief of ordinance in the Imperial guard. Five others remained in the capital, as before: Doctor An, who had been summoned there previously, became a bigwig in the Medical College; Redbeard, the vet, became chief overseer of the Emperor's stable; Craftsman had a post in the palace; Master Hand, the calligrapher, got a job in Marshal Su's household as private tutor and Lungs, the singer, remained a member of Prince Wang's household, living in clover till the end of his days. No more of them.
Now it was time for Song Jiang and the Unicorn to part, each going off to his own post. The Unicorn had no family, so with just some servants he took himself off to Luzhou. Song Jiang, after thanking the Emperor and taking his leave of the Military Council, headed for his post in Chuzhou, accompanied by some old family servants. We need say no more of all these partings.
Ever since the pledge made when Taizong succeeded Taizu, the Song dynasty's founder, that crimes under the preceding administration would not be prosecuted, the regime had been blighted by corruption. And the present emperor, who was both pious and intelligent, was impeded by evil counsellors who had wormed their way into his confidence and were enemies to all virtue, more's the pity. At this time it was those four notorious villains Grand Preceptor Cai, Marshal Tong, Gao the Ball and Marshal Yang who were turning the world upside down and constituted a blight on country, family and people. This time the two Grand Marshals, Gao and Yang, seeing how the Emperor honoured and rewarded Song Jiang and his lot, were exceedingly displeased. When they discussed matters they decided: "Song Jiang and the Unicorn are our enemies. Now we see them becoming honoured officials, receiving all these favours from the Emperor. In their military capacity they have command of troops, as civilians they have power among the people. We members of the Military Council, how can we not be the object of scorn and laughter? There's an old saying: 'Without hatred you cannot be a minister, without poison you cannot be considered a man!'"
Yang said: "I have been thinking about this. We must deal with the Unicorn first. We can finish off Song Jiang later. That Unicorn fellow is formidable and if we began with Song Jiang and he realized what was happening, the business could turn nasty and cause us a real problem."
"What's your idea, then?" said Gao the Ball.
"We get some Luzhou soldiers to come and complain to the Military Council about the Unicorn, saying he is recruiting troops, buying horses and getting in supplies because he plans a rebellion. Then we'll send over their accusation to the Grand Preceptor's office. We fool the Grand Preceptor and when he reports it to the Emperor he requests permission for us to deal with it. We have the Unicorn lured to the capital and when the Emperor gives him wine, we put some mercury in the drink which will destroy his kidneys. After that he'll not be much good for anything. Then we can send someone with imperial wine for Song Jiang. The wine will contain a slow poison, so that in a couple of weeks he'll be beyond saving."
Gao exclaimed: "An excellent plan!"
The two villains sent someone they trusted to find two Luzhou people to make out the accusation for them. They told them to go to the Council of Ministers and warn them that the Unicorn was recruiting troops and so on in Luzhou and planning a rebellion and that he had sent someone to Chuzhou to enlist Song Jiang in the enterprise. Now the head of the Council of Ministers was Marshal Tong, who had his own reasons for hating Song Jiang and company. As soon as he received the accusation, he went directly to the Grand Preceptor with it. The latter read it and called a ministerial meeting. Gao and Yang were present at this, and it was agreed that the accusers should be taken to see the Emperor. His Majesty said: "To my knowledge, Song Jiang and the Unicorn have been engaged in suppressing bandits on all sides. They had thousands of soldiers under their command, yet they showed no sign of evil intentions. They have abandoned their old ways and reformed, how can they now be rebellious? We have done nothing to upset them, how can they plan to go counter to our will? This smells of a plot. Until there is further evidence I shall find it hard to believe."
Then Gao and Yang, who were there of course, said: "Your Majesty, whatever reason may teach, the human heart is impossible to fathom. The Unicorn must harbour resentment because he thinks his post is beneath him. Festering dissatisfaction has turned to thoughts of rebellion. Unluckily for him he has been found out."
The Emperor said: "Bring him here for me to question him and ascertain the truth for myself."
The Grand Preceptor and Marshal Tong remonstrated: "This Unicorn is a wild beast. His behaviour is unpredictable. If he is alarmed, he may take flight, which would prove most awkward. It could be very difficult to catch him afterwards. No, the best policy is lure him to the capital and then Your Majesty should give a banquet for him and speak to him graciously whilst we observe his behaviour and see if the story is true or not. If there is nothing in it there will be no need for any interrogation. It will just have served to show how Your Majesty values loyal service."
The Emperor agreed to this and a royal edict was composed and sent by special envoy to Luzhou, asking the Unicorn to return to the court because the Emperor had something to say to him. When the envoy reached Luzhou all the government officials went to meet him outside the town. He was taken to the government offices where the edict was opened and read. To put it briefly, the Unicorn went back with the envoy to the capital, both riding post horses. The journey was uneventful. They stopped at the court reception hall, and in the morning went to the gate of Eastern Splendour to wait for the dawn court. As usual, the Grand Preceptor and Marshals Tong, Gao and Yang were present and they took him to a side chamber to see the Emperor. When he had made obeisance, the Emperor said to him: "I wanted to see you personally." He went on to ask: "Is everything satisfactory at Luzhou?"
The Unicorn prostrated himself again and said: "Thanks to Your Majesty's munificence, the army and the people there are peaceful and prosperous."
The Emperor asked a few more questions and the audience dragged on until noon, when the major-domo came and announced: "The repast Your Majesty ordered is ready, will it please Your Majesty to give the order to start?"
By this time Marshals Gao and Yang had already secretly had the mercury added to the food that was on the royal table. The Emperor most graciously offered the Unicorn food from his own kitchen. The Unicorn thanked him humbly. The Emperor flattered him, saying: "Return to Luzhou and be diligent, take care of your military and civil officials, let nothing untoward occur."
With many protestations of gratitude the Unicorn left and returned to Luzhou. He suspected nothing of the four villains' plot. Gao and Yang said to themselves: "We've done it!"
When the Unicorn reached Yingzhou that night he felt a terrible pain in his kidneys. He could not stand up and he certainly couldn't ride a horse, so he had to travel on by boat. When he reached Sizhou on the river Huai he had arrived at the end of his allotted span of years and something was bound to happen. That night he got drunk and went to stand on the prow of the boat to pass the time. Just at that moment the mercury slid down into his guts and entered the very marrow of his bones. Through the effect of this and also because he was drunk, his legs went weak, he lost his footing and fell. The Unicorn drowned in the depths of the river Huai. Poor Unicorn, Wonder of the North! He was obliged to become a wronged ghost in the water. His servants fished out the body and buried it at a suitable spot outside Sizhou. The authorities sent in a report to the Military Council. Of this no more.
Now the first part of their plot was complete, the four conspirators presented the Sizhou report to the Emperor, saying: "The Sizhou authorities report that when the Unicorn reached the Huai he got drunk and fell in the river and drowned. We members of the Military Council consider it our duty to report this. Owing to the Unicorn's death we are apprehensive that Song Jiang may become suspicious and want to make trouble. We beg Your Majesty to send an envoy to Chuzhou with some imperial wine for Song Jiang, to keep him happy."
The Emperor agonized over this proposal. If he turned it down, it was impossible to say what else might follow; if he let it go ahead, he feared ill would come of it. But the result was inevitable. In the end with their lying tongues and subtle deceitful words the villains talked the Emperor into it and he reluctantly gave his permission, he had no means of refusing them. Instructions were given for an envoy to carry two jars of imperial wine to Chuzhou, with immediate effect. Naturally this envoy was a crony of Gao and Yang. Well, fate had only allotted Song Jiang a certain number of days. It was fated that this wine with the poison added to it by those evil officials should be brought to Chuzhou by the imperial envoy.
Now, since the day Song Jiang arrived in Chuzhou as commissioner, he had also doubled as commander of the army. When he took up his duties he was popular with both military and civilians; the people saw him as a father to them, while the soldiers looked up to him, the laws were respected, public affairs were in good order and since he had won the hearts of the people he was honoured by all. When he had leisure, he liked to walk outside the town. There was a certain place beyond the south gate called Duckweed Marsh. Here there was a hill surrounded by ponds. This hill was most beautiful, with abundant stands of pine and cypress, an exceedingly scenic spot. Although not great in area, the mountains clustered round it making a protected place in the hill's embrace, full of crooked crags and gentle slopes, surrounded by creeks and ponds in front and behind. It was just like the waterside camp at Mount Liang. The moment Song Jiang saw it his heart rejoiced and he said to himself: "If I were to die here, this is where I would like to be buried. But when I have the chance I will come here often to walk. It is a place to arouse joy and banish care."
To cut a long story short, about six months after Song Jiang arrived at his post, he heard the news that some imperial wine had arrived, and went out with the crowd to meet it. Back in the courtroom he opened and read the imperial edict, and the envoy presented the wine and made him drink some. In return Song Jiang invited the envoy to drink, but the latter excused himself, saying that he could not take wine. Song Jiang had some gifts to present to the envoy, who refused them and departed.
After drinking the wine Song Jiang felt a terrible pain. He began to suspect the wine had been poisoned. He ordered his people to find out about the envoy. It turned out he had drunk wine at the rest house on the journey. Song Jiang knew now that it was a plot and the evil ministers must have poisoned the wine. He said with a sigh: "I studied the Confucian teaching when I was a child; when I grew up I became a government official, and later unfortunately fell into a criminal way of life, but never once did I harbour a disloyal thought. Now the Emperor has been too easily persuaded by slander and has sent me poisoned wine. Though innocent of any crime I stand convicted. My death is not important, but there's Iron Ox as military governor in Runzhou and if he hears that the authorities have played this dirty trick on me, he will revert to the greenwood and raise another band, and then the honourable reputation we have striven to achieve will be ruined. There's only one thing to do." That very night he sent someone to Runzhou to ask Iron Ox to come at once, because he had something to discuss with him.
To tell the truth, Iron Ox had been very bored since he was made governor of Runzhou. He spent his time drinking with his officers, wine was his only solace. When he heard that Song Jiang had sent for him, he said: "If the Leader wants me, it must be something important." He went back with the messenger by boat. He entered the government office and prostrated himself. Song Jiang said: "Since the company split up I have missed my comrades night and day. The Professor is too far away, and I have had no news at all of Colonel Hua. You're the only one who is relatively close, at Runzhou. I sent for you because I have something important to discuss with you."
"What is it?" Iron Ox asked.
"Have some wine first," Song Jiang replied. He invited him to an inner chamber where food and wine had been prepared and made him eat and drink. He waited till he was tipsy, then said: "Dear brother, I have heard that the Emperor is sending me poisoned wine. If I am meant to die, what do you think we should do?"
"Start a rebellion!" Iron Ox roared.
"I've got three thousand troops in Runzhou. You've got some troops here, we can count them in. The people will rise up. We'll recruit energetically and buy horses, and then we'll go for it! It'll be back to Mount Liang, it'll be great! Far better than having to put up with sneering officials!"
"Softly, brother," Song Jiang said. "There's another way." For in fact into the wine he offered in welcome he had put a slow poison. Iron Ox had drunk, and next morning a boat was ready to take him back. "Whenever you're ready to march," he said to Song Jiang, "I will muster my forces and come to support you."
Song Jiang said: "Brother, forgive me. The Emperor's envoy has already been here and given me the wine. Sooner or later I will die. All my life I have cared for just one thing: honour and loyalty. I would never allow anything to sully my reputation. Now I am condemned to die, though innocent, by the Emperor. The Emperor may let me down but I shall not let the Emperor down. I was afraid that after my death you would start a rebellion and ruin the reputation we had in the Marshes of Mount Liang for loyalty and for doing heaven's will. That's why I asked you here, I wanted to see you. Yesterday I put a slow poison in your wine. When you get back to Runzhou you will die. After your death they can bring you here. There is a place here outside the south gate called Duckweed Marsh where the scenery is just like the Marshes of Mount Liang. Let our ghosts be together! When I die I will be buried in this place. I have arranged it already!" He had spoken, and the tears poured down his face.
Iron Ox was also weeping as he replied: "Well, well, well! I served you in life, let me be a little ghost under your orders after death!" Thus he concluded. Already he felt a sensation of heaviness. In this maudlin state he bade Song Jiang farewell and boarded the boat. Back in Runzhou the poison had its inevitable effect and he died. Just before his death he instructed his staff: "When I die, please do take my coffin to Duckweed Marsh outside the south gate of Chuzhou, to be buried with my brother, Song Jiang." Those were his last words. When his people had prepared the coffin, they set off in obedience to his wishes.
One thing especially troubled Song Jiang, after he had said goodbye to Iron Ox: he would not see the Professor and Colonel Hua again. That evening, as the poison was beginning to do its deadly work, he told his people: "Please follow my instructions: bury my coffin in the country outside the south gate, at Duckweed Marsh. I shall be most grateful for your kindness. Please don't forget!" Those were his last words.
His servants prepared the coffin and organized the funeral. In obedience to his words the local officials, together with his personal servants, clerks and members of the public bore his coffin to Duckweed Marsh for burial. A few days later Iron Ox's coffin was brought from Runzhou and laid to rest beside Song Jiang's tomb. Of this no more. As for Song Jiang's brother, Iron Fan, he had fallen ill at home and when some of the family servants returned and said his brother had died in Chuzhou, being ill he could not make the journey to pay his last respects. Later, on learning that his brother was buried at Duckweed Marsh he sent some family servants to make offerings and check that the grave was all right and properly supplied, before they returned. But enough of that.
As for the Professor, who had been appointed chief of communications in the Wusheng garrison, after travelling to his post he often found himself unhappy, and kept on missing the intimacy with his old friend Song Jiang. One day he suddenly felt particularly uneasy and was unable to sleep that night. Next night he dreamt of Song Jiang and Iron Ox, who were pulling him by the sleeve and said: "Professor, we always held loyalty to be the most important thing and to do heaven's will, and we never went against the Emperor. Now the court has requited us with poison and we are dead, though guilty of no crime. They have buried us in the countryside at Duckweed Marsh. Professor, if you still remember the old days, please come and visit our graves." The Professor wanted to question them further, but he awoke and found it was a dream. He sat there weeping copiously and waiting for dawn. After this dream he was unable to eat or sleep, so next day he packed his bags and headed for Chuzhou. He went alone, taking no servants. When he got there Song Jiang was dead of course, and all the local people were grieving. He arranged a service and went to Duckweed Marsh, where he found the graves and made offerings to their spirits. Then he beat the mound with his fist and weeping said: "My honourable brother's bold spirit will not be eclipsed, I pray that it may shine forth. I am just a village scholar. First I followed Chao Gai, then I was with my brother Song Jiang. Brother, you saved my life and enabled me to enjoy good fortune. I have been through a dozen wars and come out on top, thanks to you. Now you have died for your country, and appeared to me in a dream. Rather than seek vengeance, I prefer to prolong this good dream and join you in the world of the Nine Fountains." And with this he burst into tears again. He was just about to hang himself when Colonel Hua leapt off a boat and appeared in front of the grave. When he saw the Professor they both had a shock.

The Professor asked: "You are serving as an official in Yingtian. How did you know Song Jiang was dead?"

Colonel Hua said: "After I went to my post I was not at peace for a single day. I kept worrying about my brother. Last night I had a strange dream. I dreamt that Song Jiang and Iron Ox came to me and pulled me by the sleeve and said that the court had rewarded them with poison and I saw the grave at Duckweed Marsh in the countryside outside Chuzhou. Song Jiang said that if I hadn't forgotten the old days I might like to come and see the grave. So I left my family and sparing no effort came here as fast as I could."

The Professor said: "I had the same strange dream, exactly the same as yours. That is why I came. It is very good that you came today. I miss Song Jiang so much, his kindness, his righteousness, I feel so lonely without him, that I have resolved to hang myself in this place, so that my spirit can be with him. I leave all the funeral arrangements in your hands."

Colonel Hua said: "If that is your intention, Professor, I shall follow you, so I too can be with our brother."

Thus did they keep to their old principle of living and dying together!

But the Professor said: "I want you to bury me here after my death. How will you do it if you die too?"

"I have been thinking how sorely I miss our brother's humanity, how I shall never forget his kindness. When we were on Mount Liang we had committed a serious crime, we were lucky to escape death. Thanks to the Emperor's amnesty, we went north to fight, south to fight, we achieved honour. Our fame has travelled far and wide, everyone has heard of us. Something led the court to suspect us, and now the slightest rumour will be enough to condemn us. If the plots prevail and we suffer an unjust punishment it will be too late then to do anything about it. Better to follow our brother and meet at the Yellow Springs, so we leave an untarnished name in the world, and our bodies will have proper burial!"

The Professor said: "Dear brother, listen to me. I have no family, there's only me. There is nothing to prevent my dying. You have children and wife, how can you look after them?"

"That's no problem. My coffers are full, and there are many members of my wife's family who can take care of things."

They both wept for a while and then hanged themselves from the tree.

The servants on the boats waited a long time. When their masters still did not return, they went to the tomb to see and found they had both killed themselves. They hurriedly reported it to the authorities. Coffins were prepared and the Professor and Colonel Hua were buried at Duckweed Marsh alongside Song Jiang's tomb, so there were four similar mounds in a line from east to west. The people in grateful memory of Song Jiang's virtue and loyalty set up an altar there, where offerings were made in the four seasons; all who made the pilgrimage to that place had their prayers answered.

We shall pass over the frequent manifestations of Song Jiang's spirit, and tell how the Emperor at his court in the Eastern Capital after awarding the royal wine to Song Jiang was often troubled in his mind, and hearing no news of Song Jiang became extremely concerned about him. Gao the Ball and Marshal Yang continued their life of ostentatious display and wasteful luxury, always standing in the way of reform and plotting against honest men.

One day when the Emperor was relaxing in the inner palace he suddenly bethought himself of Lily, and with two attendants followed the passage to her back door and pulled the bell rope. Lily hastened to receive His Majesty and went to sit with him in the bedroom. He ordered the front and back doors to be locked. When Lily, in all her finery, had presented herself, the Emperor said: "I have not been feeling very well lately, I had to call in Doctor An to treat me. I have not been to see you for many days. But I have thought of you a lot. Seeing you now gives me huge pleasure!

Lily said: "Your Majesty is too kind to me, I feel quite embarrassed!"

Wine was served and His Majesty enjoyed himself drinking. After several cups he appeared to become tired. Lamps and candles were lit and then suddenly a draught of cold air was felt in the room. His Majesty saw a man in a yellow shirt in front of him. Startled, he asked the man: "Who are you and where are you from?"

"I am the Magic Messenger and I serve Song Jiang of Mount Liang," the other replied.

"Why have you come?"

"My brother Song Jiang is waiting," replied the Magic Messenger. "He entreats you, Your Majesty to get in your carriage and come to him."

"Where am I to tell the carriage to take me?"

"Song Jiang knows a very beautiful place and he invites Your Majesty to walk with him there."

The Emperor stood and followed Magic Messenger into the garden. His carriage was waiting. Magic Messenger invited him to get in.

It is as if mist and cloud have descended and there is a sound of wind and rain. In the place they come to:

Misty waters are everywhere, clouds and mountains fill the view. There is no brightness of sun or moon, water and sky are all one colour. The duckweed grows profusely, reeds clothe the islets in dense green: two by two the wild geese on the sand spit sadly calling, in pairs the exhausted wagtails perching on the edge of the withered lotus. Gaunt maples stand about like grief-stricken wives weeping for the absent loved-one, solitary willows face the wind, their branches like the sad eyebrows of lonely women. The moon is watery, the stars cold, the night long; the time is autumn, season of cold winds and heavy dews.

The Emperor is enchanted by the scene that meets his eyes and he asks Magic Messenger: "What is this place? Is it where you wanted me to come?"

Magic Messenger points to a road winding up the hill and says: "Please go on, Your Majesty. When you get there you will understand."

The Emperor drives on up the mountain. He comes to three gates and at the third he sees a hundred men bowing down to the ground, all in war robes and breast plates, with leather belts and bronze helmets and armour. Amazed by what he sees he asks: "Who are you all, my friends?" Then their leader, wearing a bronze winged helmet, embroidered robe and gold armour, steps forward and says: "I am Song Jiang of Mount Liang."

"I sent you to be military governor of Chuzhou," says the Emperor. "What are you doing here?"

"We have invited Your Majesty to our Ceremonial Hall, to hear the story of our unjust death."

The Emperor gets down and takes his seat in the hall. Looking about him he sees as if in a mist many warriors standing in line. He feels uncertain. The leader, Song Jiang, mounts the dais and kneels before him. Weeping he asks leave to speak.

"Why do you weep?" the Emperor asks.

"Even though we once opposed the Emperor's forces, we always retained our loyalty and never for a moment entertained thoughts of rebellion. After we received the imperial amnesty we first expelled the Tartars and then pacified three bandits and later we lost the greater part of our brothers. Your Majesty graciously commanded me to govern Chuzhou. Let heaven and earth bear witness, after I took up my post I had no secret relations with the military or the people. Now you have paid me with poisoned wine, but I died guiltless. I was afraid Iron Ox would be angry and it might make him disloyal to his sovereign. So I sent to Runzhou for him and poisoned him myself. The Professor and Colonel Hua killed themselves out of loyalty at my tomb. All four of us are buried at Duckweed Marsh outside the south gate of Chuzhou. The people have built a memorial hall there to honour us. Our spirits are not yet dispersed. They are gathered here now to inform Your Majesty that throughout our lives we were loyal from beginning to end. We beseech Your Majesty to hear us!"

The Emperor is horrified by what he hears. "I sent my special envoy with yellow seal imperial wine. Who could have changed it for poisoned wine then?"

Song Jiang says: "You can ask your envoy. He will know how the trick was carried out."

The Emperor looks at the stalwarts on all the gates and says sadly: "Where is this place that you are all meeting?"

"This is Mount Liang, where we all came together in the old days."

"But if you're all dead now, you should have departed for a new life. Why are you still here?"

"The Lord of Heaven took pity on us for our loyalty. He issued an edict appointing us tutelary spirits of Mount Liang. We have come here because of the complaint that we have not yet had the chance to lodge. We sent Magic Messenger to beg Your Majesty to come to the Marshes so that we might declare how we have been constantly loyal."

"Why did you not come to me in my palace?"

"Spirits of the underworld, how could we enter your splendid courts and halls? So in your graciousness you have consented to come to us."

"Is it possible for me to look around?"

They all prostrate themselves again to show their appreciation of the favour and His Majesty comes down from the dais and turns his gaze upon the tablet which bears in large characters the words: Great Hall of Loyalty and Righteousness. He nods to himself and proceeds down the steps. Suddenly Iron Ox steps out from behind Song Jiang. Holding his two axes he bellows: "Emperor, Emperor, why did you listen to those four scoundrels' criticism and defamation? Now that you're here, it's time to settle accounts!" So saying he whirls his axes and runs at the Emperor.

From the shock of this, the Emperor awoke and knew it had all been a dream. His body was bathed in a cold sweat. He opened both eyes, blinking, and saw the candles and lamps lit. Lily appeared not to have slept. He asked: "Have I been somewhere?"

"Your Majesty just laid his head on the pillow and went to sleep," she said.

The Emperor told her all about his mysterious dream. She said: "When people are truly good they die and become saints. Could it be that Song Jiang really is dead and that he manifested himself in Your Majesty's dream for some purpose?"

"I shall have to make some inquiries," the Emperor said. "If it turns out that he is dead, I must build a temple for him and officially declare him a hero."

"If you do this, it will show that Your Majesty does not neglect his loyal servants."

The Emperor heaved many a sigh that night.

Next day around dawn the order was given for the court to assemble in the side palace. But the Grand Preceptor, and Marshals Tong, Gao and Yang were all afraid that the Emperor might ask about Song Jiang, and left the palace. Only Marshal Su and a few other senior officials were waiting there. "Have you had any news of the military governor of Chuzhou, Song Jiang?" the Emperor asked Marshal Su.

"Although I have had no news, last night I had a strange dream. It was very odd."

"Tell me about this strange dream of yours," the Emperor said.

"I dreamt that Song Jiang came to my house dressed in uniform, helmet and armour, and claimed that Your Majesty had sent him poisoned wine. The local people, honouring his memory, had buried him outside the south gate at Duckweed Marsh and set up a shrine where offerings are made in every season."

When the Emperor heard this he nodded and said: "This strange business is just like in my dream." He told Marshal Su: "Send someone you can rely on to Chuzhou to investigate this affair and come back and report quickly."

"It shall be done," said the Marshal. He left with the Emperor's order, returned to his palace and sent a trusted servant to Chuzhou to find out about Song Jiang. Of this no more.

Next day when the Emperor drove to the Hall of Culture and Ethics, he saw Marshals Gao and Yang standing on one side and asked them: "Does the Military Council have news of the military governor of Chuzhou?"

Both were afraid to answer and neither could think of anything to say. The Emperor was filled with suspicion and his displeasure showed plainly on his face.

Marshal Su's man after making his inquiries in Chuzhou told the Marshal how Song Jiang had drunk poisoned wine and was dead, and how the local people out of respect for his loyalty had buried him on a hill at Duckweed Marsh. He also told how the Professor, Colonel Hua and Iron Ox were buried in the same place and the people had built a memorial hall to honour them and make offerings to them in spring and autumn.

Marshal Su hurriedly called the man inside to prepare a report for the Emperor. The Emperor could not conceal his feelings when he heard it. At next day's dawn court he expressed his anger, reprimanding Gao and Yang before all the courtiers: "You corrupt officials, betrayers of your country, you have ruined my people!"

They both grovelled, knocking their heads on the ground in acknowledgement of their guilt. The Grand Preceptor and Marshal Tong also came forward and said: "People's life and death are destined. The Military Council had received no report, we did not dare to repeat news that might be false. Last night the report from Chuzhou reached us. We were just about to inform Your Majesty...."

Once again the Emperor had the wool pulled over his eyes by the faithless four and they were allowed to get away with it. He simply told Gao and Yang to withdraw and then ordered the original official who was sent with the wine to be apprehended. But it turned out that the envoy after leaving Chuzhou had died on the return journey. Next day Marshal Su saw the Emperor in the side palace and told him again about the apparitions of Song Jiang's spirit. The Emperor wanted to transfer Song Jiang's title to his brother, Iron Fan. Iron Fan however was sick and could not serve as an official, so he politely declined, saying he only wanted to be a farmer in Yuncheng. In recognition of his filial piety the Emperor granted him a hundred thousand strings of cash and three hundred acres of land to support his family and promised that if he had offspring the court would advance them. Later Iron Fan had a son, Song Anping, who passed the official exams and served in the imperial library — but that is another story. In response to Marshal Su's report, the Emperor indited in his own hand a document granting Song Jiang a posthumous title of nobility in recognition of his loyal and valiant service and ordering a temple to be built on Mount Liang with a grand hall and images of Song Jiang and the others. He also donated to this temple an inscription in his own hand naming it "Temple of Loyalty and Pacification". There is a poem:

The heavenly stars are returned to the sky,
From earliest days they were revered as saints
By historians ever regarded as heroes.

In later times Song Jiang's spirit made many appearances and the people continued to make offerings to it in the four seasons. In the marshes of Mount Liang, when they prayed for wind they got wind, when they prayed for rain they had rain. At Duckweed Marsh in Chuzhou, because Song Jiang's spirit kept appearing, the local people built another shrine, a hall with two galleries, and even requested an imperial tablet for it. Thirty-six statues were placed in the main hall and seventy-two in the galleries. Year after year offerings were made there and thousands went to worship. Traces of it exist to this day. The historians have two funeral scrolls in the Tang style:

Blame not heaven for what man gets;
Recall how sovereigns pay their debts!
For the country's good they gave their all,
Till the Tartars' expulsion and Fang La's fall.
Heaven and earth stars, all are gone,
But slander and calumny still reign on.
Would that the deadly cup they'd refused,
And gone where men are better used!

And the other:

They lived life to the full, in death earned rank;
Of all a man may know no page left blank:
The horses of war, whose whinnying fills the night,
The moon over the mountain spilling its light,
The apes that sadden autumn with their cries,
Why seek rare compositions unlike to please,
When you can read of heroes such as these?
In Duckweed Marsh now lie they all at rest,
For eternal peace, a hidden place is best.
Flowers their petals shed, birds' dirges sing,
Remembering these whom nothing back can bring.
